city of Lyncvs, where the countrey is very plaine, and the way maruellous easie. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lacke victuals, if he staid far from the sea; and haply if he fell into any barren or leane countrey, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should be constrained in the end to returne again towards the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherfore he determined to crosse the mountaines to set vpon his enemies, & to proue if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the Romaines forted to get vp the hilles, they were receiued with darts, slings and shot, that lighted amongst them here & there: in somuch as the skirmish was very hote for the time it lasted, and many were slain and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the warre: for in the meane time there came certaine neat-heards of the countrey vnto Titus (who did vse to keep beasts on these mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not: by the which they promised to guide his army so, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the mountaine. And because they might be assured that their words were true, they said they were sent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the Epirots, who loued the Romains very wel, yet he fauoured them but vnderhand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his captaines with them, with foure thousand footmen, and three hundred horsmen. The heard-men that were their guides, went before stil, fast bound, and the Romains followed after. All the day time the army rested in thick woods, & marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the ful. Titus hauing sent these men away, rested all the rest of his camp: sauing that some dayes he entertained them with some light skirmishes to occupie the enemie withal. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compasse about, should come vnto the top of the mountaine aboue the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes: with the one of them he himselfe went on that side of the riuer where the way is straighter, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hill. The Macedonians againe, they shot lustily at them from the height of the hil, and in certaine places amongst the rockes they came to the sword. At the selfesame time, the two other troupes on either hand of him, did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hil, & as it were enuying one another, they climed vp with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the mountaine. When the Sun was vp, they might see a farre off as it were, a certaine smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mists we see cõmonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could see nothing, because it was behind them, & that the top of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The Romaines, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they saw it increased stil more & more, and in such sort, that it darkned al the aire: then they did assure thẽselues it was certainly the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they began to crie out, climing vp the hils with such a lustie courage, that they draue their enemies vp the hil stil, euen vnto the very rough & hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellowes also that were behind the enemies, did answer them with like loud cries from the top of the mountaine: wherewith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled presently vpon it. Notwithstanding, there was not slaine aboue two thousand of them, because the hardnes and straightnes of the place did so guard them, that they could not be chased. But the Romaines spoiled their camp, took all that they found in their tents, tooke also their slaues, and wan the passage into the mountaines, by the which they entred the country of Epirvs: and did passe through it so quietly, and with so great abstinence, that though they were far from their ships and the sea, and lacked their ordinary portion of corne which they were wont to haue monthly, & that victuals were very scant with thẽ at that time, yet they neuer took any thing of ỹ country, though they found great store & plenty of al riches in it. For Titus was aduertised, that Philip passing by Thessaly, & flying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to set fire on their houses, & to leaue those goods they could not cary away, by reason of the weight & vnhãdsom cariage thereof, to the spoile of his souldiers: & so (as it seemed) he left the whole country to the conquest of the Romains. Whereupon Titus looking consideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the coũtry without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their own. So they taried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly & wise forbearing of the country. For, so soone as they were entred Thessaly, the

the cities willingly yeelded themſelues vnto them: and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the coũtry of THERMOPYLES, did maruellouſly deſire to ſee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put themſelues vnto his hands. The ACHAIANS alſo on the other ſide, did renounce the league & alliance they had made with Philip: and furthermore did determine in their counſell, to make war with him on the ROMAINES ſide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time friends and confederates with the ROMAINES, and that they did ſhew themſelues very louing to take their part in the wars: neuertheleſſe when they deſired the OPVNTIANS that they wold put their city into their hands, and were offered that it ſhould be kept & defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but ſent for Titus, and put themſelues and their goods wholy into his protection. They ſay, that when king Pyrrus firſt ſaw the ROMAINS army range in order of battell from the top of a hil, he ſaid: This order of the barbarous people ſetting of their mẽ in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous maner. And thoſe alſo that neuer had ſeene Titus before, & came for to ſpeake with him: were compelled in a manner to ſay as much. For where they had heard the MACEDONIANS ſay, that there came a captain of the barbarous people that deſtroyed al before him by force of armes, and ſubdued whole countries by violence: they ſaid to the contrary, that they found him a man indeed young of yeares, howbeit gentle, and courteous to looke on, and that ſpake the Greek tongue excellently well, and was a louer only of true glory. By reaſon wherof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled all the cities & towns of GRECE with good wil towards him, & ſaid: they had ſeene Titus the captaine, that would reſtore them to their ancient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip ſhewed himſelfe willing to haue peace and that Titus alſo did offer it him, and the friendſhip of the people of ROME, with theſe conditions that he wold leaue ŷ GRECIANS their whole liberties, & remoue his garriſons out of their cities and ſtrong holds: which Philip refuſed to do. And thereupon all GRECE, and euen thoſe which fauoured Philip, ſaid with one voice: that the ROMAINES were not come to make wars with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauour of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GRECE came in, & offered themſelues vnto Titus without compulſiõ. And as he paſſed through the countrey of BOEOTIA, without any ſhew at all of warres, the chiefeſt men of the citie of THEBES went to meet him: who though they took part with the king of MACEDON, becauſe of a priuate man called Barchylelus, yet they would honour Titus, as thoſe which were contented to keepe league and friendſhip with either ſide. Titus embraced them, and ſpake very courteouſly vnto them, going on his way ſtil faire and ſoftly, entertaining them ſometime with one matter, and ſometime with another, & kept thẽ talke of purpoſe, to the end his ſouldiers being wearied, with iourneying, might in the meane time take good breath: and ſo marching on by litle and litle, he entred into the city with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleaſed, but yet they durſt not refuſe him, though he had not at that time any number of ſouldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he prayed audience, and began to perſwade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already, that they would rather take part with the ROMAINES, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpoſe, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the aſſẽbly, did help to exhort ŷ THEBANS very earneſtly, that they wold do as Titus perſwaded them. But Attalus was more earneſt then became a man of his yeares, for the deſire he had (as was imagined) to ſhew Titus his eloquence: who did ſo ſtraine and moue himſelfe withall, that he ſwouned ſodainely in the midſt of his oration, whereby the rewme fell down ſo faſt vpon him, that it took away his ſenſes, ſo as he fell in a trance before them all, and few daies after was conueied again by ſea into ASIA, where he liued not long after. In the mean time, the BOEOTIANS came in to the ROMAINS, & took their part. And Philip hauing ſent Ambaſſadors to ROME, Titus alſo ſent thither of his men to ſolicite for him, in two reſpects. The one if the wars continued againſt Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did grant him peace: that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare leaſt they would ſend a ſucceſſor to continue thoſe wars, who ſhould take the glory from him, & make an end of them. But his friẽds made ſuch earneſt ſute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied: neither was there ſẽt any other General in Titus place, but he ſtil cõtinued his charge in theſe wars. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as he had receiued his commiſſion and authority from the Senate, he went ſtraight towards THESSALY, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army aboue fixe and twenty thouſand fighting men whereof the ÆTOLIANS made ſixe thouſand footemen, and three thousand horsemen. King Philips army on the other side was no lesse in number, and they began to march one towards the other, vntil at the length they both drew neare the city of SCOTVSA, where they determined to trie the battell. So neither they nor their men were afraid to see themselues one so neare another: but rather to the contrary, the ROMAINS on the one side tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselues what great honor they should win to ouercome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnesse, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other side also, taking the ROMAINES for other maner of souldiers then the PERSIANS, beganne to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselues valiant souldiers in this battell, as those which were to shew the proofe of their valiantnesse in the heart of GREECE, the goodliest Theater of the world, and against their enemies of most noble fame. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to ioyne, did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a little hill raised vp aboue the rest, and neare the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his souldiers, as all Generals do before they giue battel. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they took it for an ill signe that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to speak vnto thē, he of a cōceit at the matter, did of himself deferre to giue battel that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowne, the clouds were turned to a mist, and filled all the valley with a darke grosse thicke ayre, coming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field betweene both campes with a mist all the morning: by reason whereof the skouts on both sides that were sent to discouer what the enemies did, in very short time met together, and one gaue charge vpon another, in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon little hilles one before another, and very neare one vnto another, which had bene called so because they haue had some likenesse of it. In this skirmish there were many changes, as commonly falleth out when they fight in such ill fauored stony places: for sometime the ROMAINES fled, and the MACEDONIANS chased them: another time the MACEDONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to flie themselues, and the ROMAINES who fled before, now had them in chase. This change and alteration came by sending new supplies still from both camps, to relieue them that were distressed and driuen to flie. Now began the mist to breake vp, and the aire to cleare, so that both Generals might see about them what was done in either camp: by reason whereof both of them drew on their army to the field and battel. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, from which they came so amaine to set vpon the ROMAINES, and with such a fury, that the strongest & valiantest that could be, had neuer bin able to abide the front of their battel, so closely were they ioyned together, & their wall of pikes was so strong. But on his left wing it was not so, because the ranks of his battell could not ioyne so neare nor close target to target, the place being betwixt the hils and the rocks, where the battel was coming, so as they were cōpelled by reason of the straightnesse & vneuennesse of the ground, to leaue it open, and vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disaduantage, went from the left wing of his battell which he saw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going sodainely towards the left wing of King Philips battell, he set vpon the MACEDONIANS on that side, where he saw they could not close their ranks in the front, nor ioyne them together in the middest of the battel (which is the whole strength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) because the field was vp hill and downe hil: and to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind, that one thronged and ouerlaid another. For the battel of the MACEDONIANS hath this propertie, that so long as the order is kept close and ioyned together, it seemeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are sundred and not ioyned together, it doth not only lose the force & power of the whole body, but also of euery priuate souldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diuersity of the weapons wherwith they fight, and partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing and ioyning together of their ranks & orders, which doth stay vp one another, more then doth euery priuate souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the ROMAINS followed the chase, & the other ran to giue a charge vpon the flanks of the right wing which fought yet, and

and they made great slaughter of them. Wherupon they now which before had the vantage, began to stagger and breake, and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their weapons: insomuch as there were slaine of them eight thousand in the field, and fiue thousand taken prisoners in their chase. And had not the fault bin in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not saued himselfe by flying as he did. For whilest the ROMAINS had their enemies in chase, the ÆTOLIANS tarried, and rifled all king Philips campe, so as they left the ROMAINES nothing to spoile at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot words betweene them, and one with another. But afterwards it angred Titus worse, challenging the honour of this victory to themselues, because they gaue it out through GREECE, that they alone had ouerthrowne king Philip in the battell. So that in the songs and ballades the Poets made in praise of this victory, which euery country and townes-man had in his mouth, they alwayes put the ÆTOLIANS before the ROMAINES: as in this that followeth, which was currantly sung in euery place:

Quintius ouercame Philips armie.

Meanes betwixt the Ætolians and the Romaines.

Oh friend, which passest by: here lye we wretched pheares, Withouten honour of the graue, without lamenting teares.
We thirty thousand were, which ended haue our dayes:
In cruell coasts of Thessaly, which caused our decaies.
We haue bene ouerthrowne by th' Ætolians men of warre
And by the Latine crewes likewise, whom Titus led from farre, Euen out of Italy, to Macedonie land,
Vs to destroy, he (captainelike) did come with mighty band,:
And Philip stout, therewhiles for all his proud fierce face,
Is fled, more swift then Harts do run, which are pursude in chase.

Alcæus verses in disgrace of king Philip.

The Poet was Alcæus that made these verses for to sing, who did them in disgrace of king Philip, falsely increasing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, because it was sung in euery place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a song to counterfeit his, as followeth:

This gibbet on this hill, which passers by may marke,
Was set to hang Alcæus vp withouten leaues or barke.

Philips verses against Alcæus.

But Titus tooke it grieuously, who chiefly desired to be honoured amongst the GREECIANS, by reason wherof from that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making account of the ÆOLIANS: wherwith they were maruellous angry, and specially when he receiued an ambassador from Philip, and gaue eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offered. For then they were so netled against him, that they gaue it out through all GREECE, that Titus had sold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the war, and vtterly haue destroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought GREECE into bondage. These slanderous reports and false tales which the ÆTOLIANS spread thus abroad, did much trouble the ROMAINES friends and confederates: but Philips selfe pulled this suspition out of their heads, when he came in person to require peace, and did submit himself wholly to the discretion of Titus and the ROMAINES. Titus then granted him peace, and deliuered to him his realme of MACEDON, and commanded him he should giue ouer all that he held in GREECE; and besides, that he should pay one thousand talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by sea, sauing onely ten ships: and for assurance of this peace, he tooke one of his sons for hostage, whom he sent to ROME. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, & wisely did foresee the time to come. For then Hannibal of CARTHAGE (the great enemy of the ROMAINES) was banished out of his countrey, and came to king Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earnestly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal so followed with these perswasions, that king Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notable acts, whereby in the wars before he had attained the surname of Great, he began now to aspire to the monarchie of the whole world, and sought how to find occasion to make wars with the ROMAINES. So that if Titus (foreseeing that a far off) had not wisely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the wars of king Philip, & that these two the mightiest Princes of the world had ioyned together against the city of ROME: then it had bene in as great trouble and danger, as euer it was before in the time of their wars against Hannibal. Howbeit, Titus hauing happily thrust in this peace betweene both wars, he cut off the warre that was preſent, before the other that was coming: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kings his laſt, and from the other his firſt hope. In the meane time the ten commiſſioners that were ſent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide & aſſiſt him in the order of the affaires of Greece, did counſell him to ſet all the reſt of Greece at liberty, and onely to keepe in their hands with good garriſon, the cities of Chalcide, of Corinth, and of Demetriade, to make ſure that by practiſe they ſhould not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the Ætolians (that were the common ſlanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make theſe cities to rebell, and did ſummon Titus to looſe the chaines of Greece: for ſo did king Philip call theſe three cities. Then they asked the Grecians in mockery, whether they were willing now to haue heauier fetters on their legs then before, being ſomewhat brighter and fairer then thoſe they had bene ſhackled with: and alſo whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the fetters from the Grecians legs, and tying them about their necks. Titus being maruellouſly troubled and vexed with this, moued the ten Counſellors ſo earneſtly, that he made them grant his requeſt in the end, that thoſe three cities alſo ſhould be deliuered from garriſon: becauſe the Grecians thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not throughly performed and accompliſhed in euery reſpect on them all.

Chalcide, Corinth, Demetriade, called by Philip of Macedon, the chaines of Greece.

Wherfore when the feaſt called Iſthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinit multitude of people, come to ſee the ſport of the games played there: for Greece hauing bene long time troubled with wars, they ſeeing themſelues now in ſure peace, & in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to ſee games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by ſound of trumpet in the aſſembly, that euery man ſhould keepe ſilence. That done, the herald went forward, & thruſt into the middeſt of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloud: that the Senate of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Conſul of the people of Rome, (now that they had ouerthrowne king Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth diſcharge from all garriſons, and ſet at liberty from all taxes, ſubſidies, & impoſitions for euer, to liue after their old ancient lawes, and in full liberty: the Corinthians, the Locrians, thoſe of Phocide, thoſe of the Iles of Eubœa, the Achaians, the Phthiotes, the Magneſians, the Theſſalians, and the Perrhœbians. At the firſt time of the Proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herald, and the moſt part of thoſe that heard him, could not tell directly what he ſaid: for there ran vp and down the ſhew-place where the games were plaid, a confuſed bruite and tumult of people, that wondered, and asked what the matter meant, ſo as the herald was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after ſilence made, the herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaime it in ſuch audible wiſe, that the whole aſſembly heard him: and then roſe there ſuch a loud ſhout and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the ſound of it was heard to the ſea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were ſet to ſee the Sword-players play, roſe vp al on their feet, letting the games alone, and went together with great ioy to ſalute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of Greece. Then was ſeene (which is much ſpoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that preſent time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the ſhew-place at that time that they made the ſame outſhout. This came to paſſe, by reaſon the aire was broken and cut aſunder with the vehemencie and ſtrength of the voyces, ſo as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birds: which were driuen of neceſſity to fall to the ground, as flying through a voide place where they lacked aire. Vnleſſe we will rather ſay, that it was the violence of the crie, which ſtroke the birds paſſing through the aire, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and ſo made them fal down dead to the earth. It may be alſo, that there was ſome hurling wind in ỹ aire, as we do ſee ſometime in the ſea, when it riſeth high, & many times turneth about the waues, by violẽce of the ſtorme. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to ſee him, & that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly eſcaped from being ſtifled amongſt thẽ, the people came ſo thicke about him frõ euery place. But after that they were weary of crying and ſinging about his pauilion vntill night, in the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kin, friends or citizens, they did kiſſe and embrace one another for ioy, and ſo ſupped and made merrie together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the wars of Greece, diſcourſing among thẽ what ſundry great wars they had made, what they had endured heretofore,

Crowes flying, fell downe by the ſound of mens voices heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they could neuer ſo ioyfully, nor more aſſuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that preſent, receiuing the honorableſt reward, and that which deſerued greateſt fame through the world: that by the valiantneſſe of ſtrangers who fought for the ſame (without any ſpilt bloud of their owne in compariſon, or that they loſt the life of any one man, whoſe death they had cauſe to lament) they were ſo reſtored to their ancient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongſt men, to find a man very valiant, and wiſe withall: but yet of all ſorts of valiant men, it is harder to find a iuſt man. For Ageſilaus, Lyſander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous captaines of former times, had very good skill to leade an army, and to win the battell, as well by ſea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honourable benefite, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except the battell againſt the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battel of SALAMINA, the iourny of PLATÆES, the battel of THERMOPYLES, the battel Cimon fought about CYPRVS, and vpon the riuer of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GREECE that were made, fell out againſt themſelues, and did euer bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumph which euer were ſet vp for the ſame, was to their ſhame and loſſe. So that in the end, GREECE was vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowne, and that chiefly through the wickedneſſe and ſelfe-will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying anothers doing. Where a ſtrange nation, the which (as it ſhould ſeeme) had very ſmall occaſion to moue them to do it, (for that they had no great familiaritie with ancient GREECE, and through the counſell and good wiſdome of the which, it ſhould ſeeme very ſtrange that GREECE could receiue any benefite) haue notwithſtanding with dangerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppreſſion and ſeruitude of violent Lords and tyrants. This and ſuch like talke, did at that time occupie the GRECIANS heads: and moreouer, the deedes following did anſwer and performe the words of the proclamation. For at one ſelfe time, Titus ſent Lentulus into ASIA, to ſet the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garriſons out of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was ſent alſo into ASIA, vnto king Antiochus, to ſpeake vnto him to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in ſubiection. And as for Titus, he went himſelfe vnto the citie of CHALCIDE, where he tooke ſea, and went into the prouince of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the garriſons of the cities, and redeliuered the gouernment of the commonwealth vnto the citizens of the ſame. Afterwards when time came that the feaſt of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honour of Hercules, Titus was choſen iudge and rector of the games that were plaid there: where, after he had ſet all things in very good order, pertaining vnto the ſolemnitie of the feaſt, he cauſed againe ſolemne proclamation to be made openly, for the general liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore viſiting the cities, he did ſtabliſh very good lawes, reformed iuſtice, and did ſet the inhabitants & citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amitie and concord one with another: and did call home alſo all thoſe that were outlawes and baniſhed men, & pacified all old quarrels and diſſentions among them. The which did no leſſe pleaſe and content him, that by perſwaſions he could bring ỹ GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other, then if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. In ſomuch, as the recouery of the liberty which Titus had reſtored vnto the GRECIANS, ſeemed vnto them the leaſt part of the goodneſſe they had receiued at his hands. They ſay that Lycurgus the orator ſeeing the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Philoſopher one day to priſon, for lacke of payment of a certaine impoſition, which the ſtrangers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to pay: he reſcued him from them by force, and moreouer proſecuted law ſo hard againſt them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie they had done vnto ſo worthy a perſon: And they tell, that the ſame Philoſopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus children in the city, ſaid vnto them: I do well requite your fathers good turne he did me: for I am the cauſe that he is praiſed and commended of euery man, for the kindneſſe he ſhewed on my behalfe. So the good deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not only reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praiſed and honoured of all the world: but they were cauſe alſo of increaſing their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and truſt in them, and that moſt iuſtly. So that the people and cities did not onely receiue the Captaines and Gouernours the ROMAINES ſent them: but they alſo went to ROME vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put themſelues into their hands. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes alſo which were oppreſſed by other more mighty then themſelues) had no other refuge, but to put themſelues vnder their protection: by reaſon whereof in a very ſhort time (with the fauour and helpe of the gods, as I am perſwaded) all the world came to ſubmit themſelues to their obedience, & vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus alſo did glory more that he had reſtored GREECE againe vnto liberty, then in any other ſeruice or exploit he had euer done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, the targets of ſiluer with his owne ſhield, he made theſe verſes to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth:

O noble twins Tyndarides, Dan Ioue his children deare,
Throw out lowde ſhouts of ioy and mirth, reioyce and make good cheere.
O noble kings of Spartan ſoyle, which take delight to ride
Your trampling ſteeds, with ſomy bit, and trappings by their ſide:
Reioyce you now, for Titus he, the valiant Romaine Knight, Theſe gifts ſo great to you hath got, euen by his force and might:
That hauing taken cleane away from off the Greekiſh neckes,
The heauy yoke of ſeruitude, which held them thrall to checkes,
Vnto their former liberty he hath reſtorde them free,
Which altogether periſht was, as men might plainely ſee.

He gaue a crowne of maſſie gold vnto Apollo, vpon the which he made this inſcription to be written:

A valiant Romaine Knight, euen Titus by his name,
A captaine worthy by deſert of high renowne and fame:
To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine gold
Hath giuen, thy godhead to adorne with iewels manifold:
Therefore let it thee pleaſe (Apollo god of grace)
With fauour to requite this loue to him and to his race:
That his renowned fame and vertue may be ſpred,
And blazed through the world ſo wide, to ſhew what life he led.

So hath the city of CORINTH enioyed this good hap, that the GRECIANS haue bene twice proclaimed to be ſet at liberty: the firſt time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the ſecond time by Nero in our time, and at the ſelfe ſame inſtant when they ſolemnely kept the feaſt called Iſthmia. Howbeit the firſt proclamation of their liberty (as we haue told you before) was done by the voice of an herald: & the ſecond time it was done by Nero himſelf, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open aſſembly, in the market place of the city of CORINTH. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus began then a goodly and iuſt warre againſt Nabis the curſed and wicked tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the end he deceiued the expectation of GREECE: for when he might haue taken him, he would not do it, but made peace with him, forſaking poore SPARTA, vnworthily oppreſſed vnder the yoke of bondage: either becauſe he was affraid that if the warre held on, there ſhould come a ſucceſſour vnto him from ROME, that ſhould carry the glory away to end the ſame, or elſe he ſtood iealous and enuious of the honour they did vnto Philopœmen: who hauing ſhewed himſelfe in euery place as excellent a captaine as euer came in GREECE, and hauing done notable acts and famous ſeruice, both of great wiſdome, and alſo of valiantneſſe, and ſpecially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honoured and reuerenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theater and common aſſemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruellouſly offended for he thought it vnreaſonable that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene Generall of an army, but in ſmall litle wars againſt his neighbors, ſhould be as much eſteemed and honoured as a Conſull of ROME, that was come to make wars for the recouery of the liberty of GREECE. But Titus alledged reaſonable excuſe for his doings, ſaying, that he ſaw very well he could not deſtroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great loſſe and miſery of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore of all the honours the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neare any recompence of his honourable and well deſeruing, but one only preſent they offered him, and which he aboue all the reſt moſt eſteemed: and this it was. During the ſecond warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had againſt Hannibal, many ROMAINES were taken priſoners in ſundry battels they loſt, and being ſold here and there, remained ſlaues in many countries: and amongſt other, there were were diſperſed in GRECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did moue men with ſpite and compaſſion towards them that ſaw them in ſo miſerable change and ſtate of fortune. But then much more was their miſery to be pitied, when theſe captiues found in the ROMAINES army, ſome of them their ſonnes, other their brethren, & the reſt their fellowes and friends, free and conquerours, and themſelues ſlaues and bondmen. It grieued Titus much to ſee theſe poore men in ſuch miſerable captiuitie, notwithſtanding he would not take them by force from thoſe that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fiue hundred pence a man, and hauing gathered them together into a troupe, they preſented all the ROMAIN captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was ready to take ſhip to returne into ITALY: which preſent made him returne home with greater ioy and contentation, hauing receiued for his noble deeds ſo honourable a recompence, and worthy of himſelfe, that was ſo louing a man to his citizens and country. And ſurely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did moſt beautifie his triumph. For theſe poore redeemed captiues did that, which the ſlaues are wont to do on that day when they be ſet at liberty: to wit they ſhaue their heads, and do weare little hats vpon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and ſo followed Titus chariot, on the day of his triumph and entry made into ROME in the triumphing maner. It was a goodly ſight alſo, to ſee the ſpoiles of the enemies, which were caried in the ſhew of this triumph: as ſtore of helmets after the GRECIANS faſhion, heapes of targets, ſhields, and pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull ſumme of gold and ſiluer. For Itanus the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great maſſe of treaſure in niggets of gold, of three thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteene pound weight; and of ſiluer, of forty three thouſand two hundred, threeſcore and ten pound weight; and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips, foureteene thouſand, fiue hundred & fourteene, beſides the thouſand talents king Philip ſhould pay for a ranſome: the which ſumme, the ROMAINES afterwards forgaue him, chiefly at Titus ſute and interceſſion, who procured that grace for him, & cauſed him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of ROME, and his ſon Demetrius to be ſent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hoſtage of ROME. Shortly after king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GRECE with a great fleet of ſhips, & a very puiſſant army, to ſtir vp the cities to forſake their league & alliance with the ROMAINS, and make a diſſention among them. To further this his deſire and enterpriſe, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and ſecret malice againſt the ROMAINS, and deſired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to ſay, that the war which he tooke in hand, was to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty; wherof they had no neede, becauſe they did already enioy their liberty: but for that they had no iuſt cauſe to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honeſteſt way he could. Wherfore the ROMAINES fearing greatly the riſing of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they ſent thither Manius Acilius their Generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS ſakes. Which arriuall did more aſſure thē that already bare goodwill to the ROMAINES, after they had once ſeene Manius and Titus: and the reſt that began to flie out, and to ſhrinke from them, thoſe Titus kept in obedience from ſtarting, remembring them of the friendſhip and goodwill they had borne him; euen like a good skilfull Phiſitian that could giue his patient Phiſicke to preſerue him from a contagious diſeaſe. Indeede there were ſome (but few of them) that left him, which were won & corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iuſt cauſe of offence towards them, yet he ſaued them after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the country of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, & in great haſt tooke the ſea to returne into ASIA. And the Conſul Manius following his victory, entred into the country of the ÆTOLIANS, where he took certaine townes by force, and left the other for a prey vnto king Philip. So Philip king of MACEDON on the one ſide, ſpoiled and ſacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMIANS, & the APERANTINES: and the Conſull Manius on the other ſide, deſtroyed the city of HERACLEA, and laid ſiege to the city of NAVPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus taking compaſſion of them to ſee the poore people of GRECE thus ſpoiled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reproued him for ſuffering king Philip to vſurpe the benefit and reward of his honourable victory, ſtill conquering many people, kings and countries, whileſt he continued ſiege before a city, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwards, when they that were beſieged ſaw Titus from their walls, they called him by his name, and held vp their hands vnto him, praying him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he ſpake with Manius, and appeaſing his anger, got him to grant the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might ſend Ambaſſadors to ROME, to ſee if they could obtain grace & pardon of the Senate. But the moſt trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whom the Conſull Manius was more grieuouſly offended, then with all the reſt: becauſe that king Antiochus after the wars was begun, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was paſt yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extreme age, and in the middeſt of his wars, he fel in dotage with a young gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleoptolemus, the faireſt woman that was at that time in all GRECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his hands, to ſerue him in this warre, for a ſtrong and ſafe retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had loſt the battell, he came thither with all poſſible ſpeed, and taking from thence with him his paſſing faire young Queene which he had maried, and his gold, his ſiluer and friends, he tooke the ſeas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cauſe the conſull Manius hauing wonne the battell, did march ſtraight with his army towards the city of CHALCIDE in a great rage and furie. But Titus that followed him, did alwaies lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did ſo much intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of ſtate and authoritie in councell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE alſo. Who becauſe they were preſerued from perill by his meanes, they to recompence this fact of his, did conſecrate vnto him, all their moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings and common works in their city, as appeareth yet by the ſuperſcriptions remaining to be ſeene at this day. As in the ſhew-place of exerciſes: the people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this ſhew-place of exerciſes, vnto Titus and Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: the people of CHALCIDE did conſecrate this temple vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this preſent time, there is a Prieſt choſen by the voice of the people, purpoſely to do ſacrifice vnto Titus: in which ſacrifice after that the thing ſacrifiſed is offered vp, and wine powred vpon it, the people ſtanding by, do ſing a ſong of triumph made in praiſe of him. But becauſe it were too long to write it all out, we haue onely drawne in briefe the latter end of the ſame: and this it is:

Quintius intreateth for the Æ. tolians. king Antiochus maried Cleoptolemus daughter in the city of Chalcide.

Honours done vnto T. Quintius for ſauing the Chalcidians and the Grecians.

The cleare vnſpotted faith of Romaines we adore,
And vow to be their faithfull friends both now and euermore.
Sing out you Muſes nine to Ioues eternall fame:
Sing out the honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy name.
Sing out (I ſay) the praiſe of Titus and his faith:
By whom you haue preſerued beue from ruine, dole and death.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone honour and reuerence Titus, but he was generally honoured alſo by the GRECIANS as he deſerued, and was maruellouſly beloued for his courteſie and good nature: which argueth plainely that they did not fainedly honour him, or through compulſion, but euen from the heart. For though there was ſome iarre betwixt him and Philopœmen at the firſt about ſeruice, for emulation of honour, and after betwixt him and Diophanes alſo, both Generals of the ACHAIANS, yet he neuer bare them any malice in his heart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heate of his words in counſell and aſſemblies, where he vttered his mind frankely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eager of reuenge: but many haue thought him raſh, and haſtie of nature. Otherwiſe, he was as good a companion in company as poſſible could be, and would vſe as pleaſant wiſe mirth as any man. As when he ſaid to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needs vniuſtly vſurpe the Ile of the ZAZINTHIANS, to diſſwade them from it: My Lords of ACHAIA, if ye once go out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your ſelues in danger, as ý tortey-ſes do, when they thruſt their heads out of their ſhelles. And the firſt time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: when Philip ſaid vnto him, you haue brought many men with you, and I am come alone: Indeede it is true you are alone, ſaid he, becauſe you made all your friends and kin to be ſlaine. Another time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cups in a feaſt where he was, he diſguiſed himſelfe in womens apparell, and danced in that maner: and the next day following he went vnto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his ſute, which was, to make the city of MESSINA to rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS.

Quintius courteſie and good nature. Emulation betwixt Titus Quintius and philopœmen.

Titus Quintius ſaying.

Titus

Titus made him answer, that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (said he) how you can dance in womens apparel, & sing at a feast, hauing such matters of weight in your head. In the councel of the ACHAIANS, king Antiochus Ambassadors being come thither, to moue thē to breake their league with the ROMAINES, and make their alliance with the king their master, they made a maruellous large discourse of ỹ great multitude of souldiers that were in their masters army, and did number them by many diuers names. Whereunto Titus answered, and told how a friend of his hauing bidden him one night to supper, and hauing serued so many dishes of meat to his boord, as he was angry with him for bestowing so great cost vpon him, as wondring how he could so sodainly get so much store of meat, and of so diuers kinds: my friend said to me againe, that all was but porke dressed so many wayes, and with so sundry sawces. And euen so (quoth Titus) my lords of ACHAIA, esteeme not king Antiochus army ỹ more, to heare of so many men of armes, numbred with their lances: and of such a number of footmen with their pikes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuersly armed, only with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done these things, & that the war with Antiochus, was ended, he was chosen Censor at ROME, with the son of that same Marcellus, who had bene fiue times Consul. This office is of great dignitie, and as a man may say, the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put off the Senate, foure men onely, but they were not famous. They receiued all into the number of citizens of ROME, that would present thēselues to be enrolled in their common regist er: with a prouiso, that they were borne free by father & mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despite the Nobility, perswaded the people of ROME to cōmand it so. Now at that time two of the noblest & most famous men of ROME were great enemies one against another: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus Portius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefest & worthiest person in the city: and got the displeasure of the other, which was Cato, by this mishap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing at all like him in condition: for he was so dissolutely & licentiously giuen to his pleasure, that he forgot al comlinesse and honesty. This Lucius loued wel a yong boy, & caried him alwaies with him whē he went to the wars, or to the charge and gouernment of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day said vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him so well, that he did leaue the sight of the sword-players at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer seene man killed before, to waite vpon him. Lucius being glad of the boyes words, answered him straight. Thou shalt lose nothing for that my boy, for I will by and by please thee as well. So he commanded a condemned man to be fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whō he willed to strike off his head in the midst of his supper, that the boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the Historiographer writeth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Liuius declareth, that in an oration which Cato himselfe made, it was written that it was one of the GAVLES: who being a traitor to his countrymen, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his hall, killed him with his own hand, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howbeit, it is very likely that Cato wrot in this sort, to aggrauate the offece, & to make it more cruell. For, many haue written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offender condemned to die: & among other, Cicero the orator doth recite it in a book he made of age, where he made it to be told vnto Catoes owne person. Howsoeuer it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and cleansing the Senate of all vnworthy persons, he put off the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bin Consull: which disgrace did seeme to redound to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius also. Wherupon both the brethren came weeping with al humility before the people, and made a petition that seemed very reasonable and ciuill: which was that they would cōmand Cato to come before thē, to declare the cause openly why he had with such open shame defaced so noble a house as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking back, came with his cōpaniō into the market place, where he asked Titus out aloud, if he knew nothing of the supper where such a fact was cōmitted. Titus answered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would denie that he had said was true. Lucius answered not a word. Wherupon the people iudged the shame was iustly laid vpon him: and so to honour Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne house. But Titus being much offended at the disgrace of his brother, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leases, & all deedes of sales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voide: and caused many suits also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I cannot say he did wisely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemy to an honest man a good citizen, & dutifull in his office for his yeare, for an vnworthy kinsman, who had iustly deserued the shame laid vpon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the people were assembled in the Theater to see games played, & the Senators were set according to their custome, in the most honourable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble manner, went to sit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honour: which when the people saw, they tooke pity of him, and could not abide to see him thus dishonoured. So they cried out to haue him come and sit among the other Senators and Cõsuls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to returne again to Titus. The naturall ambition and couetous greedy mind he had of honour, was very well taken & esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the wars, which we haue spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consull, of his owne seeking he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So when he began to stoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the last cast, to beare office any longer in the state: they saw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himselfe in old age to be ouercome with such youthfull violence, being far vnmeete for any of his yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the only cause that moued him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much disliking & ill opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne country, he went first vnto king Antiochus: who, after he lost the battel in PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMAINS granted him peace, with such conditions as themselues would. Wherfore Hannibal fled again from him, and after he had long wandered vp and downe, at the length he came to the Realme of BITHYNIA, & remained there about king Prusias, the ROMAINES knowing it well enough: and because Hannibal was then an old broken man, of no force nor power, and one whom fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being sent Ambassadour by the Senate, vnto Prusias king of BITHYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieued him to see him aliue. So that notwithstanding Prusias marueilously intreated him, to take pitie vpon Hannibal a poore old man, & his friend who came to him for succour: yet he could not perswade Titus to be content he should liue. Hannibal long before had receiued answer of his death from an oracle, to this effect:

Lucius Quintius restored to his place by the people T. Quintios ambition.

T. Quintius cause of Hannibals death.

Titus sent Ambassador vnto Prusias king of Bithynia Hannibal deceiued by an oracle concerning his death.

The land of Lybia, shall couer vnder mould,
The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal vnderstood that of LIBYA, as if he should haue died in AFRIKE, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certain sandy country in BITHYNIA, neare to the seas side, where there is a litle village called LIBYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually. He mistrusting king Prusias faint heart, and fearing the ROMAINS malice also, had made seuen priuie caues and vaults vnder ground long before, that he might secretly go out at either of them which way he would, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where himselfe did lie, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed Prusias to deliuer him into his hands, he sought then to saue himselfe by those mines: but he found that all the vents out, had watch and ward vpon them by the kings commandement. So then he determined to kil himself. Now some say, that he wound a linnin towell hard about his necke, and commanded one of his men he should set his knee vpon his buttocke, and weighing hard vpon him, holding the towell fast, he should pull his necke backward with all the power and strength he could, and neuer leaue pressing on him, til he had stragled him. Others say that he drank buls bloud, as Midas & Themistocles had done before him. But Titus Liuius writeth, that he had poison which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered it in a cup he held in his hands, & before he drank he spake these words: Come on, let vs deliuer ý ROMAINS of this great care, sith my life is so grieuous vnto them, that they thinke it too long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shal winne no honourable victory, nor worthy the memory of the ancient ROMAINES, who aduertised king Pyrrus their enemy, euen when he had warres with them, and had won battels of them, that he should beware of poisoning which was intended towards him. And this was Hannibals end, as we find it written. The newes whereof being come to ROME vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell, to haue made Hannibal

kill himself in that sort, when extremity of age had ouercome him already, and was as a bird left naked, her feathers falling from her for age: and so much the more, because there was no instant occasion offered him to vrge him to do it, but a couetous mind of honour, for that he would be chronicled to be the cause & Author of Hannibals death. And thē in contrariwise they did much honour and commend the clemencie & noble mind of Scipio AFRICAN: who hauing ouercome Hannibal in battell, in AFRICKE selfe, being then indeed to be feared, and had bene neuer ouercome before: yet he did not cause him to be driuen out of his country, neither did aske him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the battell, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hannibal courteously by the hand, and after the battell, in the conditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hannibals person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his misery. And they tell how afterwards they met againe together in the city of EPHESVS, and as they were walking, that Hannibal took the vpper hand of Scipio: and that Scipio bare it patiently, and left not off walking for that, neither shewed any countenance of misliking. And in entring into discourse of many matters, they descended in the end to talke of ancient Captains: and Hannibal gaue iudgement, that Alexander the Great was the famousest Captaine, Pyrrus the second, & himself the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him: What wouldest thou say then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truly, quoth Hannibal, I would not then put my selfe the third man, but the first, and aboue all the Captains that euer were. So diuerse greatly cōmending the goodly sayings and deeds of Scipio, did maruellously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) laid his hands vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contrary againe said, it was wel done of him, saying, that Hannibal so long as he liued, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not his hand nor body that troubled the ROMAINS so much, but his great wisdome, & skill he had in the wars, & the mortal hate he bare in his heart towards the ROMAINS, which neither yeares, nor age would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwaies keepe in a state, but changeth still, and then quickneth vp our desires to set willingly vpon those that war against vs, because they hate vs in their hearts. The things which fell out afterwards, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, son of the daugher of a plaier vpon the citherne, vnder the fame and glorie of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled all ASIA with war and rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauour. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had receiued against Sylla & Fimbria, and after so many armies ouerthrowne by battell and wars, and after so many famous captaines lost and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of power both by sea and land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene: for he had a King to his friend that gaue him entertainement for him and his family, and made him Admiral of his ships, and General of his horsmen & footmen in the field. Marius also went vp and down AFRICKE a begging for his liuing, insomuch as his enemies at ROME laughed him to scorne: & soone after notwithstanding they fell downe at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murthered, and slaine within ROME by his commandement. Thus we see no man can say certainly he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertainty of things to come: considering there is but one death, and change of better life. Some say also, that Titus did not this act alone, and of his owne authority, but that he was sent Ambassador with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hannibal to death, by what meanes soeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not find any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he died quietly of a naturall death at home in his countrey.

THE COMPARISON OF Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopœmen.

T Quintius benefits vnto Greece.

IT is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefites that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philopœmen, nor all the other former captains are to be compared with Titus. For all the ancient Captaines almost being GRECIANS, made warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a ROMAINE, and no GRECIAN, made warrs for the liberty of GRECE. When Philopœmen was not able to help his poore citizens distressed sore & vexed with wars, he sailed away into CRETA. Titus hauing ouercome Philip King of MACEDON in battell, did restore againe to liberty all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrowly examine the battels of either party, they shall find that Philopœmen being Generall of the ACHAIANS, made more GRECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fighting with them for the liberty of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of thē was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke & sodainly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left King Philip his Realme and Crowne after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towards the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopœmen for spite and malice, took townes & villages from his owne natiue country and city wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a sound friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendship, and done pleasure vnto: and Philopœmen in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had giuen, and to ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopœmen when he had done the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards raze the wals of their city, and spoiled and destroyed all their country: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernement. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choler, he was himselfe cause of his owne death, for that he made more hast then good speed, to go out of time to set vpon those of MESSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisedome, and euer considered what was best to be done: But if we look into the number of battels, and victories: The warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battels: whereas Philopœmen in infinit battels in which he had the better, neuer left it doubtfull, but that his skill did euer help him more to the victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wan honour by meanes of the power of ROME, when it flourished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopœmen made himselfe, famous by his deedes, when GRECE began to stoupe and fall altogether. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the ROMAINES: and the deeds of the other, were priuate to himselfe alone. For Titus was Generall ouer good and valiant souldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopœmen being chosen Generall, did traine his men himselfe, and made them afterwards very expert and valiant, that were but meane and greene souldiers before. And whereas Philopœmen had continuall warres with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it made made a certain proofe of his valiantneſſe. For where all other things are anſwerable to his, there we muſt iudge that ſuch as ouercome, haue the moſt courage. Now Philopœmen making warres with the moſt warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, & the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the ſubtilleſt of them, by fineneſſe and policie: and the moſt valiant by proweſſe and hardineſſe. But Titus ouercame, by putting that onely in practiſe, which was already found and ſtabliſhed: as the diſcipline of warres, and order of battell, in the which his ſouldiers had long before bene trained. Whereas Philopœmen brought into his country, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accuſtomed vnto. So that the chiefeſt point how to win a battell, was found out anew, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vſe it, and had found it out already before. Againe, touching the valiant acts done in the perſon of themſelues, many notable acts may be told of Philopœmen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, ſaid in his reproch: that at a day of battel, when Philopœmen ran with his ſword in his hand, to that ſide where he ſaw the MACEDONIANS fighting and making head againſt the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was buſie at his prayers to the gods, not ſtirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the ſword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus euer did, were done alwayes as a Conſull, or Lieutenant, or Magiſtrate: whereas Philopœmen ſhewed himſelfe vnto the ACHAIANS, a man no leſſe valiant and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a Generall. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyrant of ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSINIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he ſhut the gates of the city of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from coming in, and thereby ſaued the citie from ſacking. Thus being borne to command, he knew not onely how to command according to the law, but could command the law it ſelfe vpon neceſſity, and when the common wealth required it. For at ſuch a time he would not tary while the Magiſtrates which ſhould gouerne him, did giue him authority to command, but he tooke it of himſelfe, and vſed them when the time ſerued: eſteeming that he which knew better then they what was to be done, was more truly their Generall, then he whom they had choſen. And therefore they do well, that do commend Titus acts, for his clemencie and courteſie vſed to the GRECIANS: but much more the noble and valiant acts of Philopœmen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much eaſier to pleaſure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and reſiſt the ſtrong. Therefore ſithence we haue throughly examined & compared the one with the other, it is very hard to iudge altogether the difference that is betweene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement would not ſeeme vẏ ill, if we do giue the GRECIAN for diſcipline of warre, the preheminence and praiſe of a good Captaine: and to the ROMAINE for iuſtice and clemencie, the name and dignitie of a moſt iuſt and courteous gentleman.

A Generall muſt not be at his prayers when he ſhould occupie his ſword.

Quintius clemencie to the Grecians. Philopœmẽs loue to the Romains.

The end of Titus Quintius Flaminius life.

THE LIFE OF Pyrrus:

Pyrrus kinared, and beginning of the kingdome of Epirus.

IT is written, that since Noes floud, the first King of the THESPROTIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phaeton, one of those who came with Pelasgus into the Realme of EPIRVS. But some say otherwise, that Deucalion, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the country of the MOLOSSIANS. But howsoever it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the sonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the country, and after him left a succession of Kings, which were called after his name, the PYRRIDES: because that frō his infancie he was surnamed Pyrrus, as much to say, as red: and one of his legitimate sonnes whom he had by Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodes the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honored as a god in EPIRVS, being called in their language, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first kings of that race vntill the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mention made of them: nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, because they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voide of ciuility. Tyrritas was indeed the first that beautified the cities of his countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in ciuill lawes and customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a sonne called Alcetas; of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came Æacides, who maried Phthia the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN, a famous man in the time of the warres, surnamed LAMIAN, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the confederates, after Leosthenes. This Æacides had two daughters by his wife Phthia, to say, Deidamea and Troiade, and one sonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, and put the crowne into the hands of the sons of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the friends of Æacides that could be taken, were generally murthered and slaine outright. Androclides and Angelus in the meane time stole away Pyrrus, being but a sucking babe, (whom his enemies neuertheless eagerly sought for to haue destroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few seruants, his nurses and necessary women only to look to the child and giue it sucke: by reason whereof their flight was much hindred, so as they could go no great iorneys, but that they might easily be ouertakē by thē that followed. For which cause they put the child into the hands of Androclion, Hippias, & Neander, three lusty yong men whom they trusted with him, and commanded them to runne for life to a certaine city of MACEDON, called called MEGARES, and they themſelues in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by force made ſtay of thoſe that followed them till night. So as with much ado hauing driuen them backe, they ran after them that carried the child Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at Sunne ſet. And now, weening they had bene ſafe, and out of all danger, they found it cleane contrary. For when they came to the riuer vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they ſaw it ſo rough and ſwift, that it made them afraid to behold it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpoſſible to wade through, it was ſo high riſen & troubled with the fall of the raine, beſides that the darkneſſe of the night made euery thing ſeeme fearefull vnto them. So as they now that carried the child, thought it not good to venture the paſſage ouer of themſelues alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certaine countriemen on the other ſide, they prayed and beſought them in the name of the gods, that they would helpe them to paſſe ouer the child, ſhewing Pyrrus vnto them afarre off. But the countrimen by reaſon of the roaring of the riuer vnderſtood them not. Thus they continued a long ſpace, the one crying, the other liſtning, yet could they not vnderſtand one another, till at the laſt one of the company bethought himſelfe to pill off a peece of the barke of an oke, and vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and neceſſity of the child. Which he tied to a ſtone to giue it weight, and ſo threw it ouer to the other ſide of the riuer: other ſay, that he did prick the barke through with the point of a dart which he caſt ouer. The countriemen on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing read what was written, and vnderſtanding thereby the preſent danger the child was in: felled downe trees in all the haſt they could poſſible, bound them together and ſo paſſed ouer the riuer. And it fortuned that the firſt man of them that paſſed ouer, and tooke the child, was called Achilles: the reſidue of the countrimen paſſed ouer alſo, and tooke the other that came with the child, and conueyed them ouer as they came firſt to hand. And thus hauing eſcaped their hands, by eaſie iourneys they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his houſe ſitting by his wife: and layd downe the child in the middeſt of the floore before him. The king hereupon ſtaied a long time without vttering any one word, weighing with himſelfe what was beſt to be done: becauſe of the feare he had of Caſſander, a mortall enemie of Æacides. In the meane time, the child Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of the kings gowne, and ſcrawled vp by that, and ſo got vp on his feete againſt the kings knees. At the firſt, the king laughed to ſee the child: but after it pitied him againe, becauſe the child ſeemed like an humble ſuter that came to ſeek ſanctuary in his armes. Other ſay, that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto ŷ altar of the familiar gods, alongſt the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods prouidence, preſently deliuered the child to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to ſee him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies ſent to demand the child of him: and moreouer, Caſſander cauſed two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer ŷ child Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would neuer grant thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelue yeares old, he brought him into his countrey of EPIRVS with an army, and ſtabliſhed him king of the realme againe, Pyrrus had a great maieſty in his countenance, but yet indeed more fearefull then friendly. He had alſo no teeth in his vpper iaw that ſtood diſtinctly one from another, but one whole bone throughout his gumme, marked a litle at the top onely, with certaine rifts in the place where the teeth ſhould be deuided. Men held opinion alſo, that he did heale them that were ſicke of the ſpleene, by ſacrificing a white cock, & touching the place of the ſpleene on the left ſide of them that were ſicke, ſoftly with his right foot, they lying on their backs: and there was not ſo poore nor ſimple a man that craued this remedy of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he ſacrificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleaſed him very wel. They ſay alſo, that the great toe of his right foot had ſome ſecret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they burnt his body, all the reſt being conſumed to aſhes, his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all: but of that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was ſeuenteene yeares of age, thinking himſelfe ſure inough of his kingdome, it chanced him to make a iourney into ILLYRIA, where he maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whome he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no ſooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe againſt him, and draue out his friends and ſeruants, and deſtroyed all his goods, and yeelded themſelues vnto his aduerſary Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus loſt his kingdome, and ſeeing himſelfe forſaken on all ſides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus ſonne) that had maried his ſiſter Deidamia, who in her yong age was aſſured to Alexander the ſonne of Alexander the Great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius then maried her, being come to full & able age. And in that great battell which was ſtriken neare to the city of HIPSVS, where all the kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a yong man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valianteſt prince amongſt them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had loſt the battell, Pyrrus neuer forſooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GREECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was ſent an hoſtage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGYPT: where he made Ptolomie know (both in hunting and in other exerciſes of his perſon) that he was very ſtrong, hard, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongſt all king Ptolomies wiues, was beſt beloued and eſteemed of her husband, both for her vertue and wiſedome, he began to entertaine and honour her aboue all the reſt. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himſelfe towards the great (by whom he might win benefit) and knew alſo how to creepe into their credit: and in like maner was he a great ſcorner and deſpiſer of ſuch as were his inferiours. Moreouer, for that he was found maruellous honourable and of faire condition, he was preferred before al other yong princes, to be the husband of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom ſhe had by Philip, before ſhe was maried vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of that mariage, more and more in eſtimation and fauour by meanes of his wife Antigona, who ſhewed her ſelfe very vertuous and louing towards him: hee found meanes in the end, to get both men and money to returne againe into the Realme of EPIRVS, and to conquer it: ſo was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, becauſe he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithſtanding, Pyrrus fearing leſt Neoptolemus would repaire vnto ſome of the other kings, to ſeeke aide againſt him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that they ſhould both together be kings of EPIRVS. But in proceſſe of time, ſome of their men ſecretly made ſtrife againe betweene them, and ſet them at defiance one with another: and the chiefeſt cauſe as it is ſaid, that angred Pyrrus moſt, grew vpon this: the kings of EPIRVS had an ancient cuſtome of great antiquity, after they had made ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, in a certaine place in the prouince of MOLOSSIDE (called PASSARON) to take their oath, and to be ſworne to the EPIROTS, that they would reigne well and iuſtly, according to the lawes and ordinances of the countrey: and to receiue the ſubiects oathes interchangeably alſo, that they ſhould defende and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like manner. This ceremony was done in the preſence of both the kings, and they with their friends did both giue and receiue preſents each of other. At this meeting and ſolemnity, among other, one Gelon a moſt faithfull ſeruant and aſſured friend vnto Neoptolemus, who beſides great ſhewes of friendſhip and honour hee did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two paire of draught oxen, which one Myrtilus a cup-bearer of Pyrrus being preſent, and ſeeing, did craue of his maſter. But Pyrrus denyed to giue them vnto him, whereat Myrtilus was very angry. Gelon perceiuing that Myrtilus was angrie, prayed him to ſup with him that night. Now ſome ſay, he ſought to abuſe Myrtilus, becauſe he was faire and young: and beganne to perſwade him after ſupper to take part with Neoptolemus, and poyſon Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though hee was willing to giue eare to this perſwaſion, and to be well pleaſed withall. But in the meane time, hee went and told his maſter of it, by whoſe commandement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cup-bearer, to talke with Gelon about this practiſe, as though hee had alſo giuen his conſent to it, and was willing to bee partaker of the enterpriſe. This did Pyrrus to haue two witneſſes, to proue the pretended poyſoning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceiued, and Neoptolemus alſo with him, both imagining they had cunningly ſpunne the threed of their treaſon: Neoptolemus was ſo glad of it, that he could not keepe it himſelfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be merie with his ſiſter, he could not keepe it in, but muſt be pratling of it to her, ſuppoſing no body had heard him but her ſelfe, becauſe there was no liuing creature neare them, ſauing Phœnarcta Samons wife, the Kings chiefe heardman of all his beaſts, and yet ſhe was layd vpon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: ſo that ſhe ſeemed as though ſhe had ſlept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no body miſtruſting her: the next morning ſhe went to Antigona King Pyrrus wife, and told her euery word what ſhe

ſhe had heard Neoptolemus ſay to his ſiſter. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time: but hauing made ſacrifice vnto the gods, he bad Neoptolemus to ſupper to his houſe, where he ſlue him, being well informed before of the goodwill the chiefeſt men of the realme did beare him, who wiſhed him to diſpatch Neoptolemus, and not to content himſelf with a peece of EPIRVS only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cauſe, this ſuſpition alſo falling out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus and ſlue him firſt. And furthermore, remembring the pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomy and Berenice, he named his firſt ſonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and hauing built a city in the PRESQVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, hee firſt determined with himſelfe how to winne that which lay neareſt vnto him: and ſo tooke occaſion by this meanes, firſt to ſet foot into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldeſt ſonne of Caſſander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Theſſalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne countrey, who ſent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus alſo to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not ſo quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arriued there, demanded for his charge ſuſtained, the city of NYMPHÆA, with all the ſea coaſts of MACEDON: and beſides all that, certaine lands alſo that were not belonging to the ancient crowne & reuenues of the kings of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All theſe, the yong king Alexander leauing vnto him, he tooke poſſeſſion thereof, and put good garriſons into the ſame in his owne name: and conquering the reſt of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great diſtreſſe. In the meane time king Lyſimachus lacking no goodwill to help Antipater with his force, but being buſied in other matters, had not the mean to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomy, would deny him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby inſtantly to pray and require him to leaue off the warres begun againſt Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the ſum of three hundred talents. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew ſtraight that this was but a fetch & deuice of Lyſimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vſed at the beginning of his letters, was not in them obſerued: To my ſon Pyrrus, health. But in thoſe counterfeit was, King Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus health. Whereupon he preſently pronounced Lyſimachus for a naughty man: neuertheleſſe, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be ſworne vpon the ſacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beaſts brought to be ſacrifiſed, a goate, a bull, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of himſelf before he was touched, whereat all the ſtanders by fell a laughing. But there was a Soothſayer, one Theodotus, that perſwaded Pyrrus not to ſweare: ſaying, that this ſigne and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings with ſudden death. For which cauſe Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres being ended, Demetrius notwithſtanding came to him, knowing well inough at his coming that Alexander had no more need of his aide, and that he did it onely but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but the one beganne to miſtruſt the other, and to ſpie all the waies they could to intrappe each other: but Demetrius embracing the firſt occaſion offered, preuented Alexander, and ſlue him, being a yong man, and proclaimed himſelfe king of MACEDON in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before againſt Pyrrus, becauſe he had ouerrun the country of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy couetouſneſſe to haue the more (which is a common vice with princes and noble men) made, that being ſo neare neighbours, the one ſtood in feare and miſtruſt of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betweene them, and were to make diuiſion of one ſelfe kingdome: now I ſay began the matter and occaſion of quarrell to grow the greater betweene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his army to ſet vpon the ÆTOLIANS, and hauing conquered the countrey, left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there with a great army: and himſelfe in perſon in the meane time marched againſt Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on the other ſide againſt him. They both miſſed of meeting, and Demetrius going on further on the one ſide, entred into the realme of EPIRVS, & brought a great ſpoile away with him: Pyrrus on the other ſide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gaue battell, & it was valiantly fought out betweene the ſouldiers of either party, but ſpecially betweene the two Generals. For doubtleſſe Pantauchus was the valianteſt captaine, the ſtouteſt man, and of the greateſt experience in armes, of al the captaines and ſouldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon Pantauchus truſting in his ſtrength and courage, aduanced himſelfe forwards, and luſtily challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other ſide being inferiour to no king in valiantneſſe, nor in deſire to win honour, as he that would aſcribe vnto himſelfe the glory of Achilles, more for the inuitation of his valiancie, then for that he was deſcended of his bloud: paſſed through the mideſt of the battell vnto the firſt ranke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, firſt with their darts, and then coming nearer, fought with their ſwords, not only artificially, but alſo with great force and furie: vntill ſuch time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two; the one neare vnto his throte, and the other in his leg: ſo as in the end Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground, but neuertheleſſe killed him not. For, ſo ſoone as he was downe, his men took him vp, & caried him away. But the EPIROTS encouraged by the victory of their king, and the admiration of his valiantnes, ſtucke to it ſo luſtily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and hauing put them to flight, followed them ſo liuely, that they ſlue a great number of them, and took fiue thouſand priſoners. This ouerthrow did not ſo much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the loſſe they had receiued, nor with the hate conceiued againſt Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantneſſe to be wondered at of all ſuch as were preſent at the battel that ſaw him fight, and how he layd about him. For they thought that they ſaw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the great, and the right ſhadow as it were, ſhewing the force and furie of Alexander himſelfe in that fight. And where other kings did but onely counterfeit Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of ſouldiers and guards about their perſons, and in a certaine faſhion and bowing of their necks a litle, and in vttering their ſpeech with an high voice: Pyrrus only was like vnto him, and followed him in his martiall deeds and valiant acts. Furthermore, for his experience & skill in warlike diſcipline, the bookes he wrote himſelfe thereof, do amply proue and make manifeſt. Furthermore, they report, that king Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greateſt Captaine: made anſwer, Pyrrus, ſo farre forth as he might liue to be old, ſpeaking onely of the captaines of his time. But Hannibal generally ſaid, Pyrrus was the greateſt captaine of experience and skill in wars of all other, Scipio the ſecond, and himſelfe the third: as we haue written in the life of Scipio. So it ſeemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and ſtudie to the diſcipline of warres, as that which indeed was princely & meete for a king, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feaſt one day, a queſtion was asked him, whom he thought to be the beſt player of the flute, Python or Cephiſius: whereunto he anſwered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the beſt captaine, as if he would haue ſaid, that was the only thing a prince ſhould ſeeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, eaſie to forgiue when any had offended him, and maruellous deſirous to requite & acknowledge any courteſie or pleaſure by him receiued. And that was the cauſe why he did very vnpatiently take the death of Æropus, not ſo much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to euery liuing creature) as for that he was angry with himſelfe he had deferred the time ſo long, that time it ſelfe had cut him off from all occaſion and meanes to requite the courteſies he had receiued of him. True it is, that mony lent may be repaied againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it grieueth an honeſt nature, when he cannot recompence the goodwill of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the good turne. Another time Pyrrus being in ỹ city of AMBRACIA, there were certaine of his friends that gaue him counſell to put a naughty man out of the city, that did nothing but ſpeake ill of him. But he anſwered: It is better (quoth he) to keepe him here ſtill, ſpeaking ill of vs but to a few, then driuing him away, to make him ſpeake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youths were brought before him on a time, who making merrie together, drinking freely, were bold with the king to ſpeake their pleaſure of him in very vndutiful ſort. So, Pyrrus asking them whether it was true they ſaid ſo, or no: It is true, and it pleaſe your grace, ſaid one of them, we ſaid it indeed, and had not our wine failed vs, we had ſpoken a great deale more. The King laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he maried many wiues to increaſe his power withall, and to get more friends. For he maried the daughter of Autoleon King of PÆONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillis, King of ILLYRIA, and Lanaſſa the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of SYRACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken.

By

By Antigona his firſt wife, he had a ſon called Ptolomie: by Lanaſſa another called Alexander: and by Eircenna, another (the yongeſt of all) called Helenus: all which though they were martiall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in wars, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradle. They write, that one of his ſonnes being but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus anſwered the boy, To him that hath the ſharpeſt ſword. That was much like the tragicall curſe wherewith Oedipus curſed his children:

Let them (for me) deuide, both goods, yea rents and land,
With trenchant ſword, and bloudy blowes, by force of mightie hand.

So cruell, hatefull, and beaſtly is the nature of ambition and deſire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his countrey, full of honour and glory, his heart highly exalted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTS his ſubiects called him an Eagle, he anſwered them: If I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am ſo, for your weapons are the kings wings that raiſed me vp. Shortly after, being aduertiſed that Demetrius was fallen ſicke, and in great danger of death, he ſuddenly went into MACEDON, onely to inuade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had indeed almoſt taken the whole realme, and made himſelf Lord of all without ſtroke ſtriken. For he came as far as the city of EDESSA, and found no reſiſtance: but rather to the contrary, many of the countrey willingly came to his campe, and ſubmitted themſelues. The danger Demetrius was in to loſe his Realme, did moue him more, then the diſeaſe and ſickneſſe of his body. And on the other ſide, his friends, ſeruants, and Captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in a maruellous ſhort time, marched with great ſpeed towards Pyrrus, being earneſtly bent to do ſome exploite againſt him: who being come in to MACEDON but to make a roade only vpon them, would not tarrie them, but fled, and flying, loſt part of his men, becauſe the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and ſet vpon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus eaſily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light account of him: but pretending greater things (as to recouer the lands and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thouſand fighting men, and of fiue hundred ſaile which he put to the ſea) would not ſtand to make warres againſt Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whilſt he was abſent) ſo dangerous a neighbour, and ſo ill to deale withall. But lacking leiſure to make wars with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more liberty ſet vpon the other kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrrus, the other kings and princes began to find out Demetrius intent, and why he had made ſo great preparation: and being affraid thereof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambaſſadours, that they wondered how he could let goe ſuch oportunity and occaſion, and to tary till Demetrius might with better leiſure make wars vpon him. And why he choſe rather to tary and fight with him for the altars, temples, ſepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he ſhould be of greater power, and haue no warres elſewhere to trouble him: then now that hee might eaſily driue him out of MACEDON, hauing ſo many things in hand, and being troubled as he was in other places. And conſidering alſo that very lately he had taken one of his wiues from him, with the city of CORPHVE. For Lanaſſa miſliking, that Pyrrus loued his other wiues better then her (they being of a barbarous nation) got her vnto CORPHVE: and deſiring to marie ſome other king, ſent for Demetrius, knowing that he of all other kings would ſooneſt be won thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and maried her, and left a garriſon in his city of CORPHVE. Now theſe other kings that did aduertiſe Pyrrus in this ſort, themſelues did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his preparation notwithſtanding. For on the one ſide Ptolomy entred GREECE with a great army by ſea, where he cauſed the cities to reuolt againſt him: and Lyſimachus on the other ſide alſo, entring into high MACEDON by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and ſpoiled all as he went. Pyrrus alſo arming himſelfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROA, imagining (as afterwards it fell out) that Demetrius going againſt Lyſimachus, would leaue all the low country of MACEDON naked, without garriſon or defence. And the ſelfe ſame night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that king Alexander the Great did call him, and alſo that he went vnto him, and found him ſicke in his bed, of whom he had very good words and entertainement: in ſo much as he promiſed to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined alſo that he was ſo bold to demand of him againe: How (my Lord) can you helpe me, that ly ſick in your bed? & that Alexander made anſwer: With my name only. And that moreouer he ſuddenly therwithall got vp on his horſe Niſea, and rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This viſion he had in his dreame, which made him bold, and furthermore encouraged him to go on with his enterpriſe. By which occaſion, marching forward with all ſpeed, in few dayes he ended his intended iourney to the city of BEROEA, which ſuddenly he tooke at his firſt coming to it: the moſt part of his army hee layed in garriſon there, the reſidue he ſent away vnder the conduct of his captaines, here & there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius hauing intelligence hereof, and hearing alſo an ill rumour that ran in his campe amongſt the MACEDONIANS, durſt not leade them any further, for feare leſt (when he ſhould come neare to Lyſimachus, being a MACEDONIAN king by nation, and a prince eſteemed for a famous captaine) they ſhould ſhrinke from him, and take Lyſimachus part: for this cauſe therefore he turned againe vpon the ſudden againſt Pyrrus, as againſt a ſtrange prince, & ill-beloued of the MACEDONIANS. But when he came to encampe neare him, many coming from BEROEA into his campe, blew abroad the praiſes of Pyrrus, ſaying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in wars, and one that curteouſly intreated all thoſe he tooke to his party: and amongſt theſe, there were other that were no naturall MACEDONIANS borne, but ſet on by Pyrrus, and fained themſelues to be MACEDONIAS, who gaue out, that now occaſion was offered to ſet them at liberty, from Demetrius proud & ſtately rule, & to take king Pyrrus part, that was a curteous prince, and one that loued ſouldiers and men of war. Theſe words made the moſt part of Demetrius army very doubtfull, in ſo much as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to ſee if they could find out Pyrrus to yeeld thēſelues vnto him. He had at that preſent left off his head-peece: by meane whereof, perceiuing he was not knowne, he put it on againe, and then they knew him afar off, by the ſight of his goodly faire plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the top of his creaſt. Wherupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as vnto their ſoueraigne lord & king, & required the watchword of him. Other put garlands of oken boughs about their heads, becauſe they ſay his men crowned after that ſort. And ſome were ſo bold alſo, as to go to Demetrius himſelfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he ſhould do very well and wiſely to giue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, ſeeing his campe in ſuch vprore, was ſo amazed, that he knew not what way to take, but ſtole away ſecretly, diſguiſed in a threed-bare cloke & a hood on his head to keep him from knowledge. Pyrrus foorthwith ſeazed vpon his campe, tooke all that he found, and was preſently proclaimed in the field, king of MACEDON. Lyſimachus on the other ſide, came ſtraight thither after him, and ſaid that he had holpen to chaſe Demetrius out of his Realme, and therefore claimed halfe the kingdome with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not truſting the MACEDONIANS too farre as yet, but rather ſtanding in doubt of their faith: granted Lyſimachus his deſire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the Realme of MACEDON betweene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that preſent, and ſtood then to good purpoſe to pacifie the warre, that otherwiſe might ſuddenly haue riſen betweene them. But ſhortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diſſention betweene them. For they whoſe audrice & vnſatiable greedy appetite, neither the ſea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable deſerts could containe, nor yet the confines that ſeparate ASIA from EVROPE determine: how ſhould they be content with their owne, without vſurping others, when their frontiers ioyne ſo neare together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not poſſible. For to ſay truly, they are willingly together by the eares, hauing theſe two curſed things rooted in them: that they continually ſeeke occaſion how to ſurpriſe each other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in appearance they vſe theſe two termes of peace and warre, as they do mony: vſing it as they thinke good, not according to right and iuſtice, but for their priuate profit. And truly they are men of far greater honeſty, that make open war, & auow it, then thoſe that diſguiſe & colour the delay of their wicked purpoſe, by the holy name of iuſtice or friendſhip. Which Pyrrus did truly then verifie. For deſiring to keepe Demetrius downe from riſing another time, and that he ſhould not reuiue againe, as eſcaped from a long dangerous diſeaſe: he went to aide the GRECIANS againſt him, and was at ATHENS, where they ſuffered him to come into the caſtle, and to do ſacrifice there vnto the goddeſſe Minerua. But coming out of the caſtle againe the ſame day, he told the A- ENIANS he was greatly beholding vnto them for their courteſie, and the great truſt they ha poſed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counſell, neuer to ſuffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they

they were wiſe,nor once open their gates vnto them. So after that he had made peace with Demetrius,who within ſhort time being gone to make wars in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perſwaded thereunto by Lyſimachus)cauſed all THESSALY to riſe againſt him,and went himſelf to ſet vpon thoſe garriſons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE,liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in war, then to leaue them in peace: beſides that, himſelfe alſo was of ſuch a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Dimetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowne in SYRIA, Lyſimachus ſeeing himſelf free from feare on that ſide,and being at good leiſure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwaies went ſtraight to make warre vpon Pyrrus, who then remained neare vnto the city of EDESSA, & meeting by the way with the conuoy of victuals coming towards him,ſet vpon the conducters,and rifled them wholly.By this meanes, firſt he diſtreſſed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters and meſſengers,declaring vnto them,what ſhame they ſuſtained to haue made a ſtranger their king(whoſe anceſtors had euer bin their vaſſals & ſubiects)and to haue turned all thoſe out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar friends of king Alexander the Great.Many of the MACEDONIANS were won by theſe perſwaſions: which fact ſo feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTS, and other his confederates: and ſo loſt MACEDON by the ſelfe ſame meanes he wan it.Kings and princes therfore muſt not blame priuate men, though they change and alter ſometime for their profit:for therein they do but follow the example of princes,who teach them al diſloyaltie,treaſon,& infidelity,iudging him moſt worthie of gaine, that leaſt obſerueth iuſtice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of EPIRVS, forſaking MACEDON altogether, Fortune made him happy inough,and indeed he had good meanes to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could haue contented himſelfe only with the ſoueraignty ouer his own naturall ſubiects. But thinking,that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to ſpend his time,and by peace he ſhould pine away for ſorrow,as Homer ſaid of Achilles:

He languiſhed and pin'd by taking eaſe and reſt:
And in the warres where trauell was,he liked euer beſt.

Lyſimachus maketh war with Pyrrus.

And thus ſeeking matter of new trouble,Fortune preſented him this occaſion. About this time, the ROMAINES by chance made warre with the TARENTINES, who could neither beare their force, nor yet deuiſe how to pacifie the ſame, by reaſon of the raſhneſſe,folly,and wickedneſſe of their gouernors, who perſwaded them to make Pyrrus Generall, and to ſend for him for to conduct theſe warres: becauſe he was leſſe troubled at that time, then any of the other kings about them,and was eſteemed of euery man alſo to be a noble ſouldier,and famous captaine. The elders and wiſe men of the city,vtterly miſliked that counſell: but ſome of them were put to ſilence,through the noiſe and fury of the people, who cried for warres. Some other ſeeing them checked,and taken vp by the multitude in this maner,would no more repaire to their common aſſemblies. Among the reſt, there was one Meton,an honeſt worſhipfull citizen, who when the day was come that the people ſhould conclude in coũcel, the decree for the calling in of Pyrrus: all the people of TARENTVM being aſſembled, and ſet in the Theater, this Meton put an old withered garland of flowers vpon his head,and carying a torch in his hand as though he had bin drunke,and hauing a woman minſtrell before him playing on a pipe,went dancing in this goodly aray through the middeſt of the whole aſſembly. And there (as it happeneth commonly in euery hurly burly of people that will be maiſters themſelues,and where no good order is kept) ſome of them clapped their hands, other burſt out in a laughter,and euery man ſuffered him to do what he luſt: but they all cried out to the woman minſtrell, to play and ſpare not, and to Meton himſelfe,that he ſhould ſing and come forward.So Meton made ſhew as though he prepared himſelf vnto it: and when they had giuen ſilence to heare him ſing,he ſpake vnto them with a loud voice in this maner:My Lords of TARENTVM,ye do wel ſure,not to forbid them to play and to be merry that are ſo diſpoſed,whileſt they may lawfully do it:and if ye be wiſe,euery of you alſo(as many as you be)wil take your liberty whileſt you may enioy it.For when king Pyrrus ſhall be in this city,you ſhall liue I warrant you after another ſort,& not as ye now do.Theſe words of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES,and ſuddenly there ran a rumor through all the aſſembly,that he had ſaid truly.But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made,that they ſhould be deliuered into their hands,they checked the people,asking them if they were ſuch fooles,as would abide to be mocked & played withall to their teeth:and with those words al ranne vpon Meton and draue him out of the Theater. The decree thus confirmed by voices of the people, they sent Ambassadors into EPIRVS, to cary presents vnto king Pyrrus, not only from the TARENTINES, but from other GRECIANS also that dwelt in ITALY, saying that they stood in need of a wise and skilfull captaine, that was reputed famous in martiall discipline. And as to the rest, for numbers of good souldiers, they had men inough in ITALY, and were able to bring an army into the field, of the LVCANIANS, the MESSAPIANS, the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thousand horse, and three hundred thousand footmen being al assembled together. These words of the Ambassadors did not only lift vp Pyrrus heart, but made the EPIROTS also maruellous desirous to go this iourney. There was in King Pyrrus court one Cineas THESSALIAN, a man of great vnderstanding, and that had bene Demosthenes the orators scholer, who seemed to be the only man of all other in his time in common reputation, to be most eloquent, following the liuely image and shadow of Demosthenes passing eloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus euer entertained about him, and sent him Ambassador to the people and cities thereabouts: where he verified Euripides words:

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty hand may do,
So much can skill of eloquence, atchieue and conquer to.

And therfore Pyrrus would often say, that Cineas had won him more towns with his eloquence, then he himselfe had done by the sword: for which he did greatly honor & imploy him in al his chiefe affaires. Cineas perceiuing that Pyrrus was maruellously bent to these wars of ITALY,

Cineas graue talke with Pyrrus, to moderate his ambitious mind.

finding him one day at leisure, discoursed with him in this sort: It is reported, and it please your maiesty, that the ROMAINES are very good men of war, and that they command many valiant and warlike nations: if it please the gods we do ouercome them, what benefit shal we haue of that victory? Pyrrus answered him againe, Thou dost aske me a question that is manifest of it selfe: for when we haue once ouercome the ROMAINES, there can neither GRECIAN nor barbarous city in all the countrey withstand vs, but we shall straight conquer all the rest of ITALY with ease: whose greatnesse, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then my selfe. Cineas pawsing a while, replied: And when we haue taken ITALY, what shall we do then? Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, said vnto him: SICILIA, as thou knowest, is hard ioyning to it, and doth as it were offer it selfe vnto vs, and is a maruellous populous and rich land, and easie to be taken: for all the cities within the Iland are one against another, hauing no head that gouernes them since Agathocles died, more then orators only that are their counsellors, who will soone be won. Indeed it is likely which your grace speaketh, quoth Cineas: but when we haue won SICILIA, will then our wars take end? If the gods were pleased, said Pyrrus, that ỹ victory were atchieued, the way were then broad open for vs to attaine great conquests. For who would not afterwards go into AFRICKE, and so to CARTHAGE, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agathocles secretly flying from SYRACVSA, and hauing passed the seas with a few ships, had almost taken it? And that once conquered, it is most certaine there durst not one of all our enemies that now do daily vexe and trouble vs, lift vp their heads or hands against vs. No surely, said Cineas: for it is a cleare case, that with so great a power we may easily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, & command all GRECE besides, without let of any. But when we haue all in our hands, what shall we do in the end? Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe: We will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our ease, and make feasts euery day, & be as merry one with another as we can possible. Cineas hauing brought him to that point, said, againe to him: My Lord, what letteth vs now to be quiet, and merry together, sith we enioy that presently without further trauell & trouble, which we wil now go seeke for abroad, with such shedding of bloud, & so manifest danger? and yet we know not whether euer we shall attaine vnto it, after we haue both suffered, and caused other to suffer infinite sorrowes and trouble. These last words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his mind: for he was not ignorant of the happy state he should thereby forgo, yet could he not leaue off the hope of that he did so much desire. So he sent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thousand footemen: and afterwards the TARENTINES hauing sent him great store of flat-bottomes, gallies, and of all sorts of passengers, he shipped into them twenty Elephants, three thousand horsemen, and two and twenty thousand footemen, with fiue hundred bowmen and slings. All which thus ready, he weighed ankers, and hoised sails, and was no sooner in the maine sea, but the North wind blew very roughly, out of season, and draue him to leeward. Notwithstanding, the ship which he was in himselfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windward, and with much ado, and maruellous dangers recouered the coaſt of ITALY. Howbeit the reſt of his fleete were violently diſperſed here and there, whereof ſome of them failing in their courſe to ITALY, were caſt into the ſeas of LYBIA, and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the point of APVLIA, were benighted, and the ſea being high wrought, by violence caſt them vpon the ſhore, and againſt the rockes, and made ſhipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reſerued, which through her ſtrength, and the greatneſſe of her burthen, reſiſted the force of the ſea that moſt violētly beate againſt her. But afterwards, the wind turning and coming from the land, the ſea cruelly raging ouer the height of her forecaſtell, in fine brought her in manifeſt perill of opening, and ſplitting, and in danger to be driuen from the coaſt, putting her out againe to the mercie of the winds, which changed euery howre. Wherefore Pyrrus caſting the perill euery way, thought beſt to leape into the ſea. After him foorthwith leapt his guard, his ſeruants, & other his familiar friends, venturing their liues to ſaue him. But the darkneſſe of the night, and rage of the waues (which the ſhore breaking, forced ſo to rebound back vpon them) with the great noiſe alſo, did ſo hinder their ſwimming, that it was euen day before they could recouer any land, and yet was it by meanes that the wind fell. As for Pyrrus, he was ſo ſea-beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more: though of himſelfe he had ſo great a heart and ſtout a courage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (vpon whoſe coaſt the ſtorme had caſt him) ran out to helpe him, and diligently laboured in all they could poſſible to ſaue him, and receiued alſo certaine of his ſhips that had ſcaped, in which were a few horſemen, about two thouſand footemen, and two Elephants. With this ſmall force, Pyrrus marched on his iourney to goe by land vnto TARENTVM: and Cineas being aduertiſed of his coming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the firſt he would do nothing by force, nor againſt the goodwill of the inhabitants: vntill ſuch time as his ſhips that had eſcaped the dangers of the ſea, were all arriued, and the greateſt part of his army come together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, ſeeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither ſaue themſelues, nor be ſaued by any other, without ſtraight order and compulſion, becauſe they made their reckoning that Pyrrus ſhould fight for them, and in the meane time they would not ſtirre out of their houſes from bathing themſelues, from banqueting, and making good cheere: firſt of all he cauſed all the parks and places of ſhew to be ſhut vp, where they were wont to walke and diſport thēſelues, in any kind of exerciſe, & as they walked to talke of wars as it were in paſtime, and to fight with words, but not to come to the blows. And further he forbad al feaſtings, mummeries, and ſuch other like pleaſures, as at that time were out of ſeaſon. He trained them out alſo to exerciſe their weapons, and ſhewed himſelf very ſeuere in muſters, not pardoning any whoſe names were billed to ſerue in the warres: inſomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with ſuch rough handling & gouernment) forſooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleaſure. Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuinus the ROMAINE Conſull came againſt him with a great puiſſant army, and that he was already entred into the land of LVCANIA, where he deſtroyed and ſpoiled all the countrey before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederates, was not as yet come, he thought it a great ſhame to ſuffer his enemies approach ſo neare him, & therfore taking that ſmal number he had, brought them into the field againſt Leuinus. Howbeit he ſent an Herald before to the ROMAINES, to vnderſtand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be cōtent the controuerſies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by iuſtice, and therein to refer themſelues to his arbiterment, who of himſelf wold vndertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Conſull Leuinus made anſwer, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a Iudge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherfore Pyrrus going on ſtill, came to lodge in the plaine which is betweene the cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: and hauing newes brought him that the ROMAINES were encamped very neare vnto him on the other ſide of the riuer of SIRIS, he tooke his horſe, and rode to the riuers ſide to view their campe. So hauing throughly conſidered the forme, the ſituation, and the order of the ſame, the maner of charging their watch, and all their faſhions of doing: he wondered much thereat. And ſpeaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he ſaid: This order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarouſly done, but we ſhal ſhortly proue their force. After he had thus taken his view, he began to be more carefull then he was before, and purpoſed to tary till

the whole aide of their confederates were come together, leauing men at the riuers side of Siris, to keepe the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe ouer, as they did indeed. For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footmen ouer vpon a bridge, and their horsemen at diuerse fords of the riuer: insomuch as the Grecians fearing lest they should be compassed in behind, drew backe. Pyrrus aduertised thereof, and being a litle troubled therewithall, commanded the Captaines of his footmen presently to put their bands in battell ray, and not to stirre till they knew his pleasure: and he himself in the meane time marched on with three thousand horse, in hope to find the Romaines by the riuer side, as yet out of order, and vtterly vnprouided. But when he saw afarre off a great number of footmen with their targets ranged in battell, on this side the riuer, and their horsemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to ioyne close together, and himselfe first began the charge, being easie to be knowne from other, if it had bene no more but his passing rich glistering armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deeds gaue manifest proofe of his well deseruing fame and renowne. For, though he valiantly bestirred his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgat not himselfe, nor neglected the iudgement and foresight, which should neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discreetly gaue order for euery thing, riding to & fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places, where he saw them in most distresse. But euen in the hottest of the battell, Leonatus Macedonian spied an Italian a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vp and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hand with him, to set vpon him. Wherfore he said to Pyrrus: My Lord, do you not see that barbarous man there vpō a bay horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he meant to do some notable feate and mischiefe with his owne hands: for his eye is neuer off you, but waiteth only vpon you, being sharpe set to deale with your selfe and none other, and therefore take heed of him. Pyrrus answered him, It is impossible Leonatus, for a man to auoid his destiny: but neither he nor any other Italian whatsoeuer, shall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter, the Italian taking his speare in the middest, and setting spurs to his horse, charged vpon Pyrrus, and ran his horse through and through with the same. Leonatus at the selfe same instant serued the Italians horse in the like maner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, saued him presently, and slue the Italian in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The Italians name was Oplacus, borne in the city of Brentvm, and was Captaine of a band of men of armes. This mischance made King Pyrrus looke the better to himselfe afterwards, and seeing his horsemen giue back, sent presently to hasten his footemen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and deliuering his armour and cloake to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Megacles armor, returned againe to the battel against the Romaines, who valiātly resisted him, so that the victory depended long in doubt: for it is said, that both the one side and the other did chase, and was chased, aboue seuen times in that conflict. The changing of the Kings armour serued very well for the safety of his own person, howbeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him lose the field. For many of his enemies set vpon Megacles, that wore the kings armor: and the party that slue him dead, and threw him starke to the ground, was one Dexius by name, who quickly snatched off his head-peece, took away his cloake, & ran to Leuinus the Consull, crying out aloud, that he had slaine Pyrrus, and withall shewed forth the spoiles he supposed to haue taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, and openly shewed from hād to hand, made the Romaines maruellous ioyfull, and the Grecians on the contrary, both afeard and right sorrowfull: vntill such time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed along all his bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding vp his hand to his souldiers, and giuing them to vnderstand with his owne voice, that it was himselfe. The Elephants in the end were they indeed that wan the battell, and did most distresse the Romaines: for, their horses seeing them afarre off, were sore afraid, and durst not abide them, but caried their masters backe in despite of them. Pyrrus at the sight thereof, made his Thessalian horsemen to giue charge vpon them whilest they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the Romaines flie, and sustaine great slaughter. For Dionysius writeth, that there died few lesse, then fifteene thousand Romaines at that battell. But Hieronymus speaketh onely of seuen thousand. And of Pyrrus side, Dionysius writeth, there were slaine thirteene thousand. But Hieronymus saith, lesse then foure foure thousand: howbeit they were al of the best men of his army, and those whom he most trusted. King Pyrrus presently hereupon also tooke the Romaines campe, which they forsooke, & wan many of their cities from their alliance, spoiled and ouercame much of their country. In so much as he came within sixe & thirty miles of Rome, whither came to his aide, as confederates of the Tarentines, the Lvcanians, and Samnites, whom he rebuked because they came too late to the battell. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proud to haue ouerthrowne so great an army of the Romaines with his owne men, and the aide of the Tarentines onely. On the other side, the Romaines hearts were so great, that they would not depose Leuinus from his Consulship, notwithstanding the losse he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius sayd openly, that they were not the Epirots that had ouercome the Romaines, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this ouerthrow chanced vnto them, more through the subtilty and wise conduction of the Generall, then through the valiant feates and worthinesse of his army. And hereupon they speedily supplied their legions againe that were diminished, with other new souldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a fresh force besides, speaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whose hearts were nothing appalled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelling much, thought good first to send to the Romaines, to proue if they would giue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the city of Rome was no easie matter to compasse or attaine, with that strength he presently had: and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this valiant victory. And hereupon he sent Cineas to Rome, who spake with the chiefest of the city, and offered presents to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his master. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his hands, but answered all with one voice: That if the peace might be generall to all, they all priuatly would be at the kings commandement, and would be glad of his friendship. Moreouer, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to giue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their prisoners home againe without ransome, that had beene taken at the battell, and promised also to aide them in the conquest of Italie, requiring no other recompence at their hands sauing their goodwils onely to his master, and assurance for the Tarentines, that they should not be annoyed for any thing past, without demand of other matter. Neuertheless in the end, when they had heard these offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already lost a great battel, and how they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of Italie, should ioyne together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor dealt in matters of state at all by reason of his age, and partly because he was blind, when he vnderstood of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common bruite that ranne through the city, how the Senate were in mind to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his seruants to carie him in his chaire vpon their armes vnto the Senate doore, his sonnes, and sonnes in law taking him in their armes, caried him into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honour the coming in of so notable and worthy personage: and he so soone as they had set him in his seate, began to speake in this sort: Hitherunto with great impatience (my Lords of Rome) haue I borne the losse of my sight, but now, I would I were also deafe as I am blind, that I might not (as I do) heare the report of your dishonourable consultations determined vpon in Senate, which tend to subuert the glorious fame and reputation of Rome. What is now become of all your great and mighty bragges you blazed abroad through the whole world? That if Alexander the great himselfe had come into Italy, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not haue said euery where that he was altogether inuincible, as now at this present they do: but either he should haue left his body slaine here in battell, or at the leastwise haue bene driuen to flie, and by his death or flying should greatly haue enlarged the renowne and glory of Rome. You plainely shew it now, that all these words spoken then, were but vaine and arrogant vaunts of foolish pride: considering that you tremble for feare of the Molossians & Chaonians, who were euer a prey to the Macedonians: and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus also, who all his life time serued and followed one of the gard vnto Alexander the Great, and now is come to make wars in these parts, not to aide the

to the Senate, euery one through the whole aſſembly, deſired rather war then peace. They diſ-patched Cineas away thereupon with this anſwer, that if Pyrrus ſought the ROMAINES friendſhip, he muſt firſt depart out of ITALY, and then ſend vnto them to treate of peace: but ſo long as he remained there with his army, the ROMAINES would make war vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowne and ſlaine ten thouſand ſuch captaines as Leuinus was. They ſay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intrea-ting for their peace, did curiouſly labour to conſider & vnderſtand the maners, order, and life of which was in old time in the mariſhes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut of one head, ſeuen other came vp in the place: becauſe the Conſul Leuinus had now leauied another army, twiſe as great as the firſt was, and had left at ROME alſo, many times as many good able men to carrie armour. After this, there were ſent Ambaſſadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongſt other, Caius Fabricius, Ambaſſador to Pyrrus. Caius Fabricius, touching the ſtate of priſoners. Cineas told the king his maſter, that this Fabricius was one of the greateſt men of account in ROME, a right honeſt man, a good captaine, and a feare him, becauſe he had neuer ſeene Elephant before, Pyrrus commanded his men, that when they ſaw Fabricius and him talking together, they ſhould bring one of his greateſt Elephants, and ſet him hard by them, behind a hanging: which being done, at a certaine ſigne by Pyrrus gi-uen, ſuddenly the hanging was pulled backe, and the Elephant with his trunke was ouer Fabri-cius head, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius ſoftly giuing backe, nothing afraid, laughed, and ſayd to Pyrrus ſmiling: Neither did your gold (oh king) yeſterday moue me, nor your Elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileſt they were at ſupper, falling in talke of diuerſe matters, ſpecially touching the ſtate of GREECE, and the Philoſophers there: Cineas by how they fled from all office and publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of al pleaſures and delights, without taking any regard of mens doings. But as he ſtill continued this diſcourſe, Fabricius cryed out aloud, and ſayd: The gods grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of ſuch opinions, as long as they had warres a-gainſt vs. Pyrrus maruelling much at the conſtancy and magnanimity of this man, was more deſirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And priuatly prayed Fabricius very earneſtly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come & reand deliuered him vpon his faith onely, all the ROMAINE priſoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet ſee their friends, and keepe the feaſt of Saturne with them, and then to ſend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate eſtabliſhed by decree, vpon paine of death to all ſuch as ſhould not performe the ſame accordingly. Afterwards Fabricius was choſen Conſul, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from king Pyrrus Phyſition, written with his owne hands: in which the Phyſition offered to poyſon his maſter, ſo he would promiſe him a good reward, for ending the warres without further danger. Fabricius deteſting the wickednesſe of the Phyſition, and hauing made Q. Æmylius his colleague and fellow Conſull alſo to abhorre the ſame: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heed, for there were that meant to poyſon him. The contents of his letter were theſe: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Æmilius Conſuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (ô king) made vnfortunate choiſe, both of your friends and of your enemies, as ſhall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for you make wars with iuſt and honeſt men, and do your ſelfe truſt altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therfore we haue thought good to aduertiſe you, not in reſpect to pleaſure you, but for feare leſt the misfortune of your death might make vs vniuſtly to be accuſed: imagining that by treacherie or treaſon, we haue ſought to end this war, as though by valiantneſſe we could not otherwiſe atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing read this letter, and proued the contents thereof true, executed the Phyſition as he had deſerued: and to requite the aduertiſement of the Conſuls, he ſent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their priſoners, without paying of ranſome, and ſent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit the ROMAINES, becauſe they would neither receiue pleaſure of their enemies, & leaſt of al reward, for that they conſented not vnto ſo wicked a deed: did not onely refuſe to take their priſoners of free gift, but they ſent him againe ſo many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendſhip, they would giue no eare to it, before the wars were ended, and that he had ſent away his army againe by ſea, into his kingdom of EPIRVS. Wherfore Pyrrus ſeeing no remedy, but that he muſt needs fight another battel, after he had ſomewhat refreſhed his army, drew towards the city of ASCVLVM, where he fought the ſecond time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into a maruellous ill ground for horſemen, by a very ſwift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deep mariſhes, inſomuch as his Elephants could haue no ſpace nor ground to ioyne with the battell of the footmen, by reaſon wherof there was a great nũber of men hurt & ſlaine on both ſides. And in the end, the battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did ſeuer thẽ: but the next morning, Pyrrus to win the aduantage to fight in the plain field, where he might preuaile with the force of his Elephants, ſent firſt certaine of his bands to ſeize vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thruſt in amongſt his Elephants, ſtore of ſhot & ſlingmen, and then made his army march (being very well ſet in order) with great fury againſt his enemies. They miſſing the other dayes turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine field: and ſtriuing to breake into the battel of Pyrrus footmen before the Elephants came, they deſperatly preaſed in vpon their enemies pikes with their ſwords, not caring for their own perſons what became of them, but only looked to kill & deſtroy their enemies. In the end notwithſtanding, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES loſt it, and they firſt began to breake and flie on that ſide that Pyrrus was, by reaſon of the great force and fury of his charge, and much more through the violence of the Elephants: againſt which, the ROMAINES valiantneſſe nor courage could ought preuaile, but that they were driuen to giue thẽ place (much like the rage of ſurging waues, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to be troden vnder feete, and ouerthrowne by them, whom they were not able to hurt againe, but bee by them moſt grieuouſly martyred, & their troubles therby yet nothing eaſed. The chaſe was not long, becauſe they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that there died ſix thouſand men of the ROMAINS, and of Pyrrus part about three thouſand fiue hundred and fiue, as the kings owne Chronicles doe witneſſe. Neuertheleſſe, Dionyſius makes no mention of two battels giuen neare vnto the city of ASCVLVM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainely ouerthrowne: howbeit he affirmeth that there was one battell onely that continued vnto Sunne ſet, and that they ſcarcely ſeuered alſo when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurt on the arme with a ſpeare, and his cariage robbed and ſpoyled by the SAMNITES beſides.

Pyrrus victory of the Romaines.

The writers agree not about Pyrrus battell.

And further, that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thousand men, as well of Pyrrus side, as of the ROMAINES part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who reioyced with him for the victory they had wonne: If we win another of the price, quoth he, we are vtterly vndone. For indeed then had he lost the most part of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his friends and captaines in manner euery one, or at the least there lacked litle of it: and besides that, he had no meanes to supply them with other from thence, and perceiued also that the confederates he had in ITAY, began to waxe cold. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did easily renew their army with fresh souldiers, which they caused to come from ROME as need required (much like vnto a liuely spring, the head whereof they had at home in their countrey) and they fainted not at all for any losses they receiued, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, stoutly determining to abide out the warres, what euer betide. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this sort, new hopes and new enterprises were offered vnto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For euen at a clap came Ambassadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his hands, the cities of SYRACVSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, beseeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrants. And on the other side also, newes was brought him from GREECE, how Ptolomie surnamed the Lightning, was slaine, and al his army ouerthrowne in battel against the GAVLES, and that now he should come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he cursed his hard fortune, that presented him all at once, such sundrie occasions to doe great things: and as if both enterprises had bene already in his hand, he made his account that of necessity he must lose one of them. So, long debating the matter with himselfe, which of the two waies he should conclude vpon: in the end he resolued, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, considering that AFRICKE was not far from them. Wherefore, disposing himselfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to speake to the townes and cities of the countrey, as he was wont to do: and in the meane time left a strong garrison in the city of TARENTVM, to keepe it at his deuotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made request vnto him, either to remaine in their country to maintaine wars with them against the ROMAINES (which was their meaning why they sent for him) or else if he would needs go, at the least wise to leaue their city in as good state as he found it. But he answered them againe very roughly that they should speake no more to him in it, and that they should not chuse but obey his occasion. And with this answer he tooke ship, and sailed towards SICILIA: where so soone as he was arriued, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingly put themselues into his hands. And where necessity of battell was offered him to employ his army, nothing at the beginning could stand before him. For, with thirtie thousand footmen, two thousand fiue hundred horsemen, and two hundred saile which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the country vnder their obedience. Now at that time, the city of ERIX was the strongest place they had: and there were a great number of good souldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to proue the assault of it, and when his army was ready to giue the charge, he armed himself at all peeces from top to toe, & approching the wals, vowed vnto Hercules to giue him a solemne sacrifice, with a feast of common playes, so that he would grant him grace to shew himselfe vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble ancestours from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his hands. This vow ended, he straight made the trumpets sound to the assault, and caused the barbarous people that were on the walles, to retire with force of his shot. Then when the scaling ladders were set vp, himselfe was the first that mounted on the wall, where he found diuerse of the barbarous people that resisted him. But some he threw ouer the walls on either side of him, & with his sword slue many dead about him, himselfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenãce was so terrible. And this doth proue that Homer spake wisely, and like a man of experience, when he said: that valiantnesse onely amongst all other morall vertues, is that which hath sometimes certaine furious motions, and diuine prouocations, which makes a man besides himselfe. So the city being taken, he honourably performed his vowed sacrifice to Hercules, and kept a feast of all kinds and sorts of games & weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GRECIANS thereabouts, abouts making many of them pay taxe and tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good ſouldiers, and had their name alſo of Mars, becauſe they were martiall men, and giuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army againſt them, and ouerthrew them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the taxe, & razed many of their fortreſſes. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendſhip, offering him ſhips and money, pretending greater matters, he made them a ſhort anſwer: That there was but one way to make peace and loue betweene them, to forſake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GREECE and them. For this good fortune, and the force he had in his hands, did ſet him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aſpiring firſt of all vnto the conqueſt of LYBIA. Now, to paſſe him ouer thither he had ſhips inough, but he lacked owers and mariners: wherefore when he would preſſe them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and ſeuerely puniſhed them, that would not obey his commandement. This he did not at his firſt coming, but contrarily had won all their good wils, ſpeaking more courteouſly to them then any other did, and ſhewing that he truſted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But ſodainely being altred from a popular prince, vnto a violēt tyrant, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worſt of all is, vnfaithfull and vngratefull: neuertheleſſe, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they ſuffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demand. But when they ſaw he began to miſtruſt Thænon and Soſtratus, the two chiefe captaines of SYRACVSA, and they who firſt cauſed him to come into SICILIA, who alſo at his firſt ariuall deliuered the city of SYRACVSA into his hands, and had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compaſſe that he had done in SICILIA: when, I ſay, they ſaw he would no more carrie them with him, nor leaue them behind him for the miſtruſt he had of them, and that Soſtratus fled from him, and abſented himſelfe, fearing leſt Pyrrus would doe him ſome miſchiefe: and that Pyrrus moreouer, had put Thænon to death, miſtruſting that he would alſo haue done him ſome harme, then all things fell out againſt Pyrrus: not one after another, nor by little and little, but altogether at one inſtant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe ſome of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to ſet vpon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent againſt him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES and TARENTINES, by which they aduertiſed him, how they had much ado to defend themſelues within their cities and ſtrong holds, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherefore they earneſtly beſought him ſpeedily to come to their aide. This newes came happily to him, to cloake this flying, that he might ſay it was not for deſpaire of good ſucceſſe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was indeed, that when he ſaw he could no longer keepe it, then a ſhip could ſtand ſtill among the waues, he ſought ſome honeſt ſhadow to colour his departing. And that ſurely was the cauſe why he returned againe into ITALY. Neuertheleſſe, at his departure out of SICILE, they ſay that looking backe vpon the Ile, he ſaid to thoſe that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell (my friends) do we leaue to the ROMAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other? And verily ſo it fell out ſhortly after, as he had ſpoken. But the barbarous people conſpiring together againſt Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one ſide watching his paſſage, gaue him battell on the ſea, in the very ſtraight it ſelfe of MESSINA, where he loſt many of his ſhips, and fled with the reſt, and tooke the coaſt of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other ſide, being gone thither before to the number of eighteene thouſand fighting men, durſt not preſent him battell in open field, but tarried for him in certaine ſtraights of the mountaines, and in very hard places, and ſo ſet vpon his rereward, and diſordered all his armie. They ſlue two of his Elephants, and cut off a great number of his rereward, ſo as he was compelled himſelfe in perſon to come from his vantgard, to helpe them againſt the barbarous people, which were luſtie valiant men, and old trained ſouldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a ſword, and was in great danger: inſomuch as he was forced to retire out of the preaſe and fight: which did ſo much the more encourage his enemies: amongſt which there was one more aduenturous then the reſt, a goodly man of perſonage, faire armed in white armour, who aduancing himſelfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bold fierce voice, and challenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this brauerie, turned againe with his guard, in ſpite of his men, hurt as he was. And beſides that, he was all on a fire with choler, and his face all bloudie

and terrible to behold, he went through his men, & came at the length to his barbarous villaine that had challenged him: and gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with all his force & power, that what by the ſtrength of his arme, and through the goodneſſe of the temper and mettall of the ſword, the blow claue his head right in the middeſt, downe to the ſhoulders: ſo that his head being thus deuided, the one part fel on the one ſhoulder, and the other part on the other. This matter ſuddenly ſtaied the barbarous people, and kept them from going any further, they were ſo afraid and amazed, to ſee ſo great a blow with ones hand, and it made them thinke indeede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iourney, arriued at the length in the city of TARENTVM, with twentie thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſe. And with theſe (ioyning thereto the choiſeſt men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to ſeeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within their territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard ſtate: for their hearts were killed, becauſe that in many battels and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were euer ouerthrowne. They were very angry beſides with Pyrrus, for that he had forſaken them, to go his voyage into SICILIA, by reaſon whereof there came no great number of ſouldiers into his campe. But notwithſtanding, he deuided all his ſtrength into two parts, whereof he ſent the one part into LVCANIA, to occupie one of the ROMAINE Conſuls that was there, to the end he ſhould not come to aide his companion: and with the other part he went himſelfe againſt Manius Curius, who lay in a very ſtrange place of aduantage, neare to the city of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that ſhould come to him out of LVCANIA, beſides alſo that the Soothſayers (by the ſignes and tokens of the birds and ſacrifices) did counſell him not to ſtirre from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, deſiring to fight with Manius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of LVCANIA, tooke with him the beſt ſouldiers he had in all his army, and the warlikeſt Elephants, and marched away in the night, ſuppoſing to ſteale vpon Manius on the ſudden, and giue an aſſault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to go, and through a wooddy countrey, his lights and torches failed him, by reaſon whereof many of his ſouldiers loſt their way, and they loſt a great deale of time alſo, before they could againe be gathered together: ſo as in this ſpace the night was ſpent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceiued plainely how he came downe the hils. This at the firſt ſight made them muſe awhile, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheleſſe Manius hauing had the ſignes of the ſacrifices fauourable, and ſeeing that occaſion did preſſe him to it, went out into the field, and ſet vpon the voward of his enemies, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the reſt in ſuch wiſe, that there were ſlaine a great number of them in the field, and certaine Elephants alſo taken. This victory made Manius Curius leaue his ſtrength and come into the plaine field, where he ſet his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one ſide: but on the other he was repulſed by violence of the Elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to guard it. So when he ſaw them vpon the rampiers of his campe all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they coming freſh out of the places of aduantage, to charge vpon the Elephants, compelled them in a very ſhort time to turne their backes, and flie through their own men, whom they put to great trouble and diſorder: ſo as in the end, the whole victory fell vpon the ROMAINES ſide, and conſequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatneſſe and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES being growne more couragious by this battell, and hauing increaſed their force and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable, immediatly after conquered all ITALIE beſides, and ſoone after that, all SICILIA. To this end (as you ſee) came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE and SICILIA, after he had ſpent ſixe yeares continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, and his army conſumed. Notwithſtanding, his noble courage remained alwaies inuincible, what loſſes ſoeuer he had ſuſtained: and moreouer whileſt he liued, he was euer eſteemed the chiefeſt of all the kings and princes in his time, as well for his experience and ſufficiency in warres, as alſo for his valiantneſſe and hardineſſe of his perſon. But what he wanne by famous deeds, he loſt by vaine hopes: deſiring ſo earneſtly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice-player, that caſteth well, and cannot vſe his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into EPIRVS, eight thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuiſed with himſelfe to ſeeke out ſome new warre

war to entertaine thoſe ſouldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a new aide of certaine GAVLES being come vnto him, he entred into the realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius ſonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a forrey, and to get ſome ſpoile in the country. But when he ſaw that he had taken diuerſe holds, and moreouer, that two thouſand men of warre of the country came and yeelded themſelues vnto him, he began to hope of better ſucceſſe, then at the firſt he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched againſt king Antigonus ſelfe, whom he met in a very ſtraight valley, and at his firſt comming, gaue ſuch a luſtie charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus army in great diſorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his army to cloſe it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valiantly defend the firſt charge: and the skirmiſh was ſo hot, that the moſt of them were ſlaine. After them the leaders of the Elephants perceiuing they were enuironed on euery ſide, yeelded themſelues and their beaſts. Pyrrus ſeeing his power to be now increaſed, with ſuch a ſupply, truſting more to his good fortune, then any good reaſon might moue him: thruſt further into the battel of the MACEDONIANS, who were al afraid, and troubled for the ouerthrow of their rereward, ſo as they could not once baſe their pikes, nor fight againſt him. He for his part holding vp his hand, and calling the captaines of the bands by their names, ſtraightwaies made all the footmen of Antigonus turne wholly to his ſide: who flying ſaued himſelf with a few horſemen, & kept certaine of the cities in his realme vpon the ſea coaſt. But Pyrrus in all his proſperity iudging nothing more to redound to his honor and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aſide their goodlieſt and richeſt ſpoiles, and offered vp the ſame in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inſcription:

Pyrrus victory of Antigonus king of Macedon.

Antigonus flieth from king Pyrrus.

When Pyrrus had ſubdu'd, the puiſſant Gaules in fields,
He cauſed of their ſpoiles to make, theſe targets, armes and ſhields:
The which he hanged vp, in temple all on high,
Before Minerua (goddeſſe here) in ſigne of victorie:
When he had ouercome, the whole and hugie hoaſt,
The which Antigonus did bring, into his countries coaſt.
Ne maruell ſhould it ſeeme, though victorie he wonne,
Since valiantneſſe brings victorie, and euermore hath done:
And valiantneſſe alwaies, hath conſtantly kept place,
From age to age, and time to time, in Æacus his race.

Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yeelded vnto him: but when he had the city of ÆGES in his power, he vſed the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & ſpecially becauſe he left a great garriſon of the GAVLES there, which he had in pay. This nation is extreme couetous, as then they ſhewed themſelues: for they ſpared not to breake vp the tombes wherein the kings of MACEDON lay buried, and tooke away all the gold and ſiluer they could find: and afterwards with great inſolency caſt out their bones into the open wind. Pyrrus was told it, but he lightly paſſed it ouer, and made no reckoning of it: either becauſe he deferred it till another time, by reaſon of the wars he had then in hand: or elſe for that he durſt not meddle with puniſhing of theſe barbarous people at that time. But whatſoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things ſure in MACEDON, not being fully poſſeſt of the ſame: new toyes and hopes came in his head, and (mocking Antigonus) ſaid he was a mad man to go apparelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloake might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of SPARTA being come to procure him to bring his army into the countrie of LACEDÆMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the bloud royall of SPARTA, but becauſe he was a cruell man, and would do all things by authority, they loued him not at SPARTA, nor truſted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, & made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldeſt quarrell Cleonymus had againſt the commonwealth of SPARTA, but beſides that, he had another priuate quarrell, which grew vpon this cauſe. In his old yeares, Cleonymus had maried a faire yong lady called Chelidonida, which was alſo of the bloud royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This lady being fallen extremely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his luſtie youth, ſhe greatly vexed and diſhonoured her husband Cleonymus, who was ouer head and eares in loue and iealouſie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but plainely knew that his wife made none account of him.

Areus made king of Sparta, and Cleonymus put downe.

The cauſe of Pyrrus inuading Peloponneſus.

And thus his home ſorowes, being ioyned with his outward common griefes, euen for ſpite, deſiring a reuenge, in choler he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto SPARTA, to reſtore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆMONIA forthwith, with fiue and twenty thouſand footmen, two thouſand horſe, and foure and twenty Elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing elſe, the world might plainely ſee, that Pyrrus came with a mind not to reſtore Cleonymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intent to conquer for himſelfe (if he could) all the country of PELOPONNESVS. For in words he denyed it to the LACEDÆMONIANS themſelues, who ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, when he was in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into PELOPONNESVS, to ſet the townes and cities at liberty which Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to ſend his yong ſonnes into SPARTA (ſo they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kings, to haue bene well brought vp. But faining theſe things, and abuſing thoſe that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heed of him, till he came within the coaſt of LACONIA, into the which he was no ſooner entred, but he began to waſt and ſpoile the whole country. And when the Ambaſſadors of SPARTA reproued and found fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in ſuch ſort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them anſwer, No more haue you your ſelues vſed to proclaime that, which you purpoſed to do to others. Then one of the Ambaſſadors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in ỹ LACONIAN tongue: If thou be a god, thou wilt do vs no hurt, becauſe we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou ſhalt meete with another that ſhall be better then thy ſelfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gaue him counſell euen at the firſt, to aſſault it. But he would not ſo do, fearing (as they ſaid) that if he did it by night, his ſouldiers would ſacke the city: and ſaid it ſhould be time inough to aſſault it the next day at broad day light, becauſe there were but few men within the towne, and beſide they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus himſelfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTINIANS, who had warres in his owne country. And doubtleſſe, that only was the ſauing of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckoning to aſſault it hotly: becauſe they thought it was not able to make reſiſtance. For Pyrrus camped before the town, throughly perſwaded with himſelf, that he ſhould find none to fight with him: & Cleonymus friends & ſeruants alſo did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus ſhould haue come to ſupper to him, & lodged with him. When night was come the LACEDÆMONIANS coũſelled together, and ſecretly determined to ſend away their wiues, and litle children into CRETA. But the women themſelues were againſt it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate houſe with a ſword in her hand, to ſpeake vnto them in the name of all the reſt, and ſaid: That they did their wiues great wrong, if they thought them ſo faint-hearted, as to liue after SPARTA were deſtroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counſel, that they ſhould caſt a trench before the enemies campe, and that at both ends of the ſame they ſhould burie carts in the ground vnto the middeſt of the wheeles, to the end that being faſt ſet in the ground, they ſhould ſtay the Elephants, and keepe them from paſſing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came wiues and maides vnto them, ſome of them their clothes girt vp round about them, and others all in their ſmockes, to worke at his trench with the old men, aduiſing the young men that ſhould fight the next morning, to reſt themſelues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third part of the trench to taske, which was ſixe cubits broad, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundred foot long, as Philarchus ſaith, or litle leſſe as Hieronymus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, and enemies remoued to come to the aſſault: the women themſelues fetched the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, and deliuered them the taske of the trench ready made, which they before had vndertaken, praying them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleaſure it is to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and ſight of their natiue country, and what great felicity and honour it is to die in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valiantly like an honeſt man, and worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone aſide, had tied a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to ſtrangle and hang her ſelfe, rather then to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the city ſhould come to be taken. Now Pyrrus marched in perſon with his battell of footmen, againſt the front of the SPARTANS, who being a great number alſo, did tarie his comming on the other ſide of the trench: the which, beſides

that it was very ill to paſſe ouer, did let the ſouldiers to fight ſteadily in order of battell, becauſe the earth being newly caſt vp, did yeeld vnder their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomy king Pyrrus ſon, paſſing all along the trench ſide with two thouſand GAVLES, and all the choiſe men of the CHAONIANS, aſſaied if he could get ouer to ỹ other ſide at one of the ends of the trench where the carts were: which being ſet very deepe into the ground, and one ioyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the aſſailants, but the defendants alſo. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to pluck off the wheeles of theſe carts, & to draw them into ỹ riuer. But Acrotatus king Areus ſonne, a young man, ſeeing the danger, ran through the city with a troupe of three hundred luſty youths beſides, and went to incloſe Ptolomy behind, before he eſpied him, for that he paſſed a ſecret hollow way till he came euen to giue the charge vpon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towards him, one running in anothers necke, and ſo in great diſorder were thruſt into the trenches, and vnder the carts: inſomuch as at the laſt, with much ado, and great bloudſhed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulſed them. Now the women & old men, that were on the other ſide of the trench, ſaw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulſed the GAVLES. Wherfore after Acrotatus had done this exploite, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare-bloud: couragious and liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus farre more noble and fairer to behold, then euer he was: ſo that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue ſuch a friend and louer. And there were certaine old men, that followed him crying after him, Go thy way, Acrotatus & enioy thy loue Chelidonida, beget noble children of her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruel on that ſide where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongſt other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and ſlaine many of his enemies with his owne hands, that forced to paſſe ouer the trench, perceiuing that his heart fainted for the great number of wounds he had vpon him, called one of them that were in the ranke next behind him, and giuing him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friends, becauſe his enemies ſhould not haue his body. In the end, the battell hauing continued all the day long, the night did ſeparate them: and Pyrrus, being laid in his bed, had this viſion in his ſleepe: He thought he ſtroke the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, that he vtterly conſumed it: whereat he was ſo paſſing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked: and therupon forthwith cõmanded his captains to make their men ready to the aſſault, and told his dreame vnto his familiars, ſuppoſing that out of doubt it did betoken he ſhould in that approach take the city. All that heard it, beleeued it was ſo, ſauing one Lyſimachus: who to the contrary ſaid, that this viſion liked him not, becauſe the places ſmitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawful to enter into them: by reaſon whereof he was alſo afraid, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould not enter into the city of SPARTA. Pyrrus anſwered him: That ſaid he, is a matter diſputable to and fro in an open aſſembly of people, for there is no manner of certaintie in it. But furthermore, euery man muſt take his weapon in his hand, and ſet this ſentence before his eyes:

Acrotatus valiantnes.

Pyrrus dreame.

A right good thing it is, that he would hazard life,
In iuſt defence of maſters cauſe, with ſpeare and bloudy knife.

Alluding vnto Homers verſes, which he wrote for the defence of his countrey. And ſaying thus, he roſe, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the aſſault. On the other ſide alſo, the LACEDÆMONIANS with a maruellous courage and magnanimity, far greater then their force beſtirred themſelues wõderfully to make reſiſtance, hauing their wiues by them, that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to giue meate and drink to them that needed, & did alſo withdraw thoſe that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewiſe for their part, indeuored themſelues with al their might to fill vp the trench with wood & other things, which they caſt vpon the dead bodies & armours lying in the bottome of the ditch: and ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS againe, laboured al they could poſſible to let thẽ. But in this great broile, one perceiued Pyrrus on horſebacke to haue leapt the trench, paſt ouer the ſtrength of the carts, and made force to enter into the city. Wherefore thoſe that were appointed to defend that part of the trench, cried out ſtraight, and the women fell a ſhreeking, and running as if all had bene loſt. And as Pyrrus paſſed further, ſtriking downe with his owne hands all that ſtood before him, a CRETAN ſhot at him, and ſtroke his horſe through both ſides: who leaping out of the preaſe for paine of his wound, dying, carried Pyrrus away, and threw him vpon the hanging of a steepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the top. This put all his seruants and friends about him in a maruellous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing them in this feare and trouble, ranne immediatly vnto that place, and with force of shot draue them all out of the trench. After this retire, Pyrrus caused all assault to ceasse, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yeeld, considering there were many of them slaine in the two daies past, and all the rest in a manner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the city (whether it were to proue the valiantnesse of the inhabitants themselues, or at the least to shew what power they were of, euen in their greatest need and distresse, when the LACEDÆMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTH, one of king Antigonus captaines, with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he was entred, king Areus arriued also on the other side from CRETA, and two thousand souldiers with him. So the women went home to their houses, making their reckoning that they should not need any more to trouble themselues with wars. They gaue the old men liberty also to go and rest themselues, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driuen to arme themselues, & take weapon in hand: and in order of battell placed the new-come souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that newe supplies were come, grew to greater stomacke then before, and enforced all that he could to win the towne by assault. But in the end, when to his cost he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the siege, and went to spoile all the countrey about, determining to lie there in garrison all the Winter. He could not for all this auoide his destinie: for there rose a sedition in the citie of ARGOS betweene two of the chiefest citizens, Aristeas and Aristippus: and because Aristeas thought that king Antigonus did fauour his enemy Aristippus, he made hast to send first vnto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the present prosperity, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fel out he was a loser, then he sought to recouer himselfe, and to restore his losse by some other new attempts. So that neither for being conquerour, nor ouercome, he would euer be quiet, but alwaies troubled some, and himselfe also: by reason whereof, he suddenly departed towards ARGOS. But king Areus hauing layd ambushes for him in diuerse places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe, gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the taile of his army. Now, the selfe same day Pyrrus was warned by a soothsayer, who sacrifising had found the liuer of the sacrifised beast infected: that it betokened the losse of some most neare vnto him. But when he heard the noise of the charge giuen, he thought not on the warning of the soothsayer, but commanded his son to take his household seruants with him, and to go thither: and he himselfe in the meane time with as great hast as he could, made the rest of his army to march, to get them quickly out of this dangerous way. The fray was very hote about Ptolomie Pyrrus son, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whom he had to do, led by a valiant captaine, called Eualcus. But as he fought valiantly against those that stood before him, there was a souldier of CRETA called Oræsus, borne in the city of APTERA, a man very ready of his hand, and light of foote, who running along by him, stroke him such a blow on his side, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being slaine, his company began straight to flie: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chase so hotly, that they took no heed of themselues, vntil they saw they were in the plaine field far from their footmen. Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his sonne was newly reported, being on fire with sorrow and passion, turned suddenly vpon them with the men of armes of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruellous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that euery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, hauing his sword in his hand: yet then he did shew more proofe of his valiantnesse, strength, and courage, then he had euer done before. And when he had set spurs to his horse against Eualcus to close with him: Eualcus turned on the one side, and gaue Pyrrus such a blow with his sword, that he missed little the cutting of his bridle hand: for he cut indeed all the raines of the bridle asunder. But Pyrrus straight ranne him through the body with his speare, and lighting off from his horse, he put all the troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the sword that were about the body of Eualcus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cause of that losse vnto their countrey for nothing, considering that the warres against them were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made sacrifice of these poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the soule of his dead dead ſonne, and fought thus wonderfully alſo, to honour his funerals, conuerting a great part of his ſorrow for his death, into anger & wrath againſt the enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And notwithſtanding that king Antigonus had already ſeazed the hils that were ouer the valley, he lodged neare vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following ſent an Herald vnto Antigonus, and gaue him defiance, calling him wicked man, and challenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to try which of them two ſhould be king. Antigonus made him anſwer, that he made warres as much with time as with weapon: and furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had waies inough open to put himſelfe to death. The citizens of ARGOS alſo ſent Ambaſſadours vnto them both, to pray them to depart, ſith they knew that there was nothing for them to ſee in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, and friend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, & gaue them his ſon for hoſtage. Pyrrus alſo made thē faire promiſe to do ſo too, but becauſe he gaue no caution nor ſufficiēt pledge to performe it, they miſtruſted him the more. Then there fell out many great and wonderfull tokens, as well vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus hauing ſacrifiſed oxen, their heads being ſtriken off from their bodies, they thruſt out their tongues, and licked vp their owne bloud. And within the city of ARGOS, a ſiſter of the temple of Apollo Lycius, called Apollonide, ran through the ſtreetes, crying out that ſhe ſaw the city full of murther, and bloud running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fray, howbeit ſhe vaniſhed away ſuddenly, and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then coming hard to the wals of ARGOS in the night, and finding one of the gates called Diamperes, opened by Ariſteas, he put in his GAVLES: who poſſeſſed the market place before the citizens knew any thing of it. But becauſe the gate was too low to paſſe the Elephants through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, and in tumult: by reaſon whereof they loſt much time, ſo that the citizens in the end perceiued it, and ran incontinently vnto the caſtell of Aſpides, & into other ſtrong places of the city. And therwithall, they ſent with preſent ſpeed vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and ſo he did: and after he was come hard to the wals, he remained without with the ſcouts, and in the meane time ſent his ſon with his chiefeſt Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good ſouldiers, and men of war with him. At the ſame time alſo arriued Areus king of SPARTA, with a thouſand of the CRETANS, and moſt luſty SPARTANS: all which ioyning together, came to giue a charge vpon the GAVLES that were in the market place, who put them in a maruellous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that ſide alſo of the city called Cylabaris with terrible noiſe and cries, when he vnderſtood that the GAVLES anſwered him not luſtily and courageouſly, he doubted ſtraight that it was the voice of men diſtreſſed, & that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with ſpeed to relieue them, thruſting the horſemen forwards that marched before him with great danger and paine, by reaſon of the holes and ſinkes, and water conduicts, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confuſion amongſt them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man ſaw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commanded, by reaſon of the great noiſe they made, ſtraying here and there vp and downe the ſtreetes, the one ſcattered from the other: neither could the captaines ſet their men in order, as well for the darknes of the night, as alſo for the confuſed tumult that was all the city ouer, and for that the ſtreetes alſo were very narrow. And therfore they remained on both ſides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceiued the caſtell of Aſpides, full of his armed enemies. And furthermore, ſuddenly as he was come into the market place, amongſt many other goodly common workes ſet out to beautifie the ſame, he ſpied the images of a Bull and a Wolfe in copper, the which fought one with another. This ſight made him afraid, becauſe at that preſent he remembred a prophecy that had bene told him, that his end and death ſhould be when he ſaw a Wolfe and Bull fight together. The ARGIVES report, that theſe images were ſet vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance that had happened in their country. For when Danaus came thither firſt, by the way called Pyramia (as one would ſay, land ſowne with corne) in the countrey of THYREATIDE, he ſaw as he went, a Wolfe fight with a Bull: whereupon he ſtaied to ſee what the end of their fight would come to, ſuppoſing the caſe in himſelf, that the Wolfe was of his ſide, becauſe that being a ſtranger as he was, he came to ſet vpon the naturall inhabitants of the country. The Wolfe in the end obtained the victory: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycius, followed on his enterprise, and had so good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the wolfe & bull were set vp in the market place of ARGOS. Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them, & also because nothing fell out well according to his expectatiō, thought best to retire:

Helenus Pyrrus son.

but fearing the straightnesse of the gates of the city, he sent vnto his son Helenus, whom he had left without the city with the greatest part of his force and army, commanding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall, that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chance did hinder their coming out. But the messenger whom he sent, was so hastie and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus said vnto him, but reported his message quite contrary. Whereupon the yong prince Helenus taking the best souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants, entred into the city to helpe his father, who was now giuing backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retiring still, he valiantly repulsed those that set vpon him, turning his face oft vnto them. But when he was driuen vnto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the citie, he was kept in with his own men that entred at the same gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noise was so great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behind, and did still thrust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the Elephants by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grinding his teeth did hinder those also, that would haue come out and giuen backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the city, called Nicon (as much to say, as conquering) seeking his gouernour that was striken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes, ranne vpon them that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing friends and foes one in anothers necke, till at the length hauing found the body of his master slaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and caryeing him vpon his two tushes, returned backe with great furie, treading all vnder feete he found in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this sort, there was not one that could help himselfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of a multitude, and one whole body shut together, which sometime thrust forward, and sometime gaue backe, as the sway went. They fought not so much against their enemies, who set vpon them behind: but they did thēselues more hurt then their enemies did. For if any drew out his sword, or based his pike, he could neither scabard the one againe, nor lift vp the other, but thrust it full vpon his own fellowes that came in to helpe them, and so killed themselues one thrusting vpon another. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing his people thus troubled and harried to and fro, tooke his crowne frō his head which he wore vpon his helmet, that made him knowne of his men a farre off, and gaue it to one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and trusting then to the goodnesse of his horse, flew vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus set vpon him that had hurt him, who was an ARGIAN borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore old womans son, whose mother at that present time was gotten vp to the top of the tiles of a house, as al other women of the city were, to see the fight. And she perceiuing that it was her sonne whom Pyrrus came vpon, was so afrighted to see him in that danger, that she took a tile, and with both her hands cast it vpon Pyrrus. The tile falling off from his head by reason of his head-peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, and brake his neck-bone asunder: wherewith he was suddenly so benummed, that he lost his sight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hand, & himself fell from his horse, to the ground, by Licymmias tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the least the commō people. Vntill at the last there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other souldiers also that ran straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, euen as he was coming againe to himselfe out of this trance. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON sword he wore by his side, to strike off his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grim countenance on him betweene his eyes, that made him so afraid, & his hand so to shake therewith, that being thus amazed, he did not strike him right in ỹ place where he should haue cut off his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne, so that he was a great while ere he could strike off his head. The matter was straight blowne abroad amongst diuerse: whereupon Alcyoneus running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ranne presently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and cast

Afterwards Alcyonus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus ſonne) in very poore eſtate, mufled vp with a poore ſhort cloake, vſed him very courteouſly with gentle words, & brought him to his father. Antigonus ſeeing his ſonne bringing of him, ſaid vnto him: This part now (my ſonne) is better then the firſt, and pleaſeth me a great deale more. But yet thou haſt not done all thou ſhouldeſt: for thou ſhouldeſt haue take from him his beggerly cloake he weareth, which doth more ſhame vs that are the gainers, then him that is the loſer. After he had ſpoken theſe words, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good ſort, ſent him home with honourable conuoy into his Realme of Epirvs. Furthermore, ſeazing all Pyrrus campe and armie, he courteouſly vſed all his friends and ſeruants.

The end of Pyrrus life.

THE LIFE OF Caius Marius.

IT is not knowne what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintus Sertorius, who had all Spaine in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that deſtroyed the city of Corinth. For this name of Achaicus that was giuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio, and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all ſurnames giuen them, by reaſon of the conqueſts they wan. By this reaſon Poſidonius thinketh to ouercome them that ſay, that the third name the Romaines haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out ſo, ſaid he, then it muſt needs follow that they which haue two names, ſhould haue no proper name. But on the other ſide alſo, he doth not conſider that by the like reaſon he ſhould ſay, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in Rome that is called by her firſt name, which Poſidonius iudgeth to bee the proper name of the Romaines. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the houſe or family, as of the Pompeians, of the Manlians, and of the Cornelians, like as the Heraclides and the Pelopides are amongſt the Grecians: and the other is a ſurname taken of the deeds, or of the nature, forme, or ſhape of the body, or of ſome other like accident, as are theſe ſurnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Euen as amongſt the GRECIANS likewiſe, Mnemon, which ſignifieth hauing good memorie: Grypos, hauing a crooked noſe: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuerſity of cuſtome would deliuer obiection ſufficient to the contrary, to him that liſted. And furthermore, as touching the fauour of Marius face, we haue ſeene an image of his in marble at RAVENNA, a city of the GAVLES, which doth liuely repreſent that rough ſeuerity of nature and maners, which they ſay was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and giuen to the warres, and hauing followed the ſame altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authority, he could not bridle his anger and cholericke nature. And they ſay furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vſed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockerie to ſtudy to learne the tongue, the maſters wherof liued in bondage vnder others. After his ſecond triumph, in the dedication of a certaine temple, he made Greeke playes to ſhew the ROMAINES paſtime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but ſit downe only, and went his way ſtraight. Wherfore me thinks, that as Plato was wont to ſay oft vnto Xenocrates, the Philoſopher, who was of a curriſh nature, had his head euer occupied, and too ſeuere: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do ſacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could haue perſwaded Marius to haue ſacrificed to the Muſes, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to ſay, that he had knowne the Greek tongue) to ſo many famous and glorious deeds as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioyned ſo vnfortunate and miſerable an end as he made, through his choler and extreme ambition, at ſuch yeares, and through an vnſatiable couetouſnes, which like boiſterous winds made him to make ſhipwrack of al, in a moſt cruel, bloudie, and vnnaturall age. The which is eaſily knowne in reading the diſcourſe of his doings. Firſt of all he was of a meane houſe, borne of poore parents by father and mother, that got their liuings by ſweat of their browes. His father as himſelfe, was called Caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cauſe why he began ſo late to haunt the city, and to learne the ciuility and maners of ROME, hauing bene brought vp alwaies before in a litle poore village called CIRROEATON, within the territorie of the city of ARPOS: where he led a hard country life, in reſpect of thoſe that liued pleaſantly and finely in the cities, but otherwiſe well reformed, and neareſt vnto the maners of the ancient ROMAINES. The firſt iourny he made vnto the wars, was againſt ŷ CELTIBERIANS in SPAINE, vnder Scipio AFRICAN, when he went to beſiege ŷ city of NVMANTIA: where his captaines in ſhort time found that he was a better ſoldier then any other of his companions. For he did maruellous eaſily receiue the reformation of manners, and the diſcipline of warres which Scipio aduanced amongſt his ſouldiers, that were ill trained before, and giuen ouer to all pleaſure. And they ſay, that in the ſight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and ſlue him: vpon which occaſion, Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many courteſies and pleaſures. But ſpecially one day aboue the reſt, hauing made him ſup with him at his table, ſome one after ſupper falling in talke of Captaines that were in ROME at that time: one that ſtood by Scipio, asked him (either becauſe indeed he ſtood in doubt, or elſe for that he would curry fauour with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMAINES ſhould haue after his death, like vnto him. Scipio hauing Marius by him, gently clapped him vpon the ſhoulders, and ſaid: Peraduenture this ſhall be he. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to ſhew from his youth that one day he ſhould come to be a great man, & the other alſo for wiſely coniecturing the end, by ſeeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned ſo, that theſe words of Scipio (by report) aboue al things elſe put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene ſpoken by the Oracle of ſome god, and made him bold to deale in matters of ſtate and common-wealth: whereby meanes of the fauor and countenance Cecilius Metellus gaue him (whoſe houſe his father and he had alwaies followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneſhip. In this office he preferred a law touching the maner how to giue ŷ voices in election of the Magiſtrates, which did ſeeme to take from the Nobility the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Conſull Cotta ſtepped vp againſt it, and perſwaded the Senate to reſiſt that law, and not ſuffer it to be authorized, & therewithall preſently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reaſon of his doing. So was it agreed vpon in Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abaſhed at any thing, as ſome other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begun to enter into the world as he did, and hauing no other notable calling or quality in him, ſauing his vertue onely to commend him: but taking boldneſſe of himſelfe (as the notable acts he afterwards did, did,gaue ſhew of his valour) he openly threatned the Conſull Cotta to ſend him to priſon,if he did not preſently withdraw the concluſion he had cauſed to be reſolued vpon. The Conſul then turning himſelfe vnto Cæcilius Metellus,asked how he liked it? Metellus ſtanding vp,ſpake in the behalfe of the Conſull: and then Marius calling a ſergeant our, commanded him to take Metellus ſelfe,and to carie him to priſon. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: ſo that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the concluſion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honour into the market place among the aſſembly of the people, cauſed this law to paſſe and be authorized: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a ſtout man, and ſuch a one, as would not ſtoupe for any feare, nor ſhrinke for baſhfulneſſe, but would beard the Senate in fauour of the people. Notwithſtanding he ſhortly after changed opinion, and altered the firſt, by another act he made: for when another went about to haue a law made, to diſtribute corne vnto euery citizen without payment of any pennie, he was vehemently againſt it, and ouerthrew it: ſo that thereby he came to be alike honoured and eſteemed of either partie, as he that would neither pleaſure the one,nor the other,to the preiudice of the common-wealth. After he had bene Tribune,he ſued for the chiefeſt office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two ſorts: the firſt is called Ædilitas Curulis, ſo named, becauſe of certaine chaires that haue crooked feete, vpon which they ſit when they giue audience. The other is of leſſe dignity,and that is called Ædilitas popularis. And when they haue choſen the firſt and greater Ædilis at Rome, they preſently proceed the ſame day alſo in the market place vnto election of the leſſer. Marius ſeeing plainely that he was put by the chiefeſt of the Ædiles, turned againe ſtraight yet to demand the ſecond: but this was miſliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too ſhumeleſſe,and too preſumtuous a man. So that in one ſelf day he had two denials and repulſes, which neuer man but himſelfe before had. And neuertheleſſe,all this could not cut his combe,but ſhortly after he ſued alſo for the Prætorſhip,& he lacked but a litle of the deniall of that:yet in the end,being laſt of all choſen,he was accuſed to haue bribed the people,& bought their voices for mony. And ſurely amongſt many other, this preſumption was very great: that they ſaw a man of Caſſius Sabacon within the bars where the election is made, running too & fro among them that gaue their voices;becauſe this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the Iudges, and Sabacon was examined vpon it: whereunto he anſwered,that for the great extreme heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for cold water to drinke,and that his man had brought him ſome in a pot where he was, howbeit that he went his way as ſoone as euer he had drunke. This Sabacon was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Cenſors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamy,for that he was periured in iudgemẽt,or becauſe he was ſo ſubiect & giuen to his pleaſure. Caius Herennius was alſo called for a witneſſe againſt Marius: but he did alledge for his excuſe,that the law and cuſtome did diſpence with the Patron, to be a witneſſe againſt his follower and client;and he was quit by the Iudges. For the Romaines alwaies call thoſe Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then themſelues into their hands: ſaying,that Marius predeceſſors, and Marius himſelfe, had euer bene followers of the houſe of the Herennians. The Iudges receiued his anſwer,and allowed thereof. But Marius ſpake againſt it,alledging that ſince he had receiued this honor to beare office in the commonwealth,he was now growne from this baſe condition, to be any more a follower of any man:the which is not true in all. For euery office of a Magiſtrate doth not exempt him that hath the office nor yet his poſterity to be vnder the patronage of another, nor doth diſcharge him from the duty of honouring them:but of neceſſity he muſt be a magiſtrate,which the law doth permit to ſit in the crooked chaire called Curulis,that is to ſay, caried vpon a charriot through the city. But notwithſtanding that at the firſt hearing of this cauſe, Marius had but ill ſucceſſe,and that the Iudges were againſt him all they could:yet in the end for all that, at the laſt hearing of this matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was diſcharged, becauſe the Iudges opinions with and againſt him fell to be of like number. He vſed himſelfe very orderly in his office of Prætorſhip, and after his yeare was our,when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot,Spaine fell vnto him,which is beyond the riuer of Bætis:where it is reported,that he ſcowred all the country therabours of theeues and robbers,which notwithſtanding was yet very cruell and ſauage,for the rude,barbarous,and vnciuil maner and faſhion of life of the inhabitants there. For the Spaniards were of opinion euen at that time,that it was a goodly thing to liue vpon theft and robbery. At his returne to Rome out of SPAINE, desiring to deale in matters of the cõmonwealth, he saw that he had neither eloquẽce nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which these that were at that time in credit and authority, did carie the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great account of his constancie and noble mind they found in him, of his great paines and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicity of his life: which were causes to bring him to honour and preferment, insomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noblest house of the Cæsars, and aunt vnto Iulius Cæsar: who afterwards came to be the chiefest man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reason of that alliance betweene thẽ, seemed in some things to follow Marius, as we haue written in his life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be iudged by an act he did, putting himselfe into the hands of Surgeons. For his shankes and legges were full of great swollen veines, and being angrie because it was no pleasant thing to behold, he determined to put himselfe into the hands of Surgeons to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the Surgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in like case: but patiently abode all the extreme paines a man must of necessity feele being cut, without stirring, groning, or sighing, still keeping his countenance, and said neuer a word. But when the Surgeon had done with his first legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not giue it him: Nay, said he, I see the cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwards Cæcilius Metellus the Consul, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make warre with king Iugurth, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, seeing notable good seruice to be done, and occasion to shew his manhood, was not of mind in this voyage to increase Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieuetenants did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him foorth for his Lieutenant, but fortune her selfe that presented him a fit occasiõ to raise him to greatnes, & (as it were) did leade him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he could do. And for this cause therefore, he endeuoured himself to shew all the possible proofes of valiantnesse and honour he could. For the wars being great continually there, he neuer for feare refused any attempt or seruice, how dangerous or painefull soeuer it were, neither disdained to take any seruice in hand, were it neuer so little: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wisedome and foresight in that which was to be done, and striuing with the meanest souldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, he wan the goodwil & fauor of euery man. For to say truly, it is a great comfort & refreshing to soldiers that labour, to haue companions that labour willingly with them. For they think, that their company labouring with them, doth in maner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the ROMAINE souldier maruellously to see ẏ Generall eate openly of the same bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himself is the first man to set his hand to any work when a trench is to be cast, or their campe to be fortified. For they do not somuch esteeme the Captaines that honour and reward them, as they doe those that in dangerous attempts, labour and venture their liues with them. And further, they do farre better loue them that take pains with them, then those that suffer them to liue idlely by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue and goodwils of his souldiers: he straight filled all LYBIA and the city of ROME with his glory, so that he was in euery mans mouth. For they that were in the camp in AFRICKE, wrote vnto them that were at ROME, that they should neuer see the end of those wars against this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and chose him Consul. These things misliked Metellus very much, but specially the misfortune that came vpon Turpilius did maruellously trouble him: which fell out in this sort: Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea he and al his parents had followed Metellus in this warre, being master of the works in his campe. Metellus made him gouernour ouer the city of VACCA, a goodly great city: and he vsing the inhabitants of the same very gently and courteously, mistrusted nothing, till he was fallen into the hands of his enemies through their treason. For they had brought king Iugurth into their city vnknowne to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but only begged him of the king, and let him go his way safe. And this was the cause why they accused Turpilius of treason. Marius being one of his Iudges in the councel, was not cõtented to be bitter to him himself, but moued many of the councel besides to be against him: so that Metellus by the voices of the people, was driuen against his will to condemne him to suffer as a traitor: and shortly after it was found & proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned and put to death. To say truly, there was not one of the councell but were very sory with Metellus, who maruellous impatiently tooke the death of the

the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him that he purſued his death, and was not aſhamed to make open vants, that he had hanged a furie about Metellus neck, to reuenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltleſſe had cauſed to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they ſay, that one day Metellus to mock him withall, ſaid vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, and returne to ROME to ſue for the Conſulſhip: and canſt thou not be contented to tarie to be Conſull with my ſon? Now his ſon at that time was but a boy. But howſoeuer the matter went, Marius left him not ſo, but laboured for leaue all he could poſſible. And Metellus after he had vſed many delayes & excuſes, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue daies only before the day of election of the Conſuls. Wherfore Marius made haſt, and in two daies and a night came from the campe to VTICA vpon the ſea ſide, which is a maruellous way from it: and there before he tooke ſhip, did ſacrifices vnto the gods, & the Sooth-ſayer told him, that the gods by the ſignes of his ſacrifices, did promiſe him vncredible proſperity, & ſo great, as he himſelf durſt not hope after. Theſe words made Marius heart greater: wherupon he hoiſed ſaile, and hauing a paſſing good gale of wind in the poope of the ſhip, paſſed the ſeas in foure daies, & being landed, rode poſt to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to ſhew himſelfe vnto the people: who were maruellous deſirous to ſee him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accuſations which he obiected againſt Metellus, in the end he beſought the people to chuſe him Conſull, promiſing that within few daies he would either kill, or take king Iugurth priſoner. Whereupon he was choſen Conſull without any contradiction. And ſo ſoone as he was proclaimed, he began immediatly to leauie men of war, cauſing many poore men that had nothing, and many ſlaues alſo, to be enrolled againſt the order of ancient cuſtome: where other Captaines before him did receiue no ſuch manner of men, and did no more ſuffer vnworthy men to be ſouldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common-wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goods behind them, as a pledge of their good ſeruice abroad in the wars. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be moſt hated, but they were his ſtout proud words full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offend the noble men in the city. For he proclaimed it euery where abroad as it were, that his Conſulſhip was a ſpoile he had gotte of the effeminate rich noble men through his valiantneſſe, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for the ſeruice of the cõmonweale, were thoſe that recommended him to the people, and were his ſtrength, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images & ſtatues of others. And oft times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Beſtia, both noble men, and of great houſes, who hauing bene Generals of the ROMAINE army, had very ill fortune in the countrey of LYBIA: he called them cowards and ſimple ſouldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not think that their anceſtors would rather haue wiſhed to haue left their children that came of them like vnto himſelf, then ſuch as they had bene: conſidering that they themſelues had won honour and glory, not for that they were deſcended of noble bloud, but through their deſerued vertue and valiant deeds. Now Marius ſpake not theſe words in a fooliſh brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchaſe the ill will of the Nobility for nothing: but the common people being very glad to ſee him ſhame and diſpite the Senate, and meaſuring alwaies the greatneſſe of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward ſtill not to ſpare the Nobility, and to reproue the great men; ſo that he euer held with the communaltie. And furthermore, when he was paſſed ouer againe into AFRICKE, it ſpited Metellus to the heart, becauſe that he hauing ended all the warre, that there remained almoſt no more to take or win, Marius ſhould come in that ſort to take away the glory and triumph out of his hands, hauing ſought to riſe and increaſe by vnthankfulneſſe towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went another way, and left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliuer the ſame vnto him. Howbeit, the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end vpon Marius owne necke: for Sylla tooke out of Marius hands the honor of ending this war, euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, & after what ſort, I will repeat it in few words, becauſe we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Iugurth, vnto whom he gaue no great aid, whileſt he made wars with the ROMAINS, becauſe he hated his vnfaithfullneſſe, and feared leſt he would make himſelf greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurth had fled, and wandred vp and downe in euery place, he was conſtrained of very neceſſity to caſt his laſt hope and anker vpon him, as his finall refuge, and ſo repaire vnto him. King Boc- chus receiued him rather for ſhame, becauſe he durſt not puniſh him, then for any loue or good will he bare him: and hauing him in his hands, ſeemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and ſecretly to write the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practiſed treaſon vnder hand, and ſent priuily for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæſtor (to ſay, high Treaſurer) vnder Marius, and of whom he had receiued certaine pleaſures in thoſe warres. Sylla truſting to this barbarous king, went at his ſending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promiſe, and altered his mind, ſtanding many daies in doubt with himſelfe how to reſolue, whether he ſhould deliuer king Iugurth, or keepe Sylla himſelfe: yet at the laſt he went on with his purpoſe and intended treaſon, and deliuered king Iugurth aliue into Syllaes hands. And this was the firſt originall cauſe of the peſtilent and mortal enmity that grew afterwards betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowne the city of Rome, and to haue razed the foundation of the Empire vnto the ground. For many enuying the glory of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this act of the taking of king Iugurth, appertained onely vnto Sylla: and Sylla himſelfe cauſed a ring to be made, which he wore commonly, and had grauen vpon the ſtone of the ſame, how Bocchus deliuered Iugurth into his hands. And afterwards he made it alwaies his ſeale to deſpite Marius withall, who was an ambitious and proud man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glory of his doings: and Sylla did it eſpecially at the procurement of enemies and ill willers, who gaue the glory of the beginning and chiefe exploits of this war, vnto Metellus; and the laſt and finall concluſion vnto Sylla, to the end that the people ſhould not haue Marius in ſo great eſtimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuie, detraction and hatred againſt Marius, was ſoone after extinguiſhed and troden vnder foot, by reaſon of the great danger that fell vpon all Italy out of the Weſt: and they neuer ſpake of it afterwards, knowing that the commonwealth ſtood in need of a good Captaine, & that they began to look about, and conſider who ſhould be that great wiſe Pilot, that might ſaue and preſerue it from ſo great and dangerous a ſtorme of war. For there was not a noble man of all the ancient houſes of Rome, that durſt vndertake to offer himſelfe to demand the Conſulſhip: but Marius being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time. For Iugurth was no ſooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the coming downe of the Teutons, and of the Cimbres, the which would not be beleeued at the firſt, by reaſon of the infinite number of the fighting men which was ſaid to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of the armies which was iuſtified to come: but afterwards they knew plainely, that the rumour that ran abroad was leſſe then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thouſand fighting men all armed, who brought with them alſo another multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandred vp and downe ſeeking countries and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard ſay the Gaules had done in old time, who leauing their owne countrey, came, and had poſſeſſed the beſt part of Italy, which they had taken away from the Thuscans. Now to ſay truly, no man knew of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendſhip with any other people, as alſo becauſe they came out of a farre country, as a cloud of people that was ſpread all ouer Gaule and Italy. It was doubted much they were a people of Germany, dwelling about the North ſide: and this they coniectured by view of the greatnes of their bodies, and alſo for that they had dark blue eyes & red, beſides that the Grecians in their tongue do cal theeues & robbers, Cimbres. Other ſay, that Celtica, for the great length & largenes of the country, ſtretching it ſelf from the coaſt of the great Ocean ſea, & from the north parts, drawing towards the mariſhes Mœotides, & the Eaſt, runneth into Scythia, or Tartaria Pontica: and that for neighborhood theſe two nations ioyned together, and went out of their country, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many ſundry times, marching yerely in the ſpring further and further into the country. And thus by continuance of time, they paſſed by force of armes through al the firme land of Europe: & that for this cauſe, although they had many particular names according to the diuerſity of their nations, yet al this maſſe and multitude of people gathered together, were called notwithſtandiug, the army of the Celtoscythes, as who would ſay, ỹ Celtotartares. Other hold opiniõ that ỹ nation of the Cimmerians, who were known in old time for aneient Grecians, the one part of them were not very great in reſpect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuen out of their countrey for ſome ciuill diſſention) were compelled by the Tartares to paſſe beyond the mariſhes Mœotides, into the countries of Asia, vnder the conduction of a captain called Ligdamis.

But

But the reſidue of them, which were a far greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furtheſt parts of the earth, adioyning to the great Ocean ſea, in a darke ſhadowed countrey couered with wonderfull forreſts, of ſuch length, and ſo great and thicke, and the trees ſo high, that the Sun can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyne hard vpon the great forreſt of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder ſuch a climate, where the pole is of ſuch a height by the inclination of the circles equidiſtant, which they call Paralleles, that it is not farre from the point that anſwereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the daies are equinoctiall. They do deuide all their time in two parts, the which giueth Homer occaſion to faine, that when Vlyſſes would call vpon the dead, he went into the country of the CIMMERIANS, as into the country of hell. And this is the cauſe why they ſay theſe barbarous people left their owne countries to come into ITALY, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwards they ſay (and not without great likelihood) that they were ſurnamed CIMERES: howbeit that is ſpoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any aſſured troth of hiſtorie. And as for the multitude of men, the moſt part of hiſtoriographers doe write, that they were rather mo then leſſe, then we haue ſpoken of: and that they were ſo hardy and valiant, that nothing could ſtand before them, they did ſo great things by the ſtrength of their hands, where they fought with any, ſo violently and ſo ſodainly that they ſeemed to be like a lightning fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durſt reſiſt them, but ſcraped together and caried away all that they found, hand ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyond the mountaines, who with great armies were ſhamefully ouerthrowne by thē. The cowardlines of thoſe whom they had ouercome, was the chiefeſt cauſe that moued them to direct their iourney to ROME. For when they had vanquiſhed the firſt they had fought withall, & gotten great riches alſo: they were ſo fleſhed by this, that they determined to ſtay no where, before they had deſtroyed ROME, & ſacked al ITALY. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all parts, ſent for Marius to giue him the conduction and leading of theſe wars, and choſe him Cōſull the ſecond time: notwithſtanding that it was directly againſt the law, that did expreſly forbid any man to be choſen being abſent, and vntill alſo a certaine time appointed had paſt betweene the vacation and election, before they could chuſe him officer twiſe in one office. Some alledged this law, of intent to hinder the election: but the people repulſed them, obiecting to the contrarie, that this was not the firſt time the law had giuen place to the benefit of the commonwealth and that the occaſion offered to abrogate the law at that preſent, was no leſſe then former occaſions by the which they choſe Scipio Conſull, againſt the courſe and time appointed by the law, not for any feare they ſtood in to loſe their owne country, but for the deſire they had to deſtroy the country of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reaſon wherof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his army againe out of LYBIA into ITALY, tooke poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip the firſt day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES begin their yeare) & therewithall made his triumph into the city of ROME, ſhewing that to the ROMAINES, which they thought neuer to haue ſeene: and that was, king Iugurth priſoner, who was ſo ſubtill a man, and could ſo well frame himſelfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and ſubtiltie was of ſo great courage beſides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliue. But it is ſaid, that after he was led in this triumph, he fell mad ſtraight vpon it: and the pompe of triumph being ended, he was caried into priſon, where the ſergeants for haſt to haue the ſpoile of him, tore his apparel by force from off his backe: and becauſe they would take away his rich gold eare-rings that hung at his eares, they pulled away with them the tippe of his eare, and then caſt him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he ſaid: O Hercules, how cold are your ſtoues? He liued there yet ſixe daies, fighting with hunger, and deſiring alwaies to prolong his miſerable life vnto the laſt houre: the which was a iuſt deſerued puniſhment for his wicked life. In this triumph were carried (as they ſay) three thouſand and ſeuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of ſiluer niggots, fiue thouſand ſeuen hundred and lxxv. pound weight: and more in gold and ready coine, eight and twenty thouſand and ſeuen hundred crownes. After this triumph Marius cauſed the Senate to aſſemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the company with his triumphing robe, either becauſe he forgot it, or elſe of too groſſe & vnciuill arrogancie: but perceiuing that al the aſſembly miſliked of it, he roſe ſuddenly, and tooke his long Conſuls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place. Furthermore, Marius departing to go to the wars, thought to traine his army by the way, and to harden his ſouldiers vnto labour, cauſing them to run euery way, making great long iourneys, compelling each ſouldier to cary his own furniture, and to prepare him neceſſary victuals to find himſelf withal: ſo that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, & called ſuch as were paineful and willing to do that which they were commanded without grudging, Marius moiles. Other notwithſtanding do ſhew another cauſe and beginning of this Prouerbe: for they ſay, that Scipio lying at the ſiege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not onely take view of the armour and horſes of ſeruice that were in his army, but alſo of the moiles and other beaſts of burden, becauſe he would ſee how they were kept and furniſhed. So Marius brought his horſe and moile to the muſter which he kept himſelfe, fat, faire, and very well dreſt; and his moiles haire ſo ſlike and ſmooth, and therewithall ſo luſtie and trim, as none of the reſt were like vnto them. Scipio took great pleaſure to ſee theſe beaſts ſo wel kept, and in ſo good plight: inſomuch as he ſpake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this maner of talke was taken vp euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is paineſull, and giuen to ſore labour, making as though they would praiſe him, they call him Marius moile. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that theſe barbarous people (like in force to the beating back of the raging ſeas) turned their firſt furie towards SPAINE: and that he in the meane ſpace had time and leiſure to traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers, to make them bold, and withall, himſelfe to be throughly knowne amongſt them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend, nor diſobey, then they found his rough commanding, and ſharpe ſeuerity in puniſhing ſuch as ſlacked their duty, both profitable & very neceſſary, beſides that it was alſo iuſt and reaſonable. Againe his great fury, his ſharpe words, and his fierce looks, after they had a while bene vſed to them, by litle & litle they ſeemed nothing ſo fearefull to thē, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleaſed the ſouldiers more then all the reſt, was his iuſtice and vpright dealing: whereof they report ſuch an example: Marius had a nephew of his in his campe, called Caius Lucius, who had charge of men in the army. This Lucius was taken for a maruellous honeſt man, ſauing that he had this foule vice in him, that he would be ſuddenly in loue with faire young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trim young ſtripling, called Trebonius, that ſerued vnder him, and hauing many times lewdly enticed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpoſe, at the laſt ſent for him one night by his ſeruant. The yong man might not diſobey his captaine being ſent for, but preſently wēt vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did ſtriue with all his force to do him villanie: he drew out his ſword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe: who ſo ſoone as he returned, cauſed the Marſhall to bring the yong man before him. Many ſtepped forth ſtraight to accuſe him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himſelfe, and to name many witneſſes, who had both ſeene and knowne how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him diſhonour, and how that he had continually reſiſted his abhominable motion, and would neuer yeeld himſelf vnto him, for any gift or preſent he could offer him. Wherfore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, cauſed preſently one of thoſe crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vſed to be giuen to them that in a day of battel haue done ſome valiant deed, and he himſelfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble act, and at ſuch a time, as good and honeſt examples were requiſite. This iudgement of Marius being caried to ROME, ſtood him to great good purpoſe towards the obtaining of his third Conſulſhip: beſide alſo that they looked for the comming backe of theſe barbarous people about the Spring, with whom the ROMAINE ſouldiers would not fight vnder any other captaine then Marius. Howbeit they came not ſo ſoone againe as they looked for them, but Marius paſſed ouer alſo the yeare of his third Conſulſhip. So time comming about againe for the election of the new Conſuls & his companion alſo being dead, he was driuen to go himſelf vnto ROME, leauing the charge of his campe in his abſence vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that ſued for the Conſulſhip: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communaltie vnder his girdle as he would himſelfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perſwaded the people to chuſe Marius Conſull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, ſeemed to refuſe it, ſaying, that he would none of it, though the people choſe him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traitor, crying out, That his refuſall in ſuch a danger and time of neceſſity, was an apparant apparant part to betray the commonwealth. It was found straight that this was a grosse packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could see day at a little hole. Neuertheless, the people considering that their present troubles required Marius skil and good fortune in the wars, they made him Consull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Luctatius Consull with him, a man that was greatly honoured of the Nobility, and not misliked also of the common people. Marius hauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great speed, & fortifying his camp by the riuer of RHONE, he brought great prouision of all kinds of victuals thither with him, lest being straighted by lacke thereof, he should be forced to come to battel at any other time but euen as he would himself, & as it should seeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of victuals vnto his camp by sea was very long, & dangerous, and a maruellous great charge besides: he made it very short & easie by this meanes. The mouth of the riuer of RHONE had gathered together so much mud, and such store of sand, which the waues of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was become very high & deep: so as the banks made ẏ entry into it very narrow, hard, & dãgerous for great ships of burdẽ that came from the sea. Marius considering this matter, set his men on worke while they had nothing to do, and made them digge a large trench and deepe channel, into the which he turned a great part of the riuer, and caried it to a conuenient place of the coast, where the water fell into the sea by an open gulfe, whereby he made it able to carie the greatest ships that were: and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not being troubled with winds nor waues. The chãnel carrieth yet his name, and is called Marius channell or trench. These barbarous people deuided themselues into two armies to passe into ITALY, so that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMBRES, to go through high GERMANIE, & to force that passage which Catulus kept: & vnto the other part, which were the TEVTONS and AMBRONS, to passe through the countrey of the GENOVESIANS by the sea side against Marius. Now the CIMBRES hauing the greater compasse to fetch about, stayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS going their way first, had in few dayes dispatched their iourney they had to go, to bring them to the campe where the ROMAINES lay, vnto whom they presẽted themselues by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to behold, and their cries and voices farre contrary vnto other mens. They took in a maruellous deale of ground in length to camp vpon, and so came forth to defie Marius, and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging defiances, but kept his men together within his camp, taking on terribly with them that would rashly take vpõ them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choler would needs go forth to fight, calling thẽ traitors to their country. For said he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glory, neither to winne triumphs nor victories for our selues: but we must seeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great shower of wars from vs, and this lightning and tempest, that it ouercome not al ITALY. These words he spake vnto the priuate captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauiour and quality: but as for the common souldiers, he made them stand vpon the trenches of his campe, one after another to behold the enemies, and to acquaint themselues with sight of their faces, their countenance, and marching, and not to be afraid of their voices, & the maner of their speech, which was wonderfull strange & beastly: and also that they might know the fashion of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order and ordinarie viewing of them, in time he made the things that seemed fearefull vnto his men at the first sight, to be afterwards very familiar: so that they made no more wondring at them. For he iudged the thing which indeed is true, that a rare and new matter neuer seene before, for lack of iudgement & vnderstanding maketh things vnknowne to vs, more horrible and fearefull then they are: and to the contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare and terror of those things, which by nature are indeed fearefull. The which was seene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to look vpon these barbarous people, it did not only diminish some part of ẏ former feare of the ROMAINE souldiers: but furthermore, they whetting their choler with the fierce vntollerable threats & bragges of these barbarous brutish people, did set their hearts afire to fight with them, because they did not only wast and destroy all the country about them, but besides that, came to giue assault euen vnto their campe, with such a boldnesse, that the ROMAINE souldiers could no longer suffer them, and they letted not to speake words that came to Marius cares himself: What cowardlinesse hath Marius euer knowne in vs, that he keepes vs thus from fighting, and vnder locke and key as it were, in the guard of porters, as if we were women?

Let vs therfore ſhew our ſelues like men, and go aske him if he looke for any other ſouldiers, beſides our ſelues to defend ITALY: and if he haue determined to employ vs as pioners only, when he would caſt a trench to rid away the mud, or to turne a riuer contrary. For therin hath he only hitherto employed vs in great labour, and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Conſulſhips, wherof he maketh his boaſt vnto them at ROME. Is he afraid they ſhould take him as they did Carbo & Capio, whom the enemies haue ouerthrowne? He muſt not be afraid of that: for he is a captaine of another maner of valour and reputation then they were, & his army much better then theirs was. But howſoeuer it be, yet were it much better (in prouing) to loſe ſomething, then to be idle, & to ſuffer our friends & confederates to be deſtroyed and ſacked before our eyes. Marius was maruellous glad to heare his men complaine thus, and did comfort them, and told them that he did nothing miſtruſt their courage and valiantneſſe: howbeit that through the counſell of certaine prophecies and oracles of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for victory. For he euer caried a SYRIAN womã in a litter about with him, called Martha, with great reuerence, whom they ſaid had the ſpirit of prophecy in her: and that he did euer ſacrifice vnto the gods by her order, and at ſuch time as ſhe willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman wẽt firſt to ſpeake with the Senate about theſe matters, and did foretell and prognoſticate what ſhould follow: but the Senate would not heare her, and made her to be driuen away. Whereupon ſhe went vnto the women, and made them ſee proofe of ſome things ſhe vaunted of, and ſpecially Marius wife, at whoſe feete ſhe was ſet one day in aſſembly of the cõmon playes, to ſee ẏ ſword players fight for life & death: for ſhe told her certainly which of them ſhould ouercome. Whereupon this Lady ſent her vnto her husband Marius, who made great reckoning of her, & carried her euer in a litter with him wherſoeuer he went. She was alwaies at Marius ſacrifices, apparelled in a gowne of purple in graine, claſped to her with claſpes, & held a ſpeare in her hand woũd all about with noſegayes & garlands of flowers tied on with laces. This maner of geſt made many doubt whether Marius ſhewed this woman openly, beleeuing indeed that ſhe had the gift of prophecy: or elſe that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleeue it, to helpe her faining. But that which Alexander the MINDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondred at. For he ſaid, there were two of them followed Marius in his warres, and that they euer ſhewed themſelues and miſſed not, when he ſhould win any great battell, and that they did know them by lattin collars they ware about their neckes, which the ſouldiers had tied about them, & afterwards let them go where they would: by reaſon whereof, they did know the ſouldiers againe, and it ſeemed alſo that they ſaluted them, and were very glad when they ſaw them, and perſwaded themſelues, that it was a ſigne and token of good luck to follow. Many ſignes & tokens were ſeene before the battel: howbeit all the reſt were ordinary ſights, ſauing that which was reported to be ſeene at TVDERTVM, and AMERIA, two cities of ITALY. For they ſay, there were ſeene ſpeares & targets in the night, burning like fire in the elemẽt, which firſt were caried vp & downe here & there, and then met together euen as men moue and ſtir that fight one with another, vntill at the length, the one giuing back, and the other following after, they all vaniſhed away, & conſumed towards the Weſt. About the ſelfſame time alſo, there came from the city of PESSINVNTA, Barabaces, the chiefe prieſt of the great mother of the gods, who brought newes, that the goddeſſe had ſpoken to him within her ſanctuary, and told him that the victory of this war ſhould fall out on the ROMAINES ſide. The Senate beleeued it, & ordained that they ſhould build a temple vnto the goddeſſe, to giue her thanks for the victory which ſhe did promiſe thẽ. Barabaces alſo would haue preſented himſelfe vnto the people in open aſſembly, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune, that wold not ſuffer him to do it, calling him tumbler or iugler, & violently thruſt him behind the pulpit for orations: but the miſchance that fell vpon Pompeius afterwards, made them the more to beleeue Barabaces words. For Pompeius ẏ Tribune no ſooner came home to his houſe, but a great vehement ague tooke him, whereof he died the ſeuenth day after, as all the world could witneſſe. Now the TEVTONS perceiuing that Marius ſtirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to aſſault him: howbeit they were ſo well receiued with ſhot and ſlings, that after they had loſt certaine of their men, they gaue it ouer, and determined to go further, perſwading themſelues that they might eaſily paſſe the Alpes without danger. Wherefore truſſing vp all their baggage, they paſſed by Marius campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruellous great multitude of people, by ẏ length of time which they took to paſſe their way. For it is ſaid, they were paſſing by his camp

ſixe daies continually together. And as they came raking by the Romaines campe, they asked them in mockery, If they would write to ſend home any thing to their wiues; for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all paſſed and gone, and continued on their iourny ſtill, Marius alſo raiſed his campe, and followed them faire and ſoftly foot by foot, and euer kept hard at their taile as neare as he could, alwaies fortifying his campe very well, and euer chuſing ſtrong places of ſituation & aduantage to lodge in, that they might be ſafe in the night time. So they marched on in this ſort, vntill they came vnto the city of Aix, frō whence they had not far to go, but they entred ſtraight into the mountaines of the Alpes: wherfore Marius prepared now to fight with them, and choſe out a place that was very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge his campe in, howbeit there lacked water. And they ſay he did it of purpoſe, to the end to quicken his mens courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and told him that they ſhould ſtand in great danger to abide maruellous thirſt if they lodged there. Whereunto he made anſwer: ſhewing them the riuer that ran hard by the enemies campe, ſaying withall, That they muſt go thither and buy drinke with their bloud. The ſouldiers replied againe: And why then do ye not leade vs thither, whileſt our bloud is yet moiſt? He gently anſwered them againe: Becauſe the firſt thing we do, we muſt fortifie our campe. The ſouldiers though they were angry with him, yet they obeyed him: but the ſlaues hauing neither drinke for themſelues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troupe of them, and went towards the riuer: ſome of them carying axes, other hatchets, other ſwords & ſpeares, with their pots to carry water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwiſe they could not come by it. A few of the barbarous people at the firſt fought with them, becauſe the moſt part of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were ſtil in the bathe waſhing themſelues, finding in that place many ſprings of hot natural bathes. Thus the Romaines found many of the barbarous people making merrie, and taking their pleaſure about theſe bathes, for the great delight they took to conſider the pleaſantneſſe of the place: but when they heard the noiſe of them that fought, they began to runne one after another vnto the place from whence the noiſe came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keepe the Romaine ſouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their ſlaues ſhould haue bene ſlaine of the barbarous people: and moreouer, becauſe the valianteſt ſoldiers of their enemies, called the Ambrons (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cæpio, two Romaine Captaines with their armies, and that made of themſelues thirty thouſand fighting men) ran to armes, being very heauy of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwiſe valiant & couragious fellowes, and more liuely then they had wont to be, by reaſon of the wine they had drunk. They ran not furiouſly to fight out of order, neither did they cry out confuſedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noiſe with their harneſſe all after one ſort, they oft rehearſed their owne name, Ambrons, Ambrons, Ambrons: which was, either to call one another of thē, or elſe to feare the Romaines with their name only. The Italians alſo on the other ſide, being the firſt that came downe to fight with them, were the Ligvrians, dwelling vpon the coaſt of Genva, who hearing this noiſe & crie of theirs, plainely vnderſtanding them: anſwered them againe with ẏ like noiſe & cry, Ligvrians, Ligvrians, Ligvrians, ſaying, that it was the true ſurname of all their nation. And ſo before they ioyned together, this cry was redoubled many a time on either ſide: and the Captaines of both parts made their ſouldiers crie out all together, contēding for enuy one againſt another, who ſhold cry it loudeſt. This contention of crying, inflamed the ſouldiers courages the more. Now the Ambrons hauing the riuer to paſſe, were by this meanes put out of order, & before they could put themſelues in battell ray againe, after they had paſſed the riuer, the Ligvrians ran with great fury to ſet vpon the foremoſt: and after them, (to aide the Ligvrians that had begun the charge) the Romaines themſelues fel alſo vpon the Ambrons, coming downe from the places of aduantage vpon theſe barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, & flie. So the greateſt ſlaughter they made, fortuned vpon the banke of the riuer, whereinto they thruſt one another in ſuch ſort, that al the riuer ran bloud, being filled with dead bodies. And they that could get ouer the riuer againe, and were on the other ſide, durſt not gather together any more to ſtand to defence: ſo as the Romaines ſlue them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their carriage. Then their women came out againſt them with ſwords and axes in their hands, grinding their teeth: and crying out for ſorrow and anger, they charged aſwell vpon their own people that fled, as vpon them that chaſed them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies.

Furthermore, they thruſt themſelues amongſt them that fought, & ſtroue by force to plucke the Romaines targets out of their hands, & took hold of their naked ſwords bare handed, abiding with an inuincible courage to be hacked and mangled with their ſwords. And thus was the firſt battell giuen (as they ſay) by the riuers ſide, rather by chance vnlooked for, then by any ſet purpoſe, or through the Generals counſel. Now the Romaines after they had ouercome the moſt part of the Ambrons, retiring backe by reaſon the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had giuen ſuch an ouerthrow) ſing ſongs of victory & triumph, nor make good cheare in their tents one with another, and leaſt of all ſleepe: (which is the beſt & ſweeteſt refreſhing for men that haue fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, becauſe their camp was not trenched & fortified, and becauſe they knew alſo that there remained almoſt innumerable thouſands of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: beſides alſo, that the Ambrons that had fled & ſcaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with loud cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and ſighes, but rather like wild beaſts bellowing & roaring. So that the bellowing of ſuch a great multitude of beaſtly people, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the mountaines thereabours and the running riuer to rebound againe of the ſound and eccho of their cries maruellouſly: by reaſon whereof, all the valley that lay betweene both, thundred to heare the horrible & fearefull trembling. This made the Romaine ſouldiers afeard, & Marius himſelf in ſome doubt: becauſe they looked to haue bene fought withall the ſame night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithſtanding, the barbarous people did not aſſault them that night, nor the next day following, but onely prepared themſelues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there were aboue the place where they were camped, certaine caues & litle valleys couered with wood: he ſecretly ſent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thouſand footmen well armed, and commanded him to keep cloſe in ambuſh, vntil he ſaw that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he ſhould come and ſet vpon their rereward. The reſidue of his army, they ſupped when time came, and after ſupper repoſed themſelues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the field out of his fort: where he put them in order of battell, ſending his horſemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmiſh. The Teutons ſeeing them come, had not the patience to tarie till the Romaines were come downe into the plaine to fight without aduantage, but arming themſelues in haſte, and in a rage, ran vp the hil to the Romaines, where they ſtood in battel ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, ſent here and there vnto the priuate captaines, charging them they ſhould not ſtir, and only to temporize & forbeare, vntil the enemies came within a ſtones caſt of them: and that they ſhould then throw their darts at them, and afterwards draw their ſwords, and repulſe the barbarous people with their ſhields. For he did foreſee, that when they ſhould climbe vp againſt the hill (vpon the hanging whereof the Romaines had ſet their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and ranks could ſtand cloſe together to any effect or purpoſe: becauſe they could not haue ſure footing, nor march aſſuredly, but would eaſily be throwne backward if they were neuer ſo litle repulſed: by reaſon of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his folke, and therewithal was himſelf the firſt man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a warrier, and as valiant a ſouldier, as any man in all his army: beſides, not one amongſt them all would venture further, and be more bold then himſelfe. So when the Romaines had reſiſted them, & ſtaid them ſodainly, going with fury to haue won the hill, perceiuing themſelues to be repulſed, they gaue back by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field, and then began the foremoſt of them to gather together, & to put themſelues in battel ray vpon the plaine, when ſodainely they heard the noiſe and charging of them that were in the taile of their army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occaſion when it was offered him, becauſe that the noiſe of the firſt charge coming vp againſt the hils thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambuſh, gaue him aduertiſement thereof: whereupon he cauſed his men preſently to ſhew, & running with great cries, came to giue a charge vpō thoſe which were in the taile of the barbarous people, putting the hindmoſt to ỹ ſword. They made their fellowes whoſe backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces, & ſo from man to man, till at the length in ſhort time all their battell began to wauer in diſorder: & they made no great reſiſtance, when they ſaw they were ſo charged before & behind, but began ſtraight to flie for life. The Romaines following thē hard at ỹ heeles, killed & tooke priſoners aboue a hundred thouſand of them, & tooke moreouer their carts, their tents, & al their cariage.

Marius ſecond battell with the Teutons

Marius victory of the Teutons & Ambrō.

Which

Which the whole army by conſent agreed to preſent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, ſauing that which was imbezelled and conueied away vnder hand. Now, though this was a maruellous honorable & right noble preſent, yet they thought it not a recompence ſufficient for that he had deſerued, for the valour he had ſhewed of a famous Captaine, in leading of his army, and for the good order he kept in this war: ſo happy thought they themſelues to haue eſcaped ſo great a dãger. Notwithſtanding, ſome writers do not agree, that the ſpoile of the barbarous people was giuen vnto Marius: nor that there were alſo ſo great a number of men ſlaine as we haue ſpoken of. But they ſay, that after this battell, the MARSILIANS did incloſe their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and conſumed vpon the fields through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed ſo fat, and did ſoake the greaſe ſo deepe in the ſame, that the ſommer following, they did beare an incredible quãtity of all ſorts of fruits. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proued true, that the arable land doth wax fat with ſuch rottennes or putrifaction. And it is ſaid alſo, that of ordinary after great battels, there falleth great ſtore of raine. Either it is by meane of ſome god, that powring downe pure raine water, doth purifie, waſh, & cleanſe the ground, defiled & polluted with mans bloud: or elſe it happeneth by naturall cauſe: for that the ouerthrow of ſo many dead bodies, and of the bloud ſpilt, ingendreth a moiſt, groſſe, and heauy vapor, which doth thicken the aire (that by nature is changeable, & eaſie to alter) from a very ſmall or litle beginning, vnto an exceeding great change. After this battell, Marius cauſed the harneſſe and ſpoiles of the barbarous people to be laid aſide, that were left whole & faire to ſight, to beautifie & enrich the pompe of his triumph. Then he cauſed the reſt to be gathered together on a great heape, and laid vpon a ſtack of wood, to make a noble ſacrifice vnto the gods, all his army being armed about him, crowned with garlands of triumph, & himſelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuſtome of the ROMAINES in ſuch a caſe, & holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he firſt lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning down ẏ torch to put fire to the ſtacke of wood, they ſaw ſome of his friends a good way off on horſebacke, coming poſt vnto him: then ſodainely there was a great ſilence made of al the aſſembly, euery man deſirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted off their horſes, they ran ſtraight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was choſen Conſull the fift time: and preſented him the letters ſent him from ROMÆ confirming the ſame. And thus, this new ioy falling out beſides the victory, the priuate ſouldiers did ſhew the great ioy and pleaſure they tooke in both, with great ſhouts and beating vpon their harneſſe: and the Captaines alſo crowned Marius againe with new garlands of lawrel which they put about his head: & that done, he put fire vnder the ſtack of wood, and ended his ſacrifice. But that which neuer ſuffereth men quietly to enioy the good hap of any victory clearely, but in this mortal life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either Fortune or ſpite of fatall deſtiny, or elſe the neceſſity of the naturall cauſes of earthly things: did ſhortly after this great ioy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Cõſul, who was like a cloud in a faire bright day, & brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare & trouble. For Catulus that went againſt the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keep the ſtraights of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for paſſing: becauſe that in ſo doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his army into many parts, & had weakened himſelfe very much if he had taken that courſe. Wherefore coming a litle on this ſide the Alpes towards ITALY, he planted himſelfe vpon the riuer of ATHESIS, and built a bridge vpon it, to paſſe and repaſſe ouer his men when he would; and ſet vp at either end of the bridge two ſtrong forts well fortified, that he might more commodiouſly helpe the places on the other ſide of the riuer, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the ſtraights of the mountaines. Now, theſe barbarous people had ſuch a glory in themſelues, and diſdained their enemies ſo much, that more to ſhew their force and boldneſſe, then of any neceſſity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they ſuffered it to ſnow vpon them being ſtarke naked, and did climbe vp to the top of the mountaines, through great heapes of yce and ſnow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laid their long broade targets vnder their bodies, and lay along vpon them, ſliding downe the ſteepe high rockes, that had certaine hangings ouer of an infinite height. In the end, they came to the camp neare vnto the ROMAINES by the riuers ſide, and conſidered how they might paſſe it ouer: and began to fill it vp, tearing downe (like giants) great hils of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the rootes, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, & whole towers of earth after them, to ſtop and breake the courſe of the riuer. But beſides all this, they threw great timber into the riuer, which being carried downe the ſtreame, came with ſuch a force, & hit againſt the poſts of the bridge ſo violently, that they ſhaked the ROMAINES bridge maruellouſly. Whereupon many of the ſouldiers of the great campe were afraid, and forſaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfect good Captaine ſhew, that he made leſſe account of his owne priuate honour and eſtimation, then he did of the generall honour of all his ſouldiers. For, ſeeing that he could not perſwade his men by any reaſon to tarrie, and that in this feare they diſlodged, in diſorder againſt his will: he himſelf commanded the ſtanderd bearer of the Eagle to march on, and ran to the foremoſt that went their way, & marched himſelf before them all, to the intent that the ſhame of this retire ſhould altogether light vpon him, and not vpon his countrey: and that it might appeare the ROMAINES did follow their captaine, & not flie away. The barbarous people therfore aſſaulting the fort at ỹ end of the bridge of the riuer of ATHESIS, took it, and al the men that were in it. And becauſe the ROMAINES defended it like valiant men, and had luſtily ventured their liues to the death for defence of their country: the barbarous people let them go vpon compoſition, which they ſware to keepe faithfully, by their Bul of copper. This Bull afterwards was taken when they loſt the battell, and carried (as they ſay) into Catulus Luctatius houſe, as the chiefeſt thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the country open without any defence, ſcattered here and there, and deſtroyed all where they came. Wherupon the ROMAINES ſent for Marius to ROME to go againſt them: & after he was arriued, euery man thought he ſhould haue entred in triumph, becauſe alſo the Senate did grant it him very willingly. But he would not doe it, either becauſe he would not depriue his ſouldiers and the captaines that had fought vnder him, of any part of the honour that was due vnto them, they being abſent: or becauſe that he would warrant the people from the preſent dãger they were in, by laying aſide the glory of his former victories, into the hands of the good fortune of ROME, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honorable and perfect confirmation of the ſecond. Wherefore after he had made an oration to the people and Senate, according to the time, he went his way immediatly towards Catulus Luctatius, whoſe comming did comfort him much: and ſent alſo for his army that was yet in GAVLE beyond the mountaines. And after his army was come, he paſſed the riuer of PO, to keepe the barbarous people from hurting ITALY on this ſide the Po. Now the CIMBRES ſtill deferred to giue battell, becauſe they looked for the TEVTONS, & ſaid: that they maruelled much what they meant to tarry ſo long: either becauſe they knew not indeed of their ouerthrow, or elſe for that they would not ſeeme to know it, becauſe they handled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deaths. At the length, they ſent vnto Marius to aske him lands and towne ſufficient to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambaſſadors what brethren they meant. They anſwered that they were the TEVTONS. Whereat the ſtanders by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, ſaying: Care not for thoſe brethren, ſaid he, for we haue giuen thẽ ground enough, which they will keepe for euer. Theſe Ambaſſadors found his mocke ſtraight, and began to reuile and threaten him, that the CIMBRES ſhould preſently make him repent it, & the TEVTONS ſo ſoone as they arriued. Why, ſaid Marius vnto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honeſty in you, if you ſhould go your way & not ſalute them, ſince they are your brethren. And as he ſpake theſe words, he cõmanded his men to bring him the kings of the TEVTONS boũd and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQVANI. The CIMBRES vnderſtanding this by report of their Ambaſſadors, preſently marched towards Marius, who ſtirred not at all, but onely fortified and kept his campe. They ſay, that it was for this battel that Marius firſt inuẽted the new deuice he brought in for the dart which the ROMAINES were wont alwaies to throw againſt the enemies at the firſt charge. For, before the ſtaffe of the dart was faſtened vnto the yron, and the yron vnto the ſtaffe, with two litle yron pins that paſſed through the wood: and then Marius left one of the yron pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a litle thin pin of wood eaſie to be broken, in place of the ſame; making it craftily, to the end that when the dart was throwne, and ſtucke in the enemies target, it ſhould not ſtand right forward, but bow downewards towards the yron, that the woodden pin being broken, the ſtaffe of the dart ſhould hang downewards, holding yet by the yron pin running quite through at the point. So Bœorix King of the CIMBRES, coming neare to Marius campe with a ſmall

Marius deuice for altering the dart in fight.

Bœorix King of the Cimbres,

ſmall number of horſemen, ſent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day & place for battell, that they might trie it out, who ſhould be owners of the country. Whereunto Marius made anſwer, that it was not the manner of the Romaines to counſel with their enemies, of the time and place when they ſhould giue battell: but neuertheleſſe, he would not ſticke to pleaſure the Cimbres ſo much. And thus they agreed betweene them, that it ſheuld be the third day following, in the plaine of Verſelles, which was very commodious for the horſemen of the Romaines: and alſo for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conſul, had in his campe twenty thouſand, and three hundred ſouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thouſand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the battell, ſhutting in Catulus with his men in the midſt; as Sylla writeth it, who was preſent at the ſame: ſaying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrow his enemies with the two wings of the battell, to the end that the whole victory ſhould light vpon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the midſt ſhould haue no part thereof. For he could not ſo much as front the enemie, becauſe that commonly when the front of a battell is of ſuch a breadth, the two wings are euer ſtretched out before, and are made like the creſſant of a moone, where the middeſt is thickeſt & fartheſt in. And it is written alſo in other ſtories, that Catulus himſelfe accuſing the malice of Marius, becauſe he did ſo, ſpake it to excuſe his owne diſhonour. As for the Cimbres, the troupes of their footmen coming out of their fortes leiſurely, did put themſelues into a ſquadron, as broade as long, for in euery ſide they occupied almoſt thirty furlong: but their horſemen, which were fifteene thouſand, marched before in ſumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heads faſhioned like wild beaſts necks, and ſtrange beuers or buffes to the ſame, and ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, as they had bene wings: which to ſight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curaces on their backs, & carried great white targets before them: and for weapons offenſiue, euery man had two darts in his hand to beſtow a far off, and when they came to hand ſtrokes, they had great beauy ſwords, which they fought withall neare hand. But at that time they did not march directly in ranke againſt the army of the Romaines, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to incloſe the Romaines betweene them and their footmen that were on the left hand. The Romaine Captaines found their policy ſtraight, but they could not keepe their ſouldiers back: for there was one that cried, The enemies fled, and immediatly all the reſt began to run after. In the meane time, the footmen of the barbarous people that were like to a ſea before them, came forwards ſtill: and then Marius hauing waſhed his hands, and lifting them to heauen, promiſed and vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the gods of an hundred oxen. Catulus alſo made a vow, lifting vp his hands to heauen in like manner, that he would build a temple vnto Fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing ſacrifiſed, when they ſhewed him the intrails of the beaſts ſacrificed, he cried out aloud, The victory is mine. But when they came to giue the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred vpon him by Gods iuſtice, who turned his craft againſt himſelfe, as Sylla writeth: for there roſe very credibly ſo great a duſt, that both armies loſt the ſight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the firſt that ran to begin the charge, and hauing placed his men about him, miſſed to meete with his enemies: and being paſſed beyond their battell, wandred a great while vp and downe the field, whileſt the barbarous people fought againſt Catulus. So that the greateſt fury of the battel was againſt Catulus and his army: in the which Sylla writeth he was himſelf, and ſaith, that the heate and the Sun which was full in the Cimbres faces, did the Romaines maruellous pleaſure at that time. For the barbarous people being very hard brought vp to away with cold (becauſe they were borne and bred in a cold country, ſhadowed altogether with woods and trees, as we haue ſaid) were to the contrary very tender againſt the heate, & did melt with ſweating againſt the Sun, and gaped ſtraight for breath, putting their targets before their faces: for it was alſo in the heart of Summer, about the ſeuen & twentieth day of the moneth of Iuly that his battell was giuen; & this duſt alſo made the Romaines the bolder, and kept them that they could not ſee the innumerable multitude of their enemies far from them. And euery man running to ſet vpon them that came againſt him, they were ioyned together in fight, before that the ſight of their enemies could make them afraid. And furthermore, they were ſo good ſouldiers, and ſo able to take paines, that how extreme ſoeuer the heate was, no man was ſeene ſweate nor blow, though they ran at the firſt to ſet vpon them: and this hath Catulus Luctatius himſelf left in writing vnto the praiſe of his ſoldiers. So were the moſt part of the barbarous people, and ſpecially of the beſt ſouldiers, ſlaine in the field. And becauſe they ſhould not open and breake their rankes, the formoſt rancks were al tied and bound together with girdles, leather thongs, and long chaines of iron: and they that fled, were chaſed and followed into their campe by the Romaines, where they met with horrible & feareful things to behold. For, their wiues being vpon the top of their carts, apparelled all in black, ſlue all thoſe that fled, without regard of perſons: ſome their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren; and ſtrangling the little young babes with their owne hands, they caſt them vnder the cart wheeles, and betweene the horſe legs, and afterwards ſlue themſelues. And they ſay, that there was a woman hanged at the end of a cart ladder, hauing hanged vp two of her children by the neckes at her heeles. And that the men alſo, for lacke of a tree to hang themſelues on, tyed ſlipping halters about their neckes, vnto the hornes and feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwards with goades to make them fling and leape ſo long, that dragging them all about and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. Now though numbers were ſlaine by this meane, yet were there threeſcore thouſand of them taken priſoners, and the number of them that were ſlaine, came to twiſe as many mo. In this manner Marius ſouldiers ſpoiled the campe of the Cimbres: but the ſpoiles of dead men that were ſlaine in the field, with their enſignes and trumpets, were all brought (as it is ſaid) vnto Catulus campe, which was a plaine teſtimonie to ſhew that Catulus and his ſouldiers had won the field. Strife riſing thus betweene the ſouldiers of both campes about it: that the matter might be tried friendly betweene them, they made ỹ ambaſſadors of Parma their arbitrators, who were by chance at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius ſoldiers led the ambaſſadors to the place where ỹ ouerthrow was giuen, ſhewing them the enemies bodies pierced through with their pikes, which were eaſie to be knowne, becauſe Catulus had made them graue their name vpon their pikes. For al this, Marius went away with the honor of this great victory, as wel for the firſt battel he wan alone, when he ouerthrew the Teutons and the Ambrons, as for his great calling, hauing bene Conſul fiue times. And furthermore, the common people at Rome, called him the third founder of the city of Rome, thinking themſelues now deliuered from as great a danger, as before time they had bene from the ancient Gavles. And euery man feaſting at home with his wife & children, offered the beſt diſhes of meat they had to ſupper, vnto the gods, and vnto Marius: and would needs haue him alone to triumph for both victories. But he would not in any caſe, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to ſhew himſelf courteous and moderate in ſo great proſperity: and peraduenture alſo fearing Catulus ſouldiers, who were in readineſſe and prepared (if Marius would haue depriued their captaine of that honor) to let him alſo of his triumph. And thus you ſee how he paſſed his fifth Conſulſhip. After that, he made more earneſt ſute for the ſixth Conſulſhip, then euer any other did for his firſt: ſeeking the peoples good wils by al the faire meanes he could to pleaſe them, humbling himſelfe vnto them, not only more then became his eſtate & calling, but directly alſo againſt his own nature, counterfeiting a curteous popular maner, being cleane contrary to his diſpoſition. His ambition made him timorous to deale in matters of the ſtate concerning the city. For that courage and boldnes which he had in battell againſt the enemy, he loſt it quite when he was in an aſſembly of people in the city: & was eaſily put out of his bias, with the firſt blame or praiſe he heard giuen him. And though they report, that on a time whē he made a thouſand Camerines free of the city of Rome, becauſe they had done valiant ſeruice in the wars, that there were ſome that did accuſe him, ſaying, that it was a thing done againſt all law: he anſwered them, that for the noiſe of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithſtanding, it ſeemeth that indeed he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an aſſembly of the city. For in time of wars, he euer ſtood vpon his reputation & authority, knowing that they had need of him: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, becauſe he would rather be the chiefeſt man then the honeſteſt man, he would creepe into the peoples boſomes to get their fauor & goodwill. And thus through his euill behauior, he brought all the Nobility generally to be his enemies. But he feared nor miſtruſted none ſo much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankful part he remembred he had plaid him: & the rather alſo, becauſe he knew him to be a iuſt & true dealing man, and one that was euer againſt theſe people-pleaſers and flatterers. Marius therefore practiſed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be baniſhed Rome. Wherfore, to compaſſe passe his intent, he fell in friendship with Glaucia and one Saturninus, two of the most bold, most desperate, and most hairebraind yong men that were in all ROME, who had all the rabblement of rogues and beggers, and such tumultuous people at their commandement: by whose meanes he made new popular lawes, & caused the souldiers to be called home out of the wars, and mingled them with the people of the city in common assemblies, to trouble and vexe Metellus. Moreouer Rutilius, an honest and true writer, (howbeit an enemie vnto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his sixth Consulship by corruption of mony, which he caused to be distributed amongst the tribes of the people: and that he bought it for ready money to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaccus not for his fellow and companion in the Consulship, but rather for a minister of his will. There was neuer ROMAINE to whom the people granted the Consulship sixe times, except it were vnto Valerius Coruinus only. But for him, they say that there was fiue and forty yeares betweene his first Consulship & the last. Where Marius since the first yeare of his Consulship, continued fiue yeares together by good fortune one after another. But in his last Consulship, he wanne himselfe great hate and malice, because he did many foule faults to please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneship. Afterwards when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for distribution of the lands among the common people, and vnto that law he had specially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate should cõme openly to sweare, that they should keepe and obserue from point to point, that which the people by their voices should decree and should not deny it in any iote. But Marius in open Senate, made as though he wold withstand this article, saying, that neither he nor any other wise man of iudgment would take this oath: for said he, if the law be euill, then they should doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to grant it, and not for their owne good wils. But he spake not that, meaning to do as he said: for it was but a bait he had laid for Metellus only, which he could hardly escape. For, imagining that to tell a fine lye, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly resolued with himself, not to passe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the cõtrary also, knowing wel inough that Metellus was a graue wise man, who esteemed that to be iust and true (as Pindarus said) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought he would ouerreach him, making him affirm before the Senate that he would not sweare, knowing also that the people would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwards to sweare. And so indeed it happened. For Metellus hauing assured them then that he would not sweare, the Senate brake vp vpon it. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to sweare before the people: Marius went thither to offer himselfe to sweare. Whereupon the people making silence, listened attentiuely to heare what he would say. But Marius not regarding his large promise and brags made before the Senate, said then, his necke was not so long that he would preiudice the common-wealth in a matter of so great importance: but that he would sweare, and obey the law, if it were a law. This shifting subtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his shame: and when he had said so, he tooke his oth. The people seeing him sweare, were maruellous glad, and praised him with clapping of their hands: but the Nobility hanging downe their heads, were ashamed of him, and were maruellous angrie in their hearts with him, that he had so cowardly & shamefully gone from his word. Therupon all the Senate tooke their othes, one after another against their wils, because they were afraid of the people: sauing Metellus, whom, neither parents, nor friends perswasion and intreaty could once moue to sweare, for any punishment that Saturninus had imposed vpon them which refused to take the oath, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would neuer yeeld vnto it, offering to abide any paine, rather then to be brought to cõsent to a dishoneste matter vnbeseeming his estate. And therupon went out of the assembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do euill it was too easie a thing: and to do good without danger, it was also a common matter: but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honest and vertuous man. Saturninus then commanded the Consuls by edict of the people, that they should banish Metellus by sound of trumpet, with speciall commandement, that no man should let him haue fire nor water, nor lodge him priuately nor openly. The common people, they were ready to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the iniurie they had offered him, gathered together about him to saue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus himself was so good a man, that he wold not any ciuill dissentiõ should riſe for his ſake: and therefore he abſented himſelf from Rome, wherein he did like a wiſe man. For ſaid he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting themſelues of the wtong they haue done me, will call me home againe; or elſe things ſtanding as they do now, it ſhall be beſt for me to be furtheſt off. But for his trauell in his exile, how much he was beloued and honoured, and how ſweetly he paſſed his time ſtudying Philoſophie in the citie of Rhodes, ſhall be declared more at large in his life. Now on the other ſide, Marius to recompence the pleaſure Saturninus had done him, being driuen to let him haue his will in all things, did not foreſee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the commonwealth, giuen the bridle to a deſperat man, who euery way, by force, by ſword and murder, plainely ſought to vſurpe tyrannicall power, with the vtter deſtruction and ſubuerſion of the whole commonwealth. And ſo bearing reuerence on the one ſide vnto the Nobility, and deſiring on the other ſide to gratifie the common people: he played a ſhamefull part, and ſhewed himſelf a double dealing man. For one night the Nobility and chiefeſt citizens coming to his houſe, to perſwade him to bridle Saturninus inſolencie and boldneſſe: at the ſelfe ſame time alſo Saturninus going thither to ſpeake with him, he cauſed him to be let in at a backe doore, the noble men not being priuy to his coming. And ſo Marius telling the Nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a looſeneſſe of his body, vnder his pretence whipped vp and downe, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing elſe but ſet them further out one againſt another, then they were before. Neuertheles, the Senat being maruellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knights taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to arme the people in ẏ market place, to ſuppreſſe them that were vp, and draue them into the Capitoll; where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yeeld themſelues at the length, becauſe he had cut off the pipes & conduits, by the which the water ran vnto the Capitol. By reaſon whereof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Marius vnto them, and yeelded themſelues to him, vnder the aſſurance of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could poſſible to his vttermoſt power to ſaue them, he could not preuaile, nor do them pleaſure: for they were no ſooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Wherupon he hauing now purchaſed himſelf the ill will of the people & Nobility both, when time came about that new Cenſors ſhould be choſen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the ſuters: howbeit he ſued not for it, for feare of repulſe, but ſuffered others to be choſen of far leſſe dignity & calling then himſelfe. Wherein notwithſtanding he gloried, ſaying, that he would not ſue to be Cenſor, becauſe he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too ſtraightly their liues and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus baniſhment, Marius did what he could poſſible by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, ſeeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus baniſhment, Marius heart would not ſerue him to ſee Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherefore he tooke the ſeas to go into Cappadocia & Galatia, vnder colour to pay certaine ſacrifices to ẏ mother of the gods, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cauſe that made him to vndertake this iourny, for he had another ſecret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuil matters, and hauing attained to his greatnes by armes, & ſuppoſing that his glory and authority conſumed and decreaſed altogether liuing idlely in peace, he ſought to deuiſe new occaſion of wars; hoping if he could ſtir vp the kings of Asia, & ſpecially Mithridates, (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make wars againſt the Romaines) that he ſhould then vndoubtedly without let of any man be choſen Generall to make wars with him; and withall alſo, that by that meanes he ſhould haue occaſion to fill the city of Rome with new triumphs, & his houſe with the ſpoiles of the great kingdome of Pont, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates diſpoſing himſelfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor and curteſies he could poſſible ſhew him: Marius in the end notwithſtanding would not once giue him a good looke, nor a courteous word againe, but churliſhly ſaid vnto Mithridates at his departure from him: Thou muſt determine one of theſe two, king Mithridates: either to make thy ſelfe ſtronger then the Romaines, or elſe to looke to do what they command thee, without reſiſtance. Theſe words amazed Mithridates, who had heard ſay before, that ẏ Romaines would ſpeake their minds freely: howbeit he neuer ſaw nor proued it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto Rome, he built a houſe neare vnto the market place, becauſe he would not (as he ſaid himſelfe) that ſuch as came vnto him, ſhould ſhould trouble thẽſelues in going far to bring him home to his houſe: or elſe for that he thought this would be an occaſion that diuerſe would come to ſalute him, as they did other Senatours. Howbeit, that was not the cauſe indeed: but the only cauſe was, for that he had no natural grace nor ciuility to entertain mẽ curteouſly that came vnto him, & that he lacked behauiour beſides to rule a commonwealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him then they did of an old ruſty harneſſe or implement, that was good for nothing but for the wars only. And for all other that profeſſed armes as himſelfe did, no man grieued him ſo much to be called forward to office and ſtate before himſelfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burſt for ſpite, to ſee that the noblemen did all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes firſt riſing and preferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And ſpecially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a friend & confederate of the ROMAINE people, he offered vp ſtatues of victories, carrying tokens of triumph into the temple of the Capitoll: and placed neare vnto them alſo, an image of gold of king Iugurth, which he deliuered by his own hands vnto Sylla. And this made Marius ſtark mad for ſpite & ielouſie, who could not abide that another ſhould take vpon him the glory of his doings: inſomuch as he determined to plucke thoſe images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other ſide ſtomached Marius, and would not ſuffer him to take them out of the place where they were: ſo that this ciuill ſedition had taken preſent effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betweene, and reſtrained them for a time. For the beſt ſouldiers and moſt warlike people of all ITALY, and of greateſt power, they all together roſe againſt the ROMAINES, and had welneare ouerthrowne their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force and power, and well armed: but their Captaines alſo, for valiantnes & skill, did in manner equal the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this war fel out wonderfully, by reaſon of the calamity and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius ſhame and diſhonour. For he ſhewed himſelfe very cold and ſlow in al his enterpriſes, ſtill delaying time, either becauſe age had mortified his actiue heate, and killed that quicke ready diſpoſition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue threeſcore and fiue yeares old: or elſe as he ſaid himſelf, becauſe he was waxen gowty, and had ache in his veines and ſinewes, that he could not well ſtirre his body, and that for ſhame: becauſe he would not tary behind in this war, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithſtanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were ſlaine ſixe thouſand of their enemies: and ſo long as the wars endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but patiently ſuffered them ſometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and giue him vile words, challenging him out to fight, & yet all this would not prouoke him. It is ſaid alſo, that Pompedius Silo, who was the chiefeſt Captaine of reputation and authority the enemies had, ſaid vnto Marius on a time: If thou be Marius, ſo great a Captaine as they ſay thou art, leaue thy campe & come out to batell. Nay, ſaid Marius to him againe: If thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the eares, and compell me to come to battell. Another time when the enemies gaue them occaſion to giue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were faint hearted, and durſt not ſet vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius cauſed his men to aſſemble, and ſpake vnto them in this ſort: I cannot tell which of the two I ſhould recken moſt cowards: you your ſelues, or your enemies: for they durſt not once ſee your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithſtanding, he was compelled to reſigne his charge, being able to ſerue no longer for the weakneſſe and debility of his body. Now all the rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at ROME (by the orators meanes) did ſue to haue the charge of the warres againſt Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and raſh man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perſwaded them to giue him the charge of theſe wars, with title & authority of Vice-conſul. The people thereupon were deuided in two parts: for the one ſide ſtood for Marius, and the other would haue Sylla take the charge, ſaying, that Marius was to thinke now vpõ the hot baths at Baies, to look to cure his old body, brought low with rewme and age, as himſelfe ſaid. For Marius had a goodly ſtately houſe in thoſe parts neare vnto the mount of Miſene, which was far more fine and curiouſly furniſhed then became a Captaine that had bene in ſo many foughten battels and dangers. They ſay that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine houſe for the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand fiue hundred crownes; and ſhortly after alſo, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes: to ſo great exceſſe was vanity and curioſity growne in very ſhort time at Rome. Notwithſtanding all this, Marius too ambitiouſly ſtriuing like a paſſioned young man againſt the weakneſſe and debility of his age, neuer miſſed day but he would be in the field of Mars to exerciſe himſelf among the young men, ſhewing his body diſpoſed and ready to handle all kind of weapons, and to ride horſes: albeit that in his later time, he had no great health of body becauſe he was very heauy and ſad. There were that liked that paſſing wel in him, and went of purpoſe into the field to ſee what paines he tooke, ſtriuing to excell the reſt. Howbeit thoſe of the better ſort were very ſorry to ſee his auarice and ambition, conſidering ſpecially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane perſon a great eſtate, that he could not now containe his proſperity within reaſonable bounds, nor yet content himſelfe to be eſteemed and honored, quietly enioying all he had wonne, and which at that preſent he did poſſeſſe: but as if he had bene very poore and needy, after he had receiued ſuch great honor and triumphs, would yet carry out his age ſo ſtoutly, euen into Cappadocia, and vnto the realme of Pont, to goe fight there againſt Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieutenants of king Mithridates. Indeed he alledged ſome reaſons to excuſe himſelfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he ſaid that he deſired in perſon to bring vp his ſonne in exerciſe of armes, and to teach him the diſcipline of warres. That diſcouered the ſecret hidden plague, which of long time had lurked in Rome, Marius ſpecially hauing now met with a fit inſtrument and miniſter to deſtroy the commonwealth, which was the inſolent and raſh Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, ſauing that he was found too cowardly and faint-hearted in all his enterpriſes and for that did Marius iuſtly reproue him. But Sulpitius, becauſe he would not dally nor delay time, had euer fixe hundred young gentlemen of the order of knights, whom he vſed as his guard about him, and called them the guard againſt the Senate. And one day as the Conſuls kept their common aſſembly in the market place, Sulpitius coming in armed vpon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Conſuls ſons being taken tardy, was ſlaine. Sylla being the other Conſull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius houſe, ranne into the ſame againſt the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ran after him not being aware, paſſed by the houſe. And it is reported that Marius himſelfe conueyed Sylla ſafely out at a backe doore, and that he being ſcaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithſtanding, Sylla himſelfe in his commentaries doth not ſay, that he was ſaued in Marius houſe when he fled: but that he was brought thither to giue his conſent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would haue forced him vnto againſt his will, preſenting him naked ſwords on euery ſide. And he writeth alſo, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius houſe, he was kept there in this feare, vntill ſuch time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornment of iuſtice, which he and his companion by edict had commanded. This done, Sulpitius then being the ſtronger, cauſed the commiſſions and charge of this war againſt Mithridates to be aſſigned vnto Marius by the voice of the people. Therefore Marius giuing order for his departure, ſent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing won his ſouldiers hearts before, and ſtirred them vp againſt Marius, brought them on with him directly towards Rome, being no leſſe then fiue and thirty thouſand fighting men: who ſetting vpon the Captaines Marius had ſent vnto them, ſlue them in the field. In reuenge whereof Marius againe in Rome put many of Syllaes friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by ſound of trumpet, to all ſlaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered themſelues. Wherupon, hauing made a litle reſiſtance vnto Sylla when he came into Rome, he was ſoone after compelled to run his way. Marius was no ſooner out of the city, but they that were in his company forſaking him, diſperſed themſelues here and there being darke night: and Marius himſelfe got to a houſe of his in the country, called Salonium, and ſent his ſonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes, not far from thence, to make ſome prouiſion for victuals. But Marius in the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared him a ſhip, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarrying for his ſon, and hoiſſed ſaile, hauing only Granius his wiues ſonne with him. In the meane time the yonger Marius being at his father in law Mutius farme, ſtaied ſo long in getting of prouiſion, in truſſing of it vp, & carying it away, that broad day light had like to haue diſcouered him: for the enemies had aduertiſement whither he was gone, wherupon certaine horſemen were ſent thither ſuppoſing to haue found him. But the keeper of the houſe hauing an inckling of their comming, and preuen-preuenting them alſo before they came, ſodainly yoked his oxē to the cart, which he loded with beanes, & hid this yonger Marius vnder the ſame. And pricking the oxē forward with his goade, ſet out, & met them as they went towards the city, & deliuered Marius in this ſort into his wiues houſe: and there taking ſuch things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the ſea, & took ſhip, finding one croſſe-ſailed, bound towards AFRIXE. Marius the father ſailing on ſtill, had a very good wind to point along the coaſt of ITALY: notwithſtanding, being afraid of one Geminius, a chiefe man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the mariners warning therof betimes, and willed them to take heed of landing at TERRACINE. The mariners were very willing to obey him, but the wind ſtood full againſt them comming from the maine, which raiſed a great ſtorme, & they feared much that their veſſel which was but a boate, would not brooke the ſeas: beſides that, he himſelfe was very ſicke in his ſtomacke, and ſore ſea-beaten: notwithſtanding at the length with the greateſt difficulty that might be, they recouered the coaſt ouer againſt the city of CIRCES. In the meane time, the ſtorme increaſed ſtill, & their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp & downe not knowing what to do, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in ſuch like caſes of extremity, they thought it alwaies the beſt ſafety for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they ſaw not: for if the ſea were their enemy, the land was ſo likewiſe. To meete with men, they were afraid: and not to meete with them on the other ſide lacking victuals, was indeede the greater danger. Neuertheleſſe, in the end they met with heard-men that could giue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as ſoone as he could poſſible, becauſe it was not long ſince that there paſſed by a great troupe of horſemen that ſought him all about. And thus being brought vnto ſuch perplexity, that he knew not where to beſtow himſelfe, and ſpecially for that the poore men he had in his companie were almoſt ſtarued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithſtanding, and ſought out a very thicke wood, where he paſſed all that night in great ſorrow, and the next morning being compelled of neceſſity, determined yet to employ his body before all his ſtrength failed. Thus he wandred on along the ſea coaſt, ſtill comforting them that followed him the beſt he could, and praying them not to deſpaire, but to referre themſelues to him, euen vntill the laſt hope, truſting in certaine propheſies which the Soothſayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the countrey, he gathered vp in the lap of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were ſeuen young Eagles: where at his father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothſayers what that meant. They anſwered, that their ſonne ſhould one day be one of the greateſt men in the world, and that out of doubt he ſhould obtaine ſeuen times in his life the chiefeſt office of dignity in his countrey. And for that matter, it is ſaid, that ſo indeed it came to paſſe. Other hold opinion, that ſuch as were about Marius at that time, in that preſent place, and elſe where, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, beleeued it, & afterwards put it downe in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both falſe and fained. For, they ſay that the Eagle neuer hath but two young ones: by reaſon whereof it is maintained alſo, that the Poet Muſæus hath lyed, in that which he hath written in theſe verſes:

Marius found an ayrie of Eagles.

The Eagle layes three egges, and two ſhe hatcheth forth:
But yet ſhe bringeth vp but one, that any thing is worth.

How many egges the Eagle layeth.

Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying ſaid, that he was aſſured he ſhould come vnto the ſeuenth Conſulſhip. When they were come neare now to the city of MINTVRNES, about two miles and a halfe from it, they might perceiue a troupe of horſemen coming by the ſea ſide, and two ſhips on the ſea that fell vpon the coaſt by good hap. Wherefore they all began to run (ſo long as they had breath and ſtrength) towards the ſeas into the which they threw themſelues, and got by ſwimming vnto one of the ſhips where Granius was: and they croſſed ouer vnto the Ile that is right againſt it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauy and ſicke of body, two of his ſeruants holpe to hold him vp alwayes aboue water, with the greateſt paine and difficulty in the world: and at the laſt they laboured ſo throughly, that they put him into the other ſhip at the ſelfeſame preſent, when the horſemen came vnto the ſea ſide; who cried out aloud to the mariners to land againe, or elſe throw Marius ouer boord, and then to go where they would. Marius on the other ſide humbly beſought them with teares, not to doe ſo: whereby the maſters of the ſhip in a ſhort ſpace were in many minds whether to do it, or not to do it. In the end notwithſtanding, they anſwered the horſemen, they would not throw him ouerboord: ſo the horſemen went their way in a great rage. But aſſoone as they were gone, the maſter of the ſhippe changing mind, drew towards land, and caſt anker about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her bankes, and maketh great mariſhes: and there they told Marius he ſhould do wel to go on land to eate ſomwhat, & refreſh his ſea-ſick body, till the wind ſerued them to make ſaile, which doubtleſſe ſaid they, will be at a certaine howre when the ſea wind fals and becomes calme, and that there riſeth a little wind from the land, ingendred by the vapers of the mariſhes, which will ſerue the turne very well to take ſeas againe. Marius following their counſel, & thinking they had meant good faith, was ſet on land vpon the riuers banke: and there laid him down vpon the graſſe, nothing ſuſpecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners preſently taking their ſhip againe, and hoiſſing vp their ankers ſailed ſtraight away, and fled: iudging it no honeſtie for them to haue deliuered Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor ſafety for themſelues to haue ſaued him. Marius finding himſelfe all alone, and forſaken of euery man, lay on the ground a great while, and ſaid neuer a word: yet at the length taking heart a little to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandered vp and downe, where was neither way nor path at all, ouerthwart deepe mariſhes and great ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore old mans cottage, dwelling there in theſe mariſhes; and falling at his feet, beſought him to helpe to ſaue and ſuccour a poore afflicted man, with promiſe that one day he would giue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might eſcape this preſent danger wherein he was. The old man whether for that he had knowne Marius aforetime, or that ſeeing him (by coniecture only) iudged him to be ſome great perſonage, told him that if he meant but to lie downe and reſt himſelfe a litle, his poore cabine would ſerue that turne reaſonably well: but if he meant to wander thus, to flie his enemies that followed him, he wold thē bring him into a more ſecret place, and farther off from noiſe. Marius praied him that he would do ſo much for him: and the good man brought him into the mariſh, vnto a low place by the riuers ſide, where he made him lie downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reed and bent, and other ſuch light things as could not hurt him. He had not long bin there, but he heard a great noiſe coming towards the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of Terracinē had ſent men al about to ſeek for him, whereof ſome by chance came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatened him that he had receiued & hidden an enemy of the Romaines: Marius hearing that, roſe out of the place where the old man had laid him, and ſtripping himſelf ſtark naked, went into a part of the mariſh where the water was full of myre & mud, and there was found of thoſe that ſearched for him: who taking him out of the ſlime all naked as he was, caried him into the city of Mintvrnes, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all Italy, that they ſhould apprehend Marius, and kill him whereſoeuer they found him. Notwithſtanding, the gouernours and magiſtrates of Mintvrnes thought good firſt to conſult thereupon among themſelues, and in the meane time they deliuered him into the ſafe cuſtodie of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bene a bitter enemy of his, for an old grudge ſhe had to him, which was this. Fannia ſometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom ſhe was willing to leaue, for that they could not agree, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe ſaid, ſhe had plaid the whoore. The matter was brought before Marius in his ſixth Conſulſhip, who had giuen iudgement vpon it. Both parties being heard, & the law proſecuted on either ſide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it wel enough before, yet he took her with her faults, and long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gaue ſentence that the husband ſhould repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, ſhe ſhould pay foure farthings. This notwithſtanding, when Fannia ſaw Marius ſhe grudged him not for that, and leaſt of all had any reuenging mind in her towards him, but contrarily did cōfort & help him what ſhe could with that ſhe had. Marius thanked her maruellouſly for it, and bad her hope well: becauſe he met with ſo good lucke as he was coming to her houſe, and in this maner. As they were leading of him, when he came neare vnto Fanniaes houſe, her doore being open, there came an aſſe running out to goe drinke at a conduit not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked vpon him with a liuefull countenance, firſt of all ſtopping ſodainely before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skip by him.

Whereupon

Whereupon Marius ſtraight coniecturing with himſelf, ſaid, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould ſaue himſelfe ſooner by water then by land: becauſe that the aſſe leauing him, ran to drink, and cared not to eate. So when he had told Fannia this tale, he deſired to reſt, & prayed them to let him alone, & to ſhut the chāber doore to him. But the Magiſtrates of the city hauing conſulted together about him, in the end reſolued they muſt defer no longer time, but diſpatch him out of the way preſently. Now whē they were agreed vpon it, they could not find a man in the city that durſt take vpon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we find both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his ſword drawne in his hand. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very dark, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he ſaw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner, ſaying vnto him: O fellow, thou, dareſt thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing theſe words, ranne out of the chamber preſently, caſting his ſword in the middeſt of the floore, and cryed out theſe words onely: I cannot kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTVRNIANS afraid in the city at the firſt, but afterwards it moued thē to compaſſion. So they were angry with themſelues, and did repent them that they conuerted their counſel to ſo cruell and vnkind a deed, againſt one that had preſerued all ITALY: and to denie him aide in ſo extreme neceſſity, it was too great a ſin. Therefore let vs let him go, ſaid they to themſelues, where he will, & ſuffer him to take his fortune appointed him elſewhere: and let vs pray to the gods to pardon this offence of ours, to haue thruſt Marius naked and beggarly out of our city. For theſe conſiderations, the MINTVRNIANS went al together to Marius where he was, and ſtood about him, determining to ſee him ſafely conducted vnto the ſea ſide. Now though euery man was ready and willing to pleaſure him, ſome with one thing, ſome with another, and that they did haſten him al they could poſſible, yet they were a good while a going thither: becauſe there was a wood called Marica, that lay right in their way betweene their city and the ſea coaſt, which they greatly reuerence, & think it a ſacriledge to carie any thing out of that wood, that was once brought into it. On the other ſide, to leaue to go through this wood, and to compaſſe it round about, it would aske a maruellous long time. So they ſtanding all in doubt what they ſhould do, one of the ancienteſt men of the city ſpake aloud vnto them, and ſaid: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to ſaue Marius life. Then Marius himſelfe being the foremoſt man, taking vp ſome of the fardels which they carried with him, to pleaſure him in the ſhip, went through the wood. All other things neceſſarie being thus readily prepared for him with like good will, and ſpecially the ſhippe which one Bellæus had ordained for him: he cauſed all this ſtory to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he took ſhip. After he was departed thence, the wind by good fortune carried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he found Granius and ſome other of his friends, with whom he tooke ſea againe, and pointed towards AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to land in SICILIA, in the territorie of the city of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMAINE Quæſtor, who kept that coaſt. Marius being landed there, ſcaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he ſlue ſixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all ſpeed, croſſed the ſeas, vntill he arriued in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he firſt vnderſtood that his ſonne was ſaued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempſall King of the NVMIDIANS to beſeech him for aide. This gaue him a little courage, and made him bold to paſſe out of that Ile, into the coaſt of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernour of AFRICKE, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pitie onely he might perhaps haue helpe at his hand. Howbeit he was no ſooner landed with a few of his men, but a ſergeant came and ſaid vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernour of LYBIA, doth forbid thee to land in all this prouince: otherwiſe he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandement, and purſue thee as an enemy of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing this commandement, was ſo angry & ſory both, that he could not readily tell what anſwer to make him, and pawſed a good while, and ſaid neuer a word, ſtill eying the ſergeant with a grim looke: vntill he asked him what anſwer he would make to the Prætors commandement. Marius then fetching a deepe ſigh from his heart, gaue him this anſwer: Thou ſhalt tell Sextilius, that thou haſt ſeene Caius Marius baniſhed out of his countrey, ſitting amongſt the ruines of the city of CARTHAGE. By this anſwer, he wiſely layed the example of the ruine and deſtruction of that great city of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune, to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vpon him. In the meane time, Hiempſall king of ŷ NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to reſolue, did honourably intreate yong Marius & his company: but when they were willing to go their way, he alwaies found new occaſion to ſtay them, and was very glad to ſee that he ſtarted not for any oportunity or good occaſion that was offered: notwithſtanding, there fortuned a happie meane vnto them, whereby they ſaued themſelues. And this it was. This Marius the yonger being a faire complexioned yong man, it pitied one of the Kings concubines to ſee him ſo hardly dealt withall. This pitie of hers was a ſhadow to cloke the loue ſhe bare him, but Marius would not hearken at ŷ firſt to her inticements, & refuſed her. Yet in the end, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to eſcape thence, and conſidering that ſhe did all things for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then ſhe would haue done, if ſhe had not meant further matter vnto him, then only to enioy the pleaſure of him: he then accepted her loue and kindnes, ſo as at the length ſhe taught him a way how to flie, and ſaue himſelfe and his friends. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had embraced and ſaluted ech other, going along the ſea ſide, they found two ſcorpions fighting together. Marius tooke this for an ill ſigne: whereupon they quickly took a fiſher boat, and went into the Ile of CERCINA, which is no great diſtance off from firme land. They had no ſooner hoiſed vp anker, but they ſaw the horſmen which king Hiempſall had ſent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greateſt dangers that Marius euer eſcaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Sylla made war againſt king Mithridates Lieutenants: and furthermore, that the Conſuls being vp in armes the one againſt the other, Octauius wanne the battell, and being the ſtronger, had driuen out Cinna who ſought to haue vſurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Conſul in his place: and that Cinna on the other ſide leauied men out of other parts of ITALY, and made wars vpon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diſſention, thought good to returne as ſoone as he could poſſible into ITALY. And aſſembling certaine horſemen of the nation of the MAVRVSIANS in AFRICKE, and certaine ITALIANS that had ſaued themſelues there, vnto the number of a thouſand men in all: he took ſea, & landed in a hauen of THVSCANE called TILAMON; and being landed, proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, liberty to all ſlaues and bondmen that would come to him. So the laborers, heardmen & neat-heards of al that marſh, for the only name and reputation of Marius, ran to the ſea ſide from all parts: of the which he hauing choſen out the ſtouteſt and luſtieſt of them, wanne them ſo by faire words, that hauing gathered a great company together in few daies, he made forty ſaile of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octauius was a maruellous honeſt man, that would haue no authority otherwiſe then law and reaſon would: and that Cinna to the contrary was ſuſpected of Sylla, & that he ſought to bring in change and innouation to the commonwealth: he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius ſent firſt vnto Cinna, to let him vnderſtand that he would obey him as Conſull, and be ready to do all that he ſhould command him. Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authority of Viceconſull, and ſent him ſergeants to carrie axes and rods before him, with all other ſignes of publike authority. But Marius refuſed them, and ſaid, that pompe became not his miſerable fortune: for he euer went in a poore threed-bare gowne, and had let his haire grow ſtill after he was baniſhed, being about threeſcore and ten yeares old, and had a ſober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that ſaw him. But vnder all this counterfeite pitie of his he neuer changed his naturall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible then otherwiſe. And where he ſpake but litle, and went very demurely and ſoberly, that ſhewed rather a cankered courage within him, then a mind humbled by his baniſhment. Thus when he had ſaluted Cinna, and ſpoken to the ſouldiers, he then began to ſet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in few daies. For firſt of all, with his ſhips he cut off all the victuals by ſea, & robbed the merchants that carried corne and other victuals to ROME: ſo that in ſhort ſpace he was maſter purueyer for all neceſſary prouiſion and victuals. After this he went along the coaſt, and tooke all the cities vpon the ſea ſide, and at the length wan OSTIA alſo by treaſon, put the moſt part of them in the towne to the ſword, and ſpoiled all their goods: and afterwards making a bridge vpon the riuer of TIBER, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any manner of prouiſion by ſea. That done, he went directly towards ROME with his army, where firſt he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octauius fault: who ouerthrew himſelfe in his doings, not ſo much for lacke of reaſonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curioſitie and ſtrictneſſe in in obſeruing the law. For when diuers did perſwade him to ſet the bondmen at liberty to take armes for defence of the common-wealth: he anſwered, that he would neuer giue bondmen the law & priuiledge of a ROMAINE citizẽ, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of ROME, to maintaine the authority of the law. But when Cæcilius Metellus was come to ROME, the ſonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begun the wars in LYBIA againſt King Iugurth, was put out by Marius: the ſouldiers forſooke Octauius immediatly, and came vnto him, becauſe they tooke him to be a better captaine, and deſired alſo to haue a leader that could tell how to command them to ſaue the city, and the common-wealth. For they promiſed to fight valianly, and perſwaded themſelues that they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo that they had a skilfull and valiant captaine that could order them. Metellus miſliking their offer, commanded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Conſull: but they for ſpite went vnto the enẽmies. Metellus on the other ſide, ſeeing no good order takẽ in the city to reſiſt the enemies, got him out of ROME. But Octauius being perſwaded by certaine Soothſayers and CHALDEAN ſacrificers, who promiſed him all ſhould go well with him, taried ſtill in ROME: for that man being otherwiſe, as wiſe as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that dealt as vprightly in his Conſulſhip, not carried away with flattering tales, and one alſo that followed the ancient orders and cuſtomes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any part thereof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothſayers, wiſe men, and Aſtronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and gouernment. Wherefore, before that Marius himſelfe came into the city, Octauius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for oratiõs, & ſlaine preſently by Marius ſouldiers whom he had ſent before into the city. And it is ſaid alſo, that when he was ſlaine, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecy in his boſome: & here is to be noted a great cõtrariety in theſe two notable men, Octauius and Marius. The firſt loſt his life by truſting to Soothſaying, and the ſecond proſpered, and roſe againe, becauſe he did not deſpiſe the art of Diuination. The ſtate of ROME ſtanding then in this maner, the Senate conſulting together, ſent ambaſſadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into ROME, & not to embrue their hands with the bloud of their citizens. Cinna ſitting in his chaire as Conſull, gaue them audience, & made them a very reaſonable and curteous anſwer. Marius ſtanding by him ſpake neuer a word: but ſhewed by his ſowre looke that he would ſtraight fill ROME with murder and bloud. So when the Ambaſſadors were gone, Cinna came into ROME enuironed with a great number of ſouldiers: but Marius ſtaid ſodainly at the gate, ſpeaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a baniſhed man, and driuen out of his country by law: and therefore if they would haue him come into ROME againe, they ſhould firſt by a contrary decree aboliſh and reuoke that of his baniſhment, as if he had bene a religious obſeruer of the lawes, & as though ROME had at that preſent enioyed their freedome and liberty. Thus he made the people aſſemble in the market place to proceed to the cõfirmatiõ of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to giue their voices, diſguiſing the matter no longer, & ſhewing plainly that he meant not to be lawfully called home againe frõ exile: he came into ROME with a guard about him, of the verieſt raſcals and moſt ſhameleſſe ſlaues, called the BARDIÆANS, who came to him from all parts: and they for the leaſt word he ſpake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nod of his head made to them, ſlue many men through his commandement, and at the length ſlue Anchãrius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feet with their ſwords, becauſe only that Marius did not ſalute him whẽ he came one day to ſpeak with him. After this murther, they cõtinued killing al thẽ that Marius did not ſalute, and ſpeake vnto: for that was the very ſigne he had giuen them to kil them openly in the ſtreets before euery man; ſo that his very friends were afeard of being murthered, when they came to ſalute him. Thus a great number of men being ſlaine, Cinna in the end began to be ſatisfied and to appeaſe his anger. But Marius anger & vnſatiable deſire of reuenge increaſed more & more, ſo that he ſpared not one if he ſuſpected him neuer ſo litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skouts and ſpies to hunt them out that hid themſelues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friend is faithfull, and to be truſted, if fortune frowne neuer ſo litle: for there were very few that did not betray their friends that fled to them for ſuccour. And therefore doe Cornutus ſeruants ſo much the more deſerue praiſe, who hauing ſecretly hidden their maſter in his houſe, did hang the dead body of ſome common perſon by the neck, and hauing put a gold ring on his finger, they ſhewed him to the BARDIÆIANS, Marius guard, and buried him in ſtead of their owne maſter, without ſuſpition of any man that it was a fained thing: and ſo Cornutus being hidden by his ſeruants, was ſafely conueyed into the country of GAVLE. Marke Anthony the Orator had alſo found out a faithfull friend, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithful friēd of his, was a poore ſimple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefeſt men of ROME into his houſe to keepe him cloſe there: he being deſirous to make him the beſt cheare he could with that litle he had, ſent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, who taſting the wine more curiouſly then he was wont to do, called for better. The drawer asked him why the new ordinary wine would not ſerue him, but he muſt needes haue of the beſt and deareſt: the fooliſh fellow ſimply anſwered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his maſter did feaſt Marke Anthonie, who was hidden very ſecretly in his houſe. He was no ſooner gone with his wine, and his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ran vnto Marius, who was ſet at ſupper when he came. The drawer being brought vnto him, promiſed him to deliuer Marke Anthonie into his hands. Marius hearing of that, was ſo iocond, that he cried out and clapt his hands together for ioy: and would haue riſen from the boord, and gone thither himſelfe in perſon, had not his friends kept him backe. But he ſent Annius one of his captaines thither with a certaine number of ſouldiers, and commanded them to bring him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the houſe which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the doore, and the ſouldiers went vp the ſtaires into the chamber, and finding Anthonie there, they began to encourage one another to kill him, not one of them hauing the heart to lay hands vpon him. For Anthonies tongue was as ſweet as a Syrene, and had ſuch an excellent grace in ſpeaking, that when he began to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and to pray them to ſaue his life: there was not one of them ſo hard hearted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiuing they tarried long, and came not downe, went himſelfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthonie talking to his ſouldiers, and them weeping, his ſweete eloquent tongue had ſo melted their hearts: but he rating them, ran furiouſly vpon him, and ſtrake off his head with his owne hands. And Catulus Luctatius alſo, that had bene Conſull with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBRES with him, ſeeing himſelfe in this perill, ſet men to intreate Marius for him: but his anſwer was euer, He muſt needs die. So Catulus locked himſelfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the ſmoake thereof choaked himſelf. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the ſtreetes, and trod them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitifull, but a fearefull ſight to all that ſaw them. But after al this yet, there was nothing that grieued the people ſo much, as the horrible lecherie and abominable cruelty of his guard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houſes by force, after they had ſlaine the maſters, defiled their young children, and raniſhed their wiues and maides, and no man would once reproue their cruelty, letcherie, and vnſatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end ſet vpon them as they ſlept in their campe, and ſlue them euery one. But in this extremity, as if all things had bene reſtored vnto their firſt eſtate, newes came againe from all parts to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre againſt king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vſurped, returned into ITALY with a great power. This cauſed theſe euils and vnſpeakable miſeries to ceaſſe a litle, becauſe the wicked doers of the ſame, looked they ſhould haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was choſen Conſull the ſeuenth time. He going out of his houſe openly the firſt day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip, cauſed one Sextus Lucinus to be throwne downe headlong from the rocke TARPEIAN, which ſeemed to be a great ſigne and certaine token of the euils and miſeries, that fell out afterwards the ſelfe ſame yeare vpon them for their faction, vnto all the city beſide. But Marius being ſore broken with his former troubles, and his mind oppreſſed with extreme ſorrow and griefe, could not now at this laſt time of neede plucke vp his heart to him againe, when he came to think of this new warre toward that threatened him, and of the dangers, griefes, and troubles he ſhould enter into, more great and perillous then any he had paſſed before. For through the great experience he had in wars, he trembled for feare when he began to thinke of it, conſidering that he had to fight, not with Octauius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a company of rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and that came now from driuing the puiſſant king Mithridates, vnto the furtheſt part of the Realme of PONT, and of the ſea Euxinum. Thus, deeply weighing and conſidering the ſame, and ſpecially when he looked backe vpon his

his long time of baniſhment, how vagabondlike he wandred vp and downe in other countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paſſed, and the ſundry dangers he fell ſo often into, being purſued ſtill by ſea and by land: it grieued him to the heart, and made him ſo vnquiet, that he could not ſleepe in the night, or if he ſlept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and ſtill he thought he heard a voice buzzing in his eares:

Marius thoughts & feare.

A Lions very denne is dreadfull to behold,
Though he himſelfe be gone abrode, and be not there in hold.

Deuice to win ſleepe.

But fearing moſt of all that he ſhould no more ſleepe and take his reſt, he gaue himſelfe to make vnreaſonable banquets, and to drink more then his yeares could beare, ſeeking to win ſleepe by this meanes, to auoide care the better. But at the length there came one from the ſea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increaſe of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extremely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly alſo for the ouer heauie burden of his preſent ill, there needed but little more aggrauation, to fall into the diſeaſe whereof he died, which was a pluriſie: as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth; who ſaith plainely that he went into his chamber when he was ſicke, and ſpake vnto him about matters of his ambaſſade, for the which he came to Rome. Yet another hiſtoriographer Caius Piſo writeth, that Marius walking one day after ſupper with his friends, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and againſt him: concluding, that it is no wiſe mans part to truſt her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and laid him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ſicke ſeuen daies together, and on the ſeuenth day died. Some write that his ambition appeared plainely, by a ſtrange rauing that tooke him in his head during his ſickneſſe: for he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, and ſhewed in his bed all the geſtures and mouings of his body, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the ſelfe ſame cries out aloud, which he was wont to crie when he was in the extremeſt fight. The deſire he had to haue taken this charge in hand againſt Mithridates, was ſo deepely ſetled in his mind through extreme ambition and iealouſie that poſſeſt him, that being then threeſcore & ten yeare old, after he had bin the firſt man that euer was choſen ſeuen times Conſull in Rome, and alſo after that he had gotten a world of goods and riches together that might haue ſufficed many kings: yet for all this he died for ſorrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had deſired. But this was cleane contrary vnto that the wiſe Plato did, when he drew neare to his death. For he gaue God thanks for his fatal end & good fortune. Firſt, for that he had made him a reaſonable man, and no brute beaſt: ſecondly, a Greeke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported alſo, that one Antipater of Tharsis, calling to mind a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy nauigation he made, coming from his country vnto Athens: which did witneſſe that he put vpon the file of his good accounts for a ſingular great grace, al fauour fortune had ſhewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memory, being the onely and moſt aſſured treaſure a man can haue, to keepe thoſe gifts that nature or fortune do beſtow vpon him. But contrariwiſe vnthankfull fooles vnto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefits, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwaies voide of goods and full of hope, gaping ſtill for things to come, and leauing in the meane time the thing preſent, though reaſon perſwades them the contrary. For fortune may eaſily let them of the thing to come, but ſhe cannot take that from them which is already paſt: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto them, and dreame alwaies of that which is vncertaine. And ſure it chanceth to them by great reaſon: for, hauing gathered outward goods together, and locking them vp before they haue built and laid a ſure grounded foundation of reaſon through good learning, they cannot afterwards fill nor quench their vnſatiable greedie couetous mind. Thus ended Marius his life, the ſeuenteenth day of his ſeuenth Conſulſhip, whereof all the city of Rome was not a little glad, and tooke heart againe vnto them, ſuppoſing they had then bene deliuered from a bloudy cruell tyrannie. But within few daies after they knew it to their coſt, that they had changed an old maſter taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: ſuch extreme vnnaturall cruelties and murthers did Marius the yonger commit, after the death of his father Marius, murthering in maner all the chiefeſt noble men of Rome. At the firſt, they tooke him for a valiant and hardy young man, whereupon they named him the ſonne of Mars: but ſhortly after his deedes did ſhew the contrary, and then they called him the ſon of Venus. In the end he was ſhut in, and beſieged by Sylla in the city of PERVSIA, where he did what he could poſſible to ſaue his life, but all was in vaine: and laſtly, ſeeing no way to eſcape, the city being taken, he ſlue himſelfe with his owne hands.

THE LIFE OF Lyſander.

Lyſanders image.

IN the treaſurie of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inſcription: Braſidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the ſpoyle of the ATHENIANS. That inſcription maketh many men thinke, that the image of ſtone that ſtandeth within the chamber by the doore thereof, is the image of Braſidas: howbeit in truth it is the liuely image of Lyſander himſelfe, made with a great buſh of haire, and thicke long beard after the old ancient faſhion. And where ſome ſay that the ARGIVES, after they were ouercome and had loſt a great battell, did all of them ſhaue themſelues in token and ſigne of common ſorow: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide to ſhew the ioy of their victory, did let all their haires grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIADES: who being fled frõ CORINTH vnto LACEDÆMON, ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS foũd them ſo ill fauouredly diſguiſed & deformed, becauſe their heads were all ſhauen, that therupon they had a deſire to let their haire and beards grow. For that was one of the ordinances of Lycurgus, who ſaid that the long buſh of haire maketh thẽ that are naturally faire, the pleaſanter to looke vpon: and thoſe that are ill fauoured, more vgly and fearefull to ſee to. And furthermore, it is ſaid that Ariſtoclitus, the father of Lyſander, was not of the royall bloud of the kings of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his ſon Lyſander was very meanely & poorely brought vp, being as obedient to the lawes & ſtatutes of his country, as any other man was, ſhewing himſelf alwaies very ſtrong & conſtant againſt al vanity & pleaſure, ſauing only in matters of honor and curteſie, which they offer vnto thoſe that deſerue well. For they think it no ſhame nor diſhoneſty in SPARTA, that the yong men do ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with that delight and pleaſure: but doe bring vp their children, that from their youth they would haue haue them to haue ſome taſt and feeling of honour, delighting to be praiſed, and ſory to be diſcommended. For they make no account of him that is not moued with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a baſe cowardly nature, that hath no maner of mind to do good. And therfore it is to be thought, that the ambition and ſtoutneſſe that was bred in Lyſander, proceeded of the LACONICAL diſcipline and education he had, and not ſo much of his owne nature. But indeed of his owne nature he was a right courtier, and could tell how to entertaine and flatter great ſtates and nobility, farre better then the common maner of the naturall SPARTANS: and moreouer for his priuate benefit, he could eaſily beare with the ſtoutneſſe of greater men of authority then himſelf, which ſome iudge to be a great point of wiſedome, to know how to deale in matters of ſtate. Ariſtotle in a place where he ſaith, that the greateſt wits cõmonly are ſubiect vnto melancholie, (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lyſander in his latter age fell into the melancholy diſeaſe, but not in his youth. He had alſo this ſingular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwaies kept that honeſt modeſty with him, as he would neuer be ouercome nor corrupted with gold nor ſiluer: and yet he filled his country with riches and couetouſneſſe, which loſt him the reputation he had won, becauſe himſelfe made none account of riches nor getting. For, bringing ſtore of gold and ſiluer into his countrey after he had ouercome the ATHENIANS, he reſerued not vnto himſelfe one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA had on a time ſent goodly rich gowns out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refuſed them ſaying, that he was afraid ſuch gowns would make them fowler. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortly after being ſent Ambaſſadour out of his countrey to the ſame tyrant, Dionyſius hauing ſent him two gownes, praying him to chooſe which he would, to carrie to his daughter: he anſwered, that ſhe her ſelf could beſt chooſe which was the fitter, & ſo caried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlik cauſes, the wars of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruellous long. For after the ouerthrow of the army which the ATHENIANS had ſent into SICILIA, when euery man thought they had vtterly loſt all their force by ſea, and that by all coniecture they ſhould ſoone after loſe all by land alſo: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the ſtate, made an exceeding great change & alteratiõ. For he ſet the ATHENIANS aflote againe, and made them as ſtrong by ſea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who therupon began to quake for feare, & to look eftſoones for a freſh war, perceiuing that they ſtood in need of a great power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereupon they made Lyſander their Admiral, who arriuing in the city of EPHESVS, found them very wel affected towards him, & maruellous willing & ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS part: howbeit otherwiſe in very poore ſtate, and ready almoſt to take vp all the barbarous maners & faſhions of the PERSIANS, becauſe they did continually frequent them, being enuironed round about with the country of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIAES captains were euer reſidẽt. Wherfore, hauing planted his camp there, he brought thither merchants ſhips out of all parts, and ſet vp an arſenall or ſtore houſe to build gallies in: ſo that in ſhort ſpace, by oft recourſe of merchants that began to trade thither, he quickned their hauens, and ſet vp their ſtaple againe for the traffick of merchandiſe, and filled euery priuate artificers houſe with an honeſt trade to make them rich by, ſo that euer after it grew in continuall hope to come vnto that flouriſhing ſtate and greatneſſe, in the which we ſee it at this preſent. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIAES ſons, was come vnto the city of SARDIS, he went thither to ſpeake with him, and to complaine of Tiſaphernes: who hauing commandement giuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulſe the ATHENIANS, & to driue them from the ſea, ſeemed to deale but coldly and faintly againſt them, for the fauour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furniſhing the LACEDÆMONIANS very ſcantly with money, he was the cauſe that all their army by ſea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tiſaphernes, and that they ſpake againſt him: becauſe he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himſelfe a little odde grudge to him. Wherefore he loued Lyſander marnellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tiſaphernes, as alſo for the pleaſure he tooke in his company, becauſe he was a man that could wonderfully pleaſe and delight noble men: by which meanes hauing wonne the fauour of this young Prince, he did perſwade, and alſo incourage him to follow this warre. And when Lyſander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feaſted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuſe the offer of his liberalitie, and that was: that he would freely aske him what he wold, aſſuring him he ſhould not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lysander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to pleasure vs, I beseech you, & do also counsell you then to increase the ordinary pay of our mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may hence-forth receiue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lysanders bounty, and the increase that he would make, and caused ten thousand Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the mariners, the increase of a halfe penny a day. This liberality, within few days after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For the most part of their mariners and gallie men went where they might haue the best pay: and such as remained behind, became very dull, lazie, and seditious, daily troubling their Captaines and gouernours. Now though Lysander had drawn his enemies men from them by this policie, & had done them this great hurt, yet he durst not fight it out by sea, fearing the worthines of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater store of ships then he had; and besides that, was neuer ouercome by land nor by sea, in any battell where he was Generall. So it chanced that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of Samos vnto the city of Phocea, which standeth vpon firme land directly ouer against Samos, and leauing the whole charge of his fleete in his absence, with Antiochus his pilot: he being more hardie then wise, in scorne and derision of Lysander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of Ephesvs, and went by the arsenall (where all their ships lay in docke) with great noise and laughing. This put Lysander in such a heate and chafe, that first of all he put a few gallies to the sea, & had him in chase with them. But afterwards, perceiuing that the other captaines of the Athenians came out one after another to the rescue, he armed other gallies also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at length they came to maine battell, which Lysander wan, and hauing taken fifteene of their gallies, he set vp a token of triumph and victory. When the people of Athens heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were so angry with Alcibiades, that they deposed him presently of his charge: and the souldiers also that lay in campe in the Ile of Samos, began to mislike him, and to speake ill of him. Whereupon he presently left his campe, and went into the country of Cherronesvs in Thracia. This battell was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lysander causing the stoutest and boldest men of euery city, aboue the common sort, to come to Ephesvs vnto him: laid their secret foundations of great change and alteration, which he stablished afterwards in the gouernements of cities. For he perswaded his priuate friends to make tribes amongst themselues, to winne them friends, & to practise to get the rule of their cities into their hands: promising them, that so soone as the Athenians were ouerthrowne, they themselues also should be deliuered from subiection of their people, and euery one of them should beare chiefe rule in their countrey. And this he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his words true: for he preferred all them that had bene his old friends, vnto the best offices and charges, not sparing to do against all right and reason: so that they were aduanced by it. And for this cause euery man came to take his part, and they all sought and desired to gratifie and please him: hoping, that what great matter soeuer fell out, they might assure themselues that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernement in his owne hands. And therfore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas coming, who came to succeed him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and iust a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerning, which was plaine and without any art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of some demi-god made after the old fashion, which had bene of singular beauty. But in the meane time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender loue and good-will he bare to his friends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So when Lysander took the seas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as sory as could be possible, insomuch as the teares stood in their eyes: & he on the other side studied to make them worse affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongst many other things, he sent the rest of the mony backe againe to Sardis, which Cyrus had giuen him to pay the mariners: saying, that Callicratidas should goe himselfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliuer, leaue, and assigne ouer the armie into his hands, commanding all the sea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his false ambition, and foule boasting lye, answered him againe and said: If that be true thou sayest, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the city of MILETVM, as thou goest by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for sith thou commandest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lysander thereto replyed, that the army was no more at his commandement; and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity: for he had brought no money out of his countrey with him, neither could he compell the cities to furnish him with any, seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA, to aske them mony, as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeetest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it lesse dishonour and reproch vnto the GRECIANS, to be ouercome by other GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, & seek to thē that had gold and siluer enough, but otherwise no goodnesse nor honesty. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his iourney towards LYDIA, and went directly to Cyrus court: where at his first comming he willed them to let him vnderstand, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS wold speake with him. One of ỹ souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: My friend, sir stranger, Cyrus is not at leisure now, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas answered plainly againe: No force, I will tarrie here till he haue dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, took him for some plaine lout, and so he went his way at the first time with a mocke at their hands. But the second time, when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the city of EPHESVS, cursing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased themselues, as to go sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proude and stately for their goods and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soone as he came to SPARTA again, he would do all that he could possible to pacifie the GRECIANS, and set them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, & also that they should meddle with them no more, nor need their aide to destroy one another. But Callicratidas hauing the noble hart of a SPARTAN, and being to be compared in iustice, valiancie, and greatnesse of courage, with the most excellentest GRECIANS in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost vpon the Iles ARGINVSES. Wherfore, the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sent an ambassade vnto SPARTA, by which they made request to the councell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall: promising that they would do all things with better courage and good will vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captaine they could send them. So much did Cyrus also write vnto them. But because there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twise Admirall, & besides, they being willing to grant the request of their confederates, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lysander the whole authority of all things: who was maruellous welcome vnto them, & specially vnto the heads and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: because that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnanimity in the maners of a Gouernor and Generall, when they came to compare Lysander with Callicratidas, they found that Lysander had a fine subtill head, and did more in wars with his policie and subtilty, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he esteemed iustice, whē it fell out profitable: & tooke profit, for iustice & honesty, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that said, that the race of Hercules should not make wars with craft & subtilty. For, said he, when the lions skin wil not serue, we must helpe it with the case of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that which they write he did in the city of MILETVM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promised aid for destruction of the peoples authority, & to driue their enemies out of the city: they hauing changed their minds, and being reconciled vnto their aduersaries, he openly made great shew of gladnesse, and seemed as though he would helpe to agree them together: but secretly being alone, he took them vp sharply, and told them that they were cowards to do it, and did procure them to the contrary, to set vpon the people. And then when he vnderstood that there was commotion among them in the city, he ranne thither suddenly as it were to appease it. But when he was also come into the city, the first he met with of them that would alter the state of the gouernement, and take the authority from the people, he fell out withall, and gaue them rough words, commanding with extremity that they should follow him, as though he would haue done ſome great puniſhment. And againe, meeting with the of the contrary part, he willed them alſo that they ſhould not be afraid, nor doubt that any man ſhould do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practiſe of him, to ſtay the chiefeſt of them that were moſt affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwards hee might put them all to death, as he did: for they that truſting to his words remained quiet in the city, were all put to death. Moreouer, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lyſander was wont to ſay: by ỹ which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckoning to be periured. For he ſaid, that children ſhould be deceiued with the play of kayles, and men with oathes of men, following therein Polycrates the tyrant of SAMOS, but without reaſon: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent vſurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behaue himſelfe towards the gods none otherwiſe, then towards men, but rather worſe, & more iniuriouſly. For he that deceiueth his enemie, and breaketh his oath to him, ſheweth plainely that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore hauing ſent for Lyſander to come to SARDIS to him, gaue him money largely, and promiſed him more: and becauſe he would more honourably ſhew the goodwill he had to gratifie him, told him, that if the king his father would giue him nothing, yet he would giue him of his owne. And furthermore, when all other meanes failed to helpe him with mony, that rather then he ſhould lacke, he would melt his own chaire to make mony of (which he ſate in when he gaue audience in matters of iuſtice) being altogether of gold and ſiluer. And to be ſhort, when he was going into MEDIA to the king his father, he gaue Lyſander power to receiue the taxes and ordinarie tributes of the cities vnder his gouernement, and made him Lieutenant of all his country. And laſtly, bidding him farewll, prayed him that he would not giue battell by ſea vnto the ATHENIANS, vntill he returned from the Court: & that before his coming againe, he would haue authority to leauie a great number of ſhips, aſwell out of PHOENICIA, as out of CILICIA. Wherefore whileſt Cyrus was in his iourney, Lyſander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ſhips, nor alſo to lie ſtill and do nothing with ſo good a number of gallies, went and ſcoured the ſeas, where he tooke certaine Ilands, and robbed alſo ÆGINA and SALAMINA. From thence he went and landed on the firme land in the countrey of ATTICA, and did his duty there vnto Agis king of LACEDÆMONIA, who came purpoſely from the fort of Decelea to the ſea ſide to ſee him, becauſe their army by land alſo ſhould ſee what power they had by ſea, and how it ruled more by ſea then they would. Neuertheleſſe, being aduertiſed that the fleete of the ATHENIANS followed hard after him, he took another courſe to flie backe againe into ASIA by the Iles: and returning againe, found all the country of HELLESPONT without men of war. So he laid ſiege before the city of LAMPSACVS, and did aſſault it with his gallies by ſea: and Thorax being come thither alſo at the ſelfe ſame time in great haſt, with his army by land gaue the aſſault on his ſide. Thus was the city taken by force, which Lyſander left to the ſpoyle of the ſouldiers. Now in the meane time the fleete of the ATHENIANS (which was an hundred and foureſcore ſaile) came to an anker before the city of ELEVNTE, in the country of CHERRONESVS: and newes being brought them that the citie of LAMPSACVS was taken, they came with all ſpeed poſſible vnto the city of SESTOS, where getting freſh cates and victuals, they coaſted al along the coaſt vnto a certaine place called the goates riuer, directly ouer againſt the fleet of their enemies, which lay yet at anker before the city of LAMPSACVS. Now there was a captaine of the ATHENIANS amongſt other, called Philocles, he that perſwaded the ATHENIANS to cut off the priſoners thombes of their right hands that were taken in the warres, to the end they ſhould no more handle the pike, but only ſerue to pull the ower. Both the one and the other reſted that day, hoping to haue battell without faile the next morning. But Lyſander hauing another meaning with him, commanded the maſters and mariners notwithſtanding, that they ſhould haue their galleys ready to giue battel the next morning by breake of day, becauſe euery man ſhould get aboord betimes, and ſhould keepe themſelues in order of battell, making no noiſe at all, attending what he would command them: and further, made the armie by land alſo to be ranged in battell ray, by the ſea ſide. The next morning at Sunne riſing, the ATHENIANS began to row with all their gallies ſet in order of battell in a front. But Lyſander, though he had his ſhips in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that againſt them, but ſending out pinnaces vnto the firſt galleys, commanded them ſtraightly that they ſhould not ſtirre at all, but keepe themſelues in order, making no noiſe, nor rowing againſt againſt the enemie. Though the ATHENIANS alſo were retired in the night, he would not giue the ſouldiers leaue to come to land out of the gallies, before he had ſent firſt two or three gallies to deſcrie the fleete of his enemies: who brought him word that they had ſeene the ATHENIANS take land. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth alſo all in one ſort: ſo that the ATHENIANS began to be bold of themſelues, and to deſpiſe their enemies, imagining they lay thus cloſe for feare of them, and durſt not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the countrey of CHERRONESVS, in certaine places which he had conquered) came riding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captaines and Generals of the armie, the great faults they committed. Firſt, for that they had caſt anker, and kept their ſhips in an open place, where there was no maner of ſuccour, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any ſtorme: and worſt of all, becauſe that they were to fetch their victuals farre off, at the city of SESTOS, vnto which hauen they ſhould rather draw themſelues, conſidering that they had but a little way to go, and alſo they ſhould haue the city to backe them, which would furniſh them with all things neceſſarie: and beſide that, they ſhould be further off from their enemies, which were gouerned by one Generall only that did command them all, and were ſo well trained, that at a whiſtle they were ready ſtraight to execute his commandement. Alcibiades perſwaſions to theſe Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not onely miſliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that anſwered him very leudly: That he had nothing to do to command the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades miſtruſting thereby ſome treaſon, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS hauing made the ſame countenance to preſent battell vnto their enemies, and retiring the ſame night as of cuſtome, very negligently, & in ill order, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lyſander ſent againe certaine galliots to deſcrie them, commanding the Captaines of the ſame, that when they perceiued the ATHENIANS had left their galleys and taken land, they ſhould then returne back with al poſſible ſpeed they could, & being mid way ouer the ſtraights, that they ſhould lift vp a copper target into the aire, vpon the top of a pike in the fore-deck, for a ſigne to make al the whole fleete to row in battel. Now Lyſander himſelfe in the meane time went in perſon from galley to galley, perſwading and exhorting euery captaine, that they ſhould put their galliots, mariners, and ſouldiers in good readineſſe, to the end that when the ſigne ſhould be lifted vp, they ſhould row with all their might in battell againſt the enemies. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as the copper target was ſet vp in the ayre, and that Lyſander had made his trumpet ſound out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the ſea: the galleys immediatly began to row for life in enuy one of another, and the footmen that were vpon the land, ranne with ſpeed alſo to the top of a high cliffe neare vnto the ſea, to ſee what would be the end of the fight, becauſe the diſtance from one ſide to the other in that place was not fully two miles; which they had ſoone cut ouer, and in a little ſpace, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the ATHENIANS perceiuing from the ſhore this great fleete coming with a full force to aſſault them: he then cryed out to the ſouldiers that they ſhould runne to their ſhip, and being in a rage to ſee things in this danger, called ſome by their names, others he intreated, and the reſt he compelled to take their galleys. But all his diligence was to no purpoſe, becauſe the ſouldiers were wholly ſcattered here and there. For ſo ſoone as they were ſet aland out of their galleys at their returne, ſome went to buy prouiſion, other went a walking in the fields, ſome were ſet at ſupper in their cabins, and other were laid downe to ſleepe, nothing miſtruſting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were ready to ioyne and fall vpon them with great cries and noiſe of owers, Conon hauing eight gallies, ſtole ſecretly out of the fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, ſaued himſelfe in the Ile of CYPRVS. In the meane time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling vpon the other gallies, tooke ſome of them emptie, and brake the others as the ſouldiers began to come aboord vpon them. And as for the men, ſome were ſlaine by their ſhips as they ran vnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to haue ſaued themſelues: other were killed in flying, becauſe the enemies landed and had them in chaſe. And there were taken aliue of them, three thouſand priſoners with the Captaines. Lyſander moreouer tooke all the whole fleet of their ſhips, the holy galley excepted, called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had deſtroyed all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he faſtned the galleys that were taken, vnto the keele of his galleys, and returned with ſongs of triumph, with the ſound of flutes and hoboyes, towards the city of

LAMPSACVS, hauing wonne a great victorie with litle labour, and had cut off in a ſmall time, the long continuing and moſt diuerſe warre that euer was, and had brought forth ſo many ſundrie ſtrange euents of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battels fought both by ſea and land, and had altered many ſundrie times, and there was ſlaine at that time moe Captaines, then in all the other wars of GREECE together: all which were at length brought to end and determined, by the good wiſdome and conduction of one onely man. And therefore ſome thought, that this great ouerthrow was giuen by the gods, and ſaid: That at the departure of Lyſanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to go ſet vpon the fleete of the enemies, they perceiued ouer Lyſanders galley the two fires, which they call the ſtarres of Caſtor and Pollux: the one on the one ſide of the galley, and the other on the other ſide. They ſay alſo, that the fall of the ſtone was a token, that did ſignifie this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a maruellous great ſtone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which ſtone is ſeene yet vnto this day, holden in great reuerence by ỹ inhabitants of the city of CHERRONESVS. It is ſaid alſo, that Anaxagoras did prognoſticate, that one of the bodies tied vnto the vault of the heauen, ſhould be plucked away, and ſhould fall to the ground by a ſliding and ſhaking that ſhould happen. For he ſaid, that the ſtarres were not in their proper place where they were firſt created, conſidering that they were heauy bodies, & of the nature of ſtone: howbeit that they did ſhine by reflexion of the fire elementarie, and had bene drawne vp thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the element, euen at the beginning of the world they had bin ſtaid and let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the ſeparation was made of the cold and heauie bodies, from the other ſubſtance of the vniuerſall world. There is another opinion of certaine Philoſophers, where there is more likelihood then in that. For they ſay, that thoſe which we call falling ſtars, be no fluxions nor deriuations of the fire elementary, which are put out in the ayre, in a maner ſo ſoone as they be lighted: nor alſo an inflammation or combuſtiõ of any part of the aire, which by ouermuch quantity thereof doth ſpread vpwards: but they are celeſtiall bodies, which by ſome ſlackneſſe of ſtrength, or falling from the ordinarie courſe of heauen, are throwne and caſt downe here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroad in the great Ocean ſea, which is the cauſe that we do not ſee them. Notwithſtanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the ſpace of threeſcore and fifteene yeares together, before that this ſtone did fal, they ſaw a great lump of fire cõtinually in the aire like a cloud inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went & came with diuers broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the ſtarres do that fall. In the end, when this great body of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the country, after that they were a little boldned from their feare and wonder, came to the place to ſee what it was: and they found no maner of ſhew or apparance of fire: but onely a very great ſtone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in compariſon of the leaſt part of that which the compaſſe of this body of fire did ſhew, if we may ſo name it. Sure herein, Damachus words had need of fauourable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boiſterous wind did teare from the top of a mountaine, and caried in the aire, ſo long as this whirlewind continued: but ſo ſoone as that was downe, & calme againe, the ſtone fell immediatly. Neither do we ſay, that this lightning body, which appeared ſo many daies in the element, was very fire indeed, which comming to diſſolue and to be put out, did beget this violent ſtorme and boiſterous wind in the element, that had the force to teare the ſtone in ſunder, and to caſt it downe. Neuertheleſſe, this matter requireth better diſcourſe in ſome other booke then this. But now to our ſtorie. When the three thouſand ATHENIANS that were taken priſoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the councell to be put to death: Lyſander calling Philocles, one of the captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens ſo cruell and wicked counſell. Philocles being nothing abaſhed to ſee himſelfe in that miſery, anſwered him: Accuſe not them that haue no iudge to heare their cauſe: but ſince the gods haue giuen thee grace to be conquerour, do with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had ſaid ſo, he went to waſh himſelfe, and then put on a faire cloake vpon him, as if he ſhould haue gone to ſome feaſt: and went luſtily the foremoſt man to execution, leading his countriemen the way, as Theophraſtus writeth. this done, Lysander with al his fleete went by all the cities of the sea coast, where he commanded so many ATHENIANS as he found, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderstand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their citie. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the wals of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lacke of victuals: for otherwise they would haue troubled him sore, if they had had wherwithal to haue maintained a long siege. But in all the cities as he passed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kind of gouernment, he left in euery one of them a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine or Gouernor, with a councell of ten officers, of them that had bene before in league & amity with him: the which he did aswell in the cities that had euer bene confederates and friends vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in them that not long before had bene their enemies. So he went sailing al along the coasts, faire and softly making no hast, stablishing in maner a generall principality ouer al GREECE. For he did not make thē officers that were the richest, the noblest, or honestest men, but such as were his frieds, out of those tribes which he had placed in euery city: & to thē he gaue authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, & would be present himself in person to helpe them to put those to death whom they would execute, or otherwise expulse or banish their country. But this gaue the GRECIANS small hope of good or gracious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore me thinkes that Theopompus the comicall Poet doted, when hee compared the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto tauerners, saying, that they had giuen the GRECIANS a taste of the sweet drink of liberty, and that afterwards they had mingled it with vineger. For, the taste they gaue the GRECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very sharpe vnto them: because Lysander tooke the rule and authority of gouernment out of the peoples hands, and gaue it vnto a few of the boldest, and most seditious men in euery city. Thus hauing spent a great time in this voyage, to make these alterations, he sent newes before to LACEDÆMON, that he was comming with 200 saile. He spake also with the kings, Agis and Pausanias, in the countrey of ATTICA, perswading himselfe that he should win the city of ATHENS at the first assault. But when he saw that his expectatiō failed, & that the ATHENIANS did valiantly resist him, he returned once againe with his fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the maner of gouernment through euery city in equall maner, stablishing a councell of ten officers only in euery one of them, and putting euery where many citizens to death, and banishing many also. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their countrey, and restored againe all them that had bene banished before: and the city of SESTOS also, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he took it from them. And furthermore, he would not suffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, & gaue their city, their houses & lands, vnto ship-masters, officers of galleys, and galley-slaues, that had bin in the wars with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were against him, & this was the first thing that they did forbid him: for they restored the SESTIANS, against his will, vnto their lands and goods againe. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to see the parts Lysander played: so were they all very glad againe, to see these others which he afterwards did. For he restored the ÆGINETES againe to their lands and houses, who had bene put from them a long time. He restored also the MELIANS, & the SCIONÆIANS to their lands againe, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised, that the citizens & inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched sore for lacke of victuals, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PIRÆA: by meanes whereof he kept the city so straight, that he made them yeeld vpon such conditions as he himselfe would. Howbeit there are certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that say, Lysander wrote vnto the Ephores: The citie of ATHENS is taken: and that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him: It is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuised to make the matter seeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori sent vnto him, were these: The Lords of the councell of LACEDÆMON haue thus decreed: That ye do raze the fortification of the hauen of PIRÆA: That ye doe ouerthrow also the long wall that ioyneth the hauen to the city: That ye yeeld vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye doe hold, and content your selues with your liues and country only. This doing ye shall haue peace, so that ye performe our demands. That ye shall receiue those which are banished: and for the number of ships, ye shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counsell of Theramenes the sonne of Agnon, Theopompus the comicall Poets saying of the Lacedæmonians.

The Athenians yeeld vp Athens to Lysander.

The maner of peace offered by the Lacedæmonians to the Athenians.

Who when a young Orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were so bold to dare to do, or say, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themistocles had done before time, to assent vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the wall which he built in despight of them, should by their commandement now be razed: he answered him openly againe: Yong man, my friend, I do nothing contrary to Themistocles doings: for like as he heretofore did build the wall, for the safety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHENS at that time: euen so doe we that are here now, for the selfe same cause plucke it downe and raze it. And if it be true that wals do make cities happie, then it must needs follow that the city of SPARTA which neuer had any wals, should be the vnfortunatest of all other. So Lysander hauing receiued all the ATHENIANS ships but twelue, and the wals of the city also to vse them at his pleasure: on the sixteenth day of March (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had won the battel by sea, within the straight of SALAMINA, against the king of PERSIA) he counselled them straight to change the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruellously offended withall. Whereupon Lysander sent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made betweene them, for that their wals were yet standing, the ten daies being expired in which they had promised to ouerthrow them: and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the councell, how they should be vsed, that had broken the articles and couenants of the first peace. Other say, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberation of the councel of their confederates, that is to say: whether they should altogether destroy the city, and make the inhabitants thereof slaues and bondmen, or no. In this councell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should vtterly raze the city, and make the country a desert: so that it should neuer after serue for other thing, but for pasturage of beasts. But during this diet and councell, there was a banket made, wherunto al the captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a PHOCIAN, a singer of songs, that sang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Euripides, which began in this sort:

Electra noble Dame, and daughter to a king,
Euen Agamemnon, king of Greece, whose fame so wide did ring:
I come now to your courts, which lie both wide and wast,
By spoile of warres depopulate, destroyed and disgrast.

These words moued al the hearers with cõpassion, so that the most part of them thought it were too great a sin to destroy so noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wise mẽ, & great persons. Wherfore Lysander, when the ATHENIANS had submitted themselues altogether to his will, caused all the women-players of pipes or shalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne campe also, and with the sound of their instruments he made the wals & fortificatiõs of the city of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, & set all their galleys on fire, & burnt thẽ in the presence of the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who danced and played in the meane season with garlands of flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full & perfect liberty. Immediatly after he changed also the state of the gouernment, establishing a councell of thirty Magistrates in the city, & other ten also in the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing all equall and like authority: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of SPARTA captaine of the castle there, and left a good garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his staffe he had in his hand to strike Autolycus withall, a strong made man to wrestle: wherupon Xenophon the Philosopher made his book in old time, called Conuiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wrestler, hauing all the sleights of wrestling, suddenly tripped Callibius with his leg, and lifting him vp at the armes end, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lysander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him: that he should haue remembred (if he had bene wise) that he had the gouernement of free men, and not of bondmen. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty gouernors of the citie, to satisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he took sea againe, and went into the country of THRACIA, and sent by Gylippus before vnto SPARTA (who had bin Captaine and General of the SYRACVSANS in SICILIA) al the gold and siluer that was left in his hands, with all the presents besides which had bene priuately giuen him, and with the crowns also that had bin presented him: which were maruellous in number, as it is to be thought for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, & that in maner he was chiefe chief and ſole prince of al GRECE. This Gylippus did rip the ſeames of euery bag in the bottome where the mony was, & took a good ſum out of euery of them: and afterwards ſewed them vp again, not thinking that there had bin a border vpon euery bag, vpon the which was declared, the number & kinds of gold & ſiluer that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the mony he had ſtolne vnder the houſe eauings, & went & deliuered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, ſhewing them Lyſanders ſeale, which he had ſet to euery one of thē. The Ephori hauing opened the bags, and told the mony, found that the ſum agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the fault was. But a ſeruant of Gylippus told them in darke words, ſaying: that vnder the tiles of his maſters houſe there lay a great number of owles. Now the greateſt part of the coine of gold & ſiluer which was currant through GRECE, was ſtamped with the marke of an owle, by reaſon of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after ſo many noble exploits done in wars, committing ſo ſhamefull and vile a deed, was baniſhed out of his countrey of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wiſeſt men of SPARTA, and of deepeſt iudgement, fearing the power of gold & ſiluer, & ſeeing by proofe of Gylippus doings, that it had ſuch power to make one of their chiefeſt men to fall through couetouſnes: they greatly blamed Lyſander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beſeeching the Ephori that they would ſend all his gold and ſiluer out of SPARTA, as a plague, prouocation, & wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they ſhould vſe no other mony, but their own only. Wherupon they referred all to the wiſdom & determination of the councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did moue the councell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the firſt that ſpake againſt it in the councell, that they ſhould not admit nor receiue into the city of SPARTA, any mony of gold or ſiluer: but ſhould only content themſelues with their owne country iron coine, the which firſt of al, comming from the fire red-hot, was quenched with vineger, to the end they ſhould be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vſe. For it was ſo eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more conuert it to any other purpoſe: and beſide, it was very heauy and vnhandſome to remoue, conſidering that a great heape and quantity of it, was but of ſmal value. And it ſeemeth they did vſe of old time, certaine little iron mony, and in ſome places copper mony, called Obeliſci, from whence the ſmall peeces of mony now extant are called Oboli, whereof ſixe made a Drachma, ſo termed for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuertheleſſe, at the earneſt ſute of Lyſanders friends that ſtood againſt it, and held hard with him, it was decreed in the councell, that the money ſhould remaine in the city, and ordained that it ſhould be currant only but for the affaires of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either locke vp, or keepe any mony, that he ſhould ſuffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes, feared gold or ſiluer, & not the couetouſneſſe and auarice which the gold and ſiluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away ſo much, prohibiting priuate men to haue it: as it was engendred onely by a toleration of getting it. For, the profit which they ſaw it brought withall, made it to be eſteemed and deſired. For it was vnpoſſible they ſhould deſpiſe a thing priuately for vnprofitable, which they ſaw reckoned of commonly, as a thing very neceſſary: and that they ſhould thinke it would not ſerue their turne priuatly, ſeeing it ſo commonly eſteemed and deſired. But we are rather to think, that priuate mens maners are confirmed according to the common vſes & cuſtomes of cities, then that the faults and vices of priuate men do fill cities and commonweales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill: then that the parts corrupted ſhould draw the whole to corruption. For to the contrary, the faults of a part deſtroyed, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redreſſed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that took this reſolution in their councell at that time, to haue mony in the commonwealth, made feare of puniſhment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houſes, to keepe that no money ſhould come into them. But all this while they made no inward prouiſion, to keepe the entry of their ſoules from all paſſion and greedy deſires of mony: but to the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetous deſire to be rich, as if it were a great & honorable thing. But for that we haue hertofore in other places reproued ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreouer Lyſander cauſed a ſtatue of braſſe to be made like himſelf of the ſpoile he had gotten of the enemies, to ſet it vp in the city of DELPHES, and for euery priuate captain of the galleys in like caſe, and the two ſtars of Caſtor and Pollux in gold beſides, which vaniſhed away a little before the battell of LEVCTRES:

and no man knew what became of them. Againe, in the chamber of the treasurie of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a galley made of gold & iuorie, of two cubits long, which Cyrus sent vnto him after the victory he had won by sea of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the historiographer borne at DELPHES, writeth, that ỹ self same Lysander had left there to be kept safe, a talent of siluer, two and fiftie Minas; and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which al the other historiographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lysander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GRECIAN was before him, caried a greater port & countenance then became his ability. For as Duris writeth, he was the first of the GRECIANS vnto whom they did euer erect any altars, and offer sacrifice vnto as a god, and in honor of whom they did first sing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memorie of one which began in this manner:

The SAMIANS by publicke decree ordained, that the feasts of Iuno, which were called in their city Heroea, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had euer one Cherilus a SPARTAN Poet about him, to write and set forth all his doings in verse. Another Poet called Antilochus, one day made certaine verses in his praise: which pleased him so well, that he gaue him his hat full of siluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHONIAN, and Niceratus borne at HERACLEA, which did both write verses to honour him, striuing whether of them should do best. Lysander iudged the crowne and victory vnto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was so angry, that he razed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was yong, and loued Antimachus because he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blind the vnderstanding of the ignorant, as blindnesse doth the sight of the blind. Aristonus an excellent player of the citherne, and one that had sixe times won the prises of the Pythian games: to win Lysanders fauor, promised him, that if euer he wan the prise of his art againe, he would cause himselfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slaue. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grieuous, onely vnto great persons, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompencing his friends, as also in punishing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his friends and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without al possibility of pardon. And that he plainely shewed afterwards in the city of MILETVM, where, fearing lest they would flie that tooke part with the people, and because he would haue them appeare that hid themselues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would do them no hurt at al. The poore men gaue credit to his word: but so soone as they came out and did appeare, he deliuered them all into the hands of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefest of the Nobility) to put them all to death: and they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of people also to be done in other cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had priuately offended him, but numbers besides, only to satisfie and reuenge the priuate quarels, enmities and couetousnes of his friends, whom he had in euery place. And therfore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: That GRECE could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus writeth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing but his insolencie and vainglory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuere nature, and sharpe conditions, that made his power fearefull & intollerable. Neuertheless, ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS passed ouer al other complaints exhibited against him, sauing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lysander had done him, spoiling and destroying the countrey vnder his gouernment: then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his friends and Captaines that had serued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and siluer in his house contrary to the law, put him to death. And to himselfe they sent immediatly that which they call Scytala, (as who would say, the scrolle written vpon a round staffe) commanding him that he should returne immediatly vpon receipt thereof. The Scytala is in this sort: When the Ephori do send send a Generall, or an Admirall to the wars, they cause two litle round staues to be made of the like bignesse and length, of which the Ephori do keepe the one, and the other they giue to him whom they send to the warres. These two little staues they call Scytales. Now when they will aduertise their General secretly of matters of importance, they take a scrolle of parchment, long and narrow like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round staffe, leauing no voide space betweene the borders of the scrolle. Afterwards when they haue bound them fast together, then they write vpon the parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done writing, vnfold it and send it to their General, who cannot else possibly reade it to know what is written, (because the letters are not ioyned together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rolle of wood which was giuen him at his departure: and then wreathing the scroll of parchment about which he receiueth, the folding and wreaths of the parchment falling iust into the selfe same place as they were first folded, the letters also come to ioyne one with another, as they ought to do. This little scrolle of parchment also is called as the rolle of wood, Scytala, euen as we commonly see in many places that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchment scrolle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the country of HELLESPONT, he was maruellously troubled withall, fearing aboue all other things the accusations of Pharnabazus: so he sought meanes to speake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lysander prayed him he would write another letter vnto the Lords of SPARTA, contrarie to his first, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cause to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETAN, (as the common Prouerbe saith) that could deceiue another CRETAN. For Pharnabazus hauing promised him that he would performe his desire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lysanders request: but behind he had another of contrary effect, so like on the outside vnto the other, that by sight no man could discerne the one from the other. And when he came to put to his seale, he changed the first with the last that was hidden, and gaue it him. When Lysander came vnto SPARTA, he went as the manner is, straight to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking that by them he should haue bene cleared from all danger of the greatest accusations they could haue burdened him withall: because that Pharnabazus was very well thought on of the Lords of LACEDÆMONIA, for that he did euer shew himselfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA. The Ephori hauing read this letter, they shewed it vnto him. Then did Lysander plainely see, that the common prouerbe was true:

That Vlysses was not subtill alone.

Thereupon he went home to his house maruellously troubled: but within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to speake with the Lords of the councell, he told them that he must needs make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to discharge certain sacrifices, which he had vowed & promised to him before he had won the battels. Some say, that indeed Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did besiege the city of the APHYTÆIANS, in the country of THRASIA, and that by his commandement he raised the siege, and charged them of the city, that they should thanke Iupiter Ammon, and do sacrifice vnto him: by reason whereof they thinke that he meant good faith, when he sued for licence to make this voyage into LYBIA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most part did certainly beleeue, that he made sute to go this iourny, for a cloke & colour only to absent himselfe, because he feared the Ephores, & that he could not endure the yoke & subiection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commanded. And this was the true cause of his sute to go this voyage, much like vnto a horse taken out of a fresh pasture and goodly medowes, to bring him into a stable, & make him to be iorneyed as he was before. Neuertheless, Ephorus writeth another cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lysander hauing hardly obtained licence, tooke ship and hoised saile: but during his absence, the kings of LACEDÆMON remembring that he kept all the cities at his commandement, by meanes of the friends he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouernours of the same, and that by their meanes he came in manner to be absolute prince ouer all GREECE, they took vpon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into the hands of the people, and also to put downe his friends whom he had established there. And hereupon fell out great insurrection again: for first of all, they that were banished from ATHENS, hauing ſurpriſed and taken the caſtle of Phyla, vpon the ſodaine did ſet vpon the thirty gouernors tyrants (whom Lyſander had placed there) & ouercame them in battell. Wherupon Lyſander ſtraight returned to SPARTA, and perſwaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to refer the gouernement to the number of a few, and to puniſh the inſolency of the people. So by his procurement, they ſent firſt an hundred talents vnto the thirty tyrants, for an aide to maintaine this war, and appointed Lyſander himſelfe generall. But the two kings of SPARTA enuying him, and fearing leſt he ſhould take the city of ATHENS againe, they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Pauſanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance ſeemed to maintaine the tyrants againſt the people: but in effect, he did his endeuour to appeaſe this warre, for feare leſt Lyſander by meanes of his friends and followers ſhould once againe come to haue the city of ATHENS in his power, the which he might eaſily do. And thus hauing agreed the ATHENIANS againe one with another, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he plucked vp the root of Lyſanders ambition. But ſhortly after the ATHENIANS rebelling againe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, Pauſanias himſelfe was reproued, becauſe he yeelded ſo much to the boldneſſe and inſolencie of the people, which were bridled and reſtrained before, by the authority of the ſmall number of the Gouernors: and to the contrary, they gaue Lyſander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to pleaſe mens minds & to content them, neither with fond oſtentation of glory, but feuerely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true, he would giue great words, & was terrible to them that reſiſted him. As he anſwered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their confines with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſeemed to alledge the beſt reaſons. Euen they (ſaid he) that ſhal proue the ſtronger hereby (ſhewing thē his ſword) ſhall be they that ſhal pleade their cauſe beſt for their confines. Another time, when a MEGARIAN had told his minde boldly enough in open councell, he anſwered him: Thy words (good friend) had need of a city, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a towne to vſe ſo great words. And to the BOEOTIANS alſo, who were in doubt to profeſſe themſelues friends or enemies: he ſent vnto thē, to know if he ſhould paſſe through their country with his pikes vpwards or downwards. And when the CORINTHIANS alſo were reuolted frō their alliance, he brought his army hard vnto their wals: but when he ſaw his men were afraid, and made curtſey whether they ſhould go to the aſſault or not: by chance ſpying a hare coming out of the towne ditches, he ſaid vnto them: Are ye not aſhamed to be afraid to go and aſſault your enemies, that are ſo cowardly & ſlothfull, as hares do keepe their formes at eaſe within the circuit of their wals? Now king Agis being deceaſed, he left behind him his brother Ageſilaus, & his ſuppoſed ſon Leotychides. Wherefore Lyſander that had loued Ageſilaus aforetime, gaue him counſell to ſtand for the right of the crowne, as lawfull heire & next of the bloud, deſcending of the race of Hercules: becauſe it was ſuſpected that Leotychides was Alcibiades ſon, who ſecretly had kept Timæa Agis wife, at what time he was baniſhed out of his country, and came then to remaine in SPARTA. And Agis ſelfe alſo, concluding by reckoning of the time of his abſence, that his wife could not be with child by him, made no reckoning of Leotychides: (and had openly ſhewed it all the reſt of his life-time) that he did not acknowledge him for his ſon, vntill ſuch time as falling ſick of that diſeaſe whereof he died, he was carried to the city of HERÆA: and there lying in his death bed, at the humble ſute of Leotychides himſelfe, & partly at the inſtant requeſt of his friends, who were importunate with him, he did acknowledge Leotychides for his ſon in the preſence of diuerſe, whō he prayed to be witneſſes vnto the Lords of LACEDÆMON, of his acceptatiō & acknowledging of him to be his ſon: which they all did in fauour of Leotychides. For all that, Ageſilaus took it vpon him, by the ſupport and maintenance of Lyſanders fauour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wiſe man, and knowne to be skilfull in ancient propheeies, did great hurt to Ageſilaus ſide, by an aneient Oracle which he alledged againſt a defect Ageſilaus had, which was his lameneſſe:

King Pauſanias reconciled the Athenians with the Spartans.

Lyſanders terrible words.

The death of king Agis. Lyſander depriueth Leotychides of his kingdome.

O Spartan people you, which beare high haughtie hearts,
And looke aleft: take heed I ſay, looke well vnto your marts:
Leſt whiles you ſtand vpright, and guide your ſtate by grace,
Some halting kingdome priuily come creeping in apace.
By that meanes might you moue, great troubles, carke and care,
And miſchiefes heape vpon your head, before you be aware:
And plunged ſhould you be, euen ouer head and eares,
With waſte of warres, which here on earth doth periſh many peeres.

Many

Many by occaſion of this Oracle, fell to take Leotychides part: but Lyſander declared vnto them, that Diopithes did not conſtrue the meaning of the Oracle wel. For God, ſaid he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that ſhould come to be king of LACEDÆMON: but indeed, the crown and kingdome ſhould halt and be lame, if baſtards not lawfully begotten, ſhould come to reigne ouer the true naturall iſſue and right line of Hercules. By theſe perſwaſions, Lyſander with his great countenance and authority beſides, wan all men to his opinion: ſo that Ageſilaus by this meanes, was proclaimed king of LACEDÆMON. This done, Lyſander began ſtraight to counſell him to make wars in ASIA, putting him in hope that he ſhould deſtroy the kingdome of PERSIA, and ſhould come to be the greateſt man of the world. Moreouer he wrote vnto his friends in the cities of ASIA, that they ſhould ſend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Ageſilaus for their Generall, to make wars againſt the barbarous people. Which they did, and ſent Ambaſſadours purpoſely vnto SPARTA to ſue that they might haue him: the which was no leſſe honour procured vnto Ageſilaus by Lyſanders meanes, then that he did, in making him to be choſen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwiſe not vnapt nor vnfit to command, haue this imperfection: that through the iealouſie of glory, they do commonly enuie their equals, the which doth greatly hinder them from doing any notable things. For, they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue, whoſe ſeruice and meanes might helpe them to great matters. Thus Ageſilaus being choſen Generall of this enterpriſe, tooke Lyſander with him in this iourney, amongſt the thirty counſellers which were giuen vnto him to aſſiſt him: and made ſpeciall choiſe of him, as by whoſe counſell he hoped moſt to be gouerned, and to haue him neareſt about him, as his chiefeſt friend. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the countrey hauing no acquaintance with Ageſilaus, ſeldome ſpake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing knowne Lyſander of long time, they followed him, and waited vpon him to his tent or lodging, ſome to honour him, becauſe they were his friends; others for feare, becauſe they did miſtruſt him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there, that he that ſhall play the perſon of ſome meſſenger or ſeruant, ſhall be the beſt player, and ſhall haue the beſt voice to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrarie, that he which hath the royall band about his head, and the ſcepter in his hand, a man doth ſcant heare him ſpeake. Euen ſo it fell out then: for all the dignity due vnto him that commanded all, was ſhewed only to the counſeller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name onely of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinks that this vndiſcreete and importunate ambition of Lyſander, did well deſerue reproofe, euen to make him to be contented onely with the ſecond place of honor next vnto the king. But for Ageſilaus againe, through extreme couetouſnes and iealouſie of glory, to caſt Lyſander altogether off, and to ſet ſo light by his friend and benefactor, that ſurely became not him neither. For firſt of all, Ageſilaus neuer gaue Lyſander occaſion to do any thing, neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honourable for him: but which is worſt of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mans cauſes in hand, and that he did fauour them, he did alwaies ſend them backe againe into their countrey, denying their ſuite, without that they could obtaine any thing they ſued for, leſſe then the meaneſt perſons that could haue come, extinguiſhing Lyſanders credit by little and little, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyſander perceiuing how he was thus refuſed and reiected in all things, ſeeing that the countenance and fauour which he thought to ſhew vnto his friends, fell out hurtfull vnto them: left off to ſollicite their matters any more, & prayd them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to follow him, but to go to the king, and vnto thoſe that could do them better pleaſure then himſelfe, and ſpecially thoſe that honoured him. When they heard that, many deſiſted to trouble him any more in matters of importance, but not to do him all the honour they could, and continued ſtill to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwiſe to exerciſe himſelfe: the which did aggrauate and increaſe Ageſilaus anger more againſt him, for the enuie he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge and commiſſion in the wars, oftentimes vnto very meane ſouldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lyſander ſurueyor generall of all the ordinarie prouiſion of victuals, and diſtributer of fleſh. And then mocking the IONIANS that did honor him ſo much: Let them go now, ſaid he, and honor my fleſh diſtributer. Wherefore Lyſander ſeeing it high time to ſpeake, went vnto Ageſilaus, and told him in few words after the LACONIAN maner: Truly Ageſilaus, thou haſt learned well to abaſe thy friends. Indeed, ſaid he againe, ſo haue I, when they will be greater then my ſelfe: and to the contrarie, they that maintaine and increaſe my honor and authority, it is reaſon that I eſteeme of them. Yea marry, ſaid Lyſander, but perhaps I haue not done as thou ſayeſt, yet I pray thee giue me ſuch an office, as I may be leaſt hated, and moſt profitable for thee: though it be but in reſpect of ſtrangers eyes that looke vpon vs both. After this talke betweene them, Ageſilaus ſent him his Lieutenant into the country of HELLESPONT, where Lyſander ſtill kept this anger ſecret in his heart againſt him, but for all that, did not leaue to do all that he could for the benefit of his maſters affaires. As amongſt many other things, he cauſed a PERSIAN Captaine called Spithridates, to rebell againſt his maſter, who was a valiant man of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army alſo, which he brought with him vnto Ageſilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iourney. Wherefore he returned againe to SPARTA not long after, with litle honor, being maruellouſly grieued & offended with Ageſilaus, and hating more then before, all the ſtate and gouernement of the city of SPARTA: by reaſon whereof, he determined to put that in practiſe, which he had long time thought vpon concerning the alteration of gouernment, and his enterpriſe was this: Amongſt the of-ſpring and iſſue of Hercules, who were mingled with the DORIANS, and returned again into the country of PELOPONNESVS, the greateſt number and chiefeſt of them, dwelled in the city of SPARTA: howbeit all they that came of that race had no right of ſucceſſion to the crowne, ſauing two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of bloud deſcended out of one ſelfe houſe, yet had they no more right nor intereſt vnto the realme, then the reſidue of the people: for the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were giuen vnto the inhabitants that could deſerue thē. Lyſander then being one of thoſe which was deſcended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithſtanding had no intereſt in the crowne: when he ſaw himſelfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous acts & merits, and that he had won many friends, and great credit & authority by dealing in matters of the ſtate: it grieued him much, to ſee that they which were no nobler then himſelfe ſhould be kings in that city which he had increaſed by his vertue, and that he could not haue ſo much power as to take from theſe two houſes, the Eurytiontides & the Agiades, the prerogatiue that the kings ſhould be choſen only out of one of theſe two houſes, and to caſt it vpon the of-ſpring of Hercules. Some ſay againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the iſſue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall SPARTANS alſo: becauſe that Hercules race ſhould not only deſire this reward of honor, but euen they alſo that followed his ſteps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honor. For he doubted not, but if they would diſpoſe the crowne in this ſort, that there was no man in the city of SPARTA that ſhould ſooner be choſen king then himſelfe: whereupon he attempted firſt to perſwade his citizens by very good reaſons, & to bring this about ẏ better he conned an oration without book, penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus, made him for this purpoſe. But afterwards weighing with himſelfe, that ſo great and ſtrange a change as he would bring in, had need of ſome better and ſtronger helpe: he began to frame a deuice, as they ſay, to moue the people by, much after the manner they vſe in tragedies, framing engines to bring ſome god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained inuention. He deuiſed certaine oracles and prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rhetorick would ſtand him in no ſtead, if firſt of al he did not fill the citizens harts with ſome ſuperſtition and feare of the gods, that he might bring them afterwards more eaſily vnto reaſon. And Ephorus ſaith, that he proued firſt to corrupt the Nun with money, that giueth all the oracles and anſwers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwards, he would haue won the Nun alſo at the temple of DODONE with mony, by Pherecles practiſe. And that he being reiected by them both, went laſtly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he ſpake vnto the prieſts, and offered them great ſtore of money for the ſame purpoſe. But they were ſo offended with Lyſander, that they ſent men of purpoſe to SPARTA, to accuſe him, that he would haue corrupted them with mony. The councell clearing Lyſander of this accuſation, the LYBIANS his accuſers at their departing ſaid: We will one day iudge more iuſtly, then you my Lords of LACEDÆMON haue done now, whē you ſhal come to dwell in our country of LYBIA: ſuppoſing there was an ancient propheſie that ſaid, the LACEDÆMONIANS one day ſhould come to dwell in the countrey of LYBIA. But we ſhall do better to write the whole ſtory at large of this practiſe ſubtilty, & malicious deuice, which was no matter of ſmall importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall propoſition, there were many great coniectures and preſuppoſitions, and many long circumſtances to bring it to concluſion, clusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an historiographer & philosopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the Realme of PONT, a woman that said, she was gotten with child by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleeue at all, and many also did beleeue it: so that she being deliuered of a goodly sonne, diuers noblemen and of great estate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This child I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lysander fetching the plot of his deuice from thence, added to all the rest of himselfe, to go on with his practise. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this ieast, giuing out a rumour of the birth of this child, without any suspition gathered out of the intent of this rumour. And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which they dispersed abroad through the citie of SPARTA, to wit, that the priests of the temple kept secret bookes of very ancient oracles, which they themselues durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man reade them, vnlesse he were begotten of the seed of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priests that kept these papers, and that by some secret marke and token, which they had amongst them: and thereby being knowne for Apolloes sonne, he might then take the bookes and reade the auncient reuelations and prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this sort, there was order taken, that Silenus should come and aske for these bookes, as though he were the son of Apollo: and that the priests which were priuy to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all, they should deliuer these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene indeed Apolloes sonne: and that he should openly reade them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the prophecies, that he should reade that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of LACEDÆMONIA: that it was better, & meetlier for the SPARTANS they should choose them for their kings, whom they found the meetest men of all their magistrates. But when Silenus was come to full age, and brought into GREECE of purpose to performe this practise, all the mysterie was marred by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lysander, who holp him to countenance this deuice: who when the matter should haue taken effect, shrunke for feare, and let the mysterie alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was betrayed in Lysanders life time, till after his death. For he died before king Agesilaus returned out of ASIA, being fallen into warres with BOEOTIA before his death, or rather hauing himselfe made GREECE to fall into warres. They do report it either way: and some lay the fault vpon him, other vpon the THEBANS, & other vpon them both: and they burthen the THEBANS withall, because they did vtterly ouerthrow the cõmon sacrifices which Agesilaus made in the citie of AVLIDE. And they say also, that Androclides and Amphitheus did raise this war among the GRECIANS, being before corrupted with mony by the king of PERSIA, to bring wars vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS in GREECE: and began to inuade & destroy the country of the PHOCIANS. Other say, that Lysander was very angry with the THEBANS: because they only of al other their confederates, did aske the tenth part of all the spoile which was won in the war against the ATHENIANS: and that they were not pleased that Lysander had sent the mony away vnto SPARTA. But aboue all, Lysander did malice them most, because they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to be deliuered from the oppression of thirty tyrants, whom he had stablished gouernors in ATHENS, and in whose fauor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACEDÆMONIANS had ordained by a commõ edict, that they that were banished, and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully be taken & apprehended in what place soeuer they fled vnto; & that whosoeuer should resist or let them to do it, they shold be proclaimed rebels, and open enemies vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. Againe, to contrary this edict, the THEBANS made another very like, & meet for the glorious deeds of Bacchus and Hercules their ancestors, for whom it was made: that euery house and city through the country of BOEOTIA, shold be open for the ATHENIANS that would come thither; and that he that would not helpe a banished man frõ ATHENS, against him that would take him away by force, should be fined & amerced at a talent. And also if there were any souldiers that went vnto ATHENS, through the countrey of BOEOTIA, that the THEBANS should not see nor heare it. This was no dissimulation to speake of, that they should ordaine things with so gentle words, and so meete for the people of GREECE, and then that the deedes should not answer vnto their edicts and proclamations. For Thrasybulus, and his fellowes of the conspiracie, who kept the castle of Phyla, they departed from

An edict made by the Thebãs in fauor of the banished men.

THEBES, with armour and mony, and the THEBANS did helpe them to begin and practise their enterprise so secretly, that it was not discouered. These were the causes why Lysander was so earnestly bent against the THEBANS, and his choler being so extreme, by reason of his melancholinesse that grew daily vpon him more and more through his age, he sollicited the EPHORES so, that he perswaded them to send a garrison thither: and himself taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iourny straight with his men. But afterwards they sent king Pausanias also with an armie thither, who was to fetch a great compasse about to enter into the countrey of BOEOTIA, by mount Citheron: and Lysander should go to meete him through the countrey of PHOCIDES, with a great company of souldiers besides. Now as Lysander went, he tooke the city of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded themselues to him as soone as he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he spoyled: and from thence he wrote vnto king Pausanias, that departing from PLATÆES, he should march directly to the city of ALIARTE, where he should not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne wals. These letters were intercepted by certain scouts of the THEBANS, who met with the messenger that caried thē. Thus the THEBANS hauing intelligence of their purpose, left their city in custody vnto the ATHENIANS, who were come to aide them, and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched al night with great speed, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lysander, and put halfe their men into the city. Now for Lysander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men vpon a hill which is neare to the city, & there to tarry the coming of king Pausanias. But afterwards when he saw that the day was far spent, and that he came not, he could tary no longer, but arming himselfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battel ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the meane season, the THEBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hand, did set vpon Lysanders rereward of his army against the fountaine called Cissusa: where the Poets faine that the nurses of Bacchus did wash him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, because the water that commeth out of it (though it be very cleare & sweet to drink) hath notwithstanding (I cannot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine: & not far from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTANS do alledge, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that part, & do shew his sepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the monument of Alcmena, which was buried (as they say) in that place, and was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, stirred not vntill they saw that Lysander with the first of his troope was neare vnto the towne wals: and then opening the gates on the sudden, they made a sally out vpon Lysander, & slue him with his soothsayer and a few other, because the most part of the voward fled into the strength of the battell. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue them not ouer so, but followed them so valiantly, that they brake their order, and made them al fly through the mountaines, after they had slaine 3000 of them in the field: so were the three hundred THEBANS also slaine there, who followed their enemies so fiercely, till they recouered straight narrow waies, of great strength for thē. These three hundred were in maner al those that were suspected in THEBES to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS secretly: wherfore, for the desire they had to take away this opinio from their citizens, they hazarded themselues to no purpose, and were cast away in this chase. King Pausanias heard news of this ouerthrow, going from PLATÆES vnto THESPIES, & went on further, marching still in battel ray towards ALIARTE, where Thrasybulus also arriued at the self same time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS from THEBES. And whē Pausanias was purposed to send to aske licence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had slaine, to the intent to bury them: the old SPARTANS that were in his army, misliking it much, at the first were angry in themselues. But afterwards they went vnto the king himself, to tell him that he dishonored SPARTA, to offer to take vp Lysanders body by his enemies leaue and fauour, and that he should valiantly recouer him by force of armes, and honourably bury him, after that he had ouercome their enemies: or else if it were their fortune to be ouerthrowne, that yet it should be more honorable for them to lie dead in the field by their Captaine, then to aske leaue to take vp his body. But notwithstanding all these words of the old men, king Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the wals of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away

To aske leaue of the enemie to burie the dead, is dishonourable away without great danger, although they ſhould win the battell: he ſent a Herauld to the enemies, and hauing made truce for certaine dayes, he led his army away, and tooke vp Lyſanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the territorie of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his tombe remaineth vpon the high way, going from DELPHES vnto the city of CHÆRONEA. Thus Pauſanius campe being lodged there, it is ſaid there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, ſaid that the enemies came to giue a charge vpon them, as Lyſander had paſſed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a SPARTAN a very friend of Lyſanders by, hauing heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? anſwered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euen there it was where the enemies did ouerthrow ỹ firſt of our men which were ſlaine in the fields: for the riuer that runneth by the wals of the city, is called Oplites. The SPARTAN hearing that, burſt out in weeping for ſorrow, ſaying: Then I ſee it is vnpoſſible for a man to auoide his deſtinie. For Lyſander aforetime had an Oracle that told him thus:

Lyſanders tombe.

Oplites fl. Deſtinie inexitable.

Lyſander, take good heed, come not I thee aduiſe, Neare Oplites that riuers banks, in any kind of wiſe.
Nor neare the Dragon he, which is the earth her ſonne,
Who at the length will thee aſſault, and on thy backe will runne.

Howbeit ſome take it, that this riuer of Oplites is not that which paſſeth by the wals of ALIARTE, but it is the riuer that runneth neare vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the riuer of Phliarus, hard by the city; & they ſay that in old time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Iſomantus. He that ſlue Lyſander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorus, who caried a Dragon painted vpon his target: and this was that which the Oracle of likelihood did ſignifie. They ſay alſo, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the THEBANS had an Oracle from the temple of Apollo Iſmenias: which Oracle did prophecy the battel which they wan by the caſtle of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE alſo, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that Oracle was this:

Phliarus fl. Hoplia, Iſomantus. Neochorus ſlue Lyſander.

When thou thy nets ſhalt ſpread, the wolues for to intrap,
Beware thou come not neare vnto, a little hill by hap.
Of Orchalide. Nor neare, to any his confines:
For there the craftie foxes keepe, their dens and priuie mines.

He calleth the territorie that is about DELIVM, the vttermoſt confines, becauſe BOEOTIA doth confine there with the countrey of ATTICA, and the hill Orchalide which is now called Alopecon (to ſay the foxe denne) which lieth on that ſide of the city of ALIARTE, that looketh towards mount Helicon. Lyſander being ſlaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death ſo ill, that they would haue condemned king Pauſanias of treaſon by law: who durſt not abide the triall, but fled vnto the city of TEGEA, where he ended the reſt of his life within the ſanctuary of the temple of Minerua. When Lyſander was dead, his pouerty appeared to the world, which made his vertue farre more famous, then when he liued. For when they ſaw, that for all the gold and ſiluer which had paſſed through his hands, for all his great authority and countenance that he had caried, and for al that ſo many cities and townes did come to honor him: and briefly, for all that he had ſo great & puiſſant a kingdome in manner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increaſe his houſe with ſo much as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we ſhould rather beleeue when he praiſeth, then when he diſcommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delight to diſpraiſe, then to praiſe any. It fortuned not long after, as Ephorus writeth, that the LACEDÆMONIANS and their confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lyſanders letters were to be ſeene that were in his houſe. King Ageſilaus going thither to peruſe them, amongſt other writings, found the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus, which Lyſander had prepared to perſwade the SPARTANS to change their gouernement, and to declare vnto them that they ſhould reuoke the prerogatiue which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: that the kings of SPARTA could not be choſen but out of thoſe two families, & to leaue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefeſt magiſtrates might be lawfully choſen kings of SPARTA. Ageſilaus ſtood indifferent to haue ſhewed this oration openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might ſee what manner a citizen Lyſander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a graue wiſe man, and Preſident at that time of the councell of the Ephori, would not ſuffer him: ſaying, that he ſhould not dig Lyſander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was ſo paſſingly well and eloquently penned to perſwade. Yet notwithſtanding, they did him great honour after his death: & amongſt others, condemned two citizens in a great ſumme of mony, that were made ſure to two of his daughters while he liued, & refuſed to marry them when he was dead, ſeeing their father died ſo poore: becauſe they ſought to match in his houſe, ſuppoſing he had bene rich, and forſooke them afterwards for their fathers pouerty, when they ſaw he died a good and iuſt man. Thus we ſee, that at SPARTA there was a puniſhment for them that did not mary, or that maried too late, or that maried ill: and vnto this puniſhment were they moſt ſubiect that ſought great matches for couetouſneſſe of goods. This is all we haue to write of Lyſanders life and acts.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Syllaes kindred.

Vcius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noblemen and gentlemen of ROME: and there was one of his anceſtours called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Conſull. He notwithſtanding his Conſulſhip, wan more diſhonour by defame, then he obtained honor by dignity of Conſull. For they finding in his houſe aboue ten pounds worth of plate, contrary to the law at that time expreſly forbidding it, he was expulſed the Senate, and loſt his place there, after which diſhonor once receiued, his iſſue neuer roſe, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla himſelfe had very little left him by his father: ſo that in his youth he was faine to hire another mans houſe, and ſate at a ſmall rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they ſaw him richer then they thought he had deſerued. For when he gloried & boaſted of the victory at his returne from the wars of AFRICKE, there was a noble man that ſaid vnto him: Why, how is it poſſible thou ſhouldeſt be an honeſt man, that hauing nothing left thee by thy father, thou art now come to haue ſo much? Now, though ROME had left her ancient iuſtice and pureneſſe of life, wherewith ſhe brought vp her people in former times, and that their hearts were poyſoned with couetous deſire of vaine ſuperfluous delights: yet notwithſtanding it was a foule reproach to them that did not maintaine themſelues in the pouerty of their fathers, as vnto them that did conſume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which which their parents had left them. But afterwards also when he caried the whole sway in Rome, and that he had put so many men to death: a free man being borne of the slaues infranchised, and being ready to be throwne downe the rocke Tarpeian, because he had saued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death wheresoeuer they were found, cast it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had liued & dwelt together a long time in one selfe house, he hauing payed a thousand Nummos for the rent of the vppermost roomes of the same house, and Sylla three thousand for all the neathermost roomes. So that betweene both their wealthes, there was but onely two thousand and fiftie Drachmas of Athens difference. And this is that we find in writing of his first wealth. As for his stature and person, that appeareth sufficiently by the statues and images that were made for him which yet remaine. But for his eies, they were like fire, and wonderfull red: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to behold. For he was copper-nosed, and that was full of white streakes here and there: whereupon they say that the surname of Sylla was giuen him, by reason of his colour. And there was a iester at Athens that finely mocked him in his verse:

Sylla is like a blacke Berie sprinkled with meale.

It is not amisse to search out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward markes and tokens. It is said also that he was so naturally giuen to mocke and iest, that being a yong man vnknowne, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tumblers, but still eating and tippling with them in dissolute manner. And afterwards also when he was in his chiefest authority, he would commonly eate and drink with the most impudent iesters and scoffers, and all such rakehels, as made profession of counterfeit mirth, & would striue with the badest of them to giue the finest mockes: wherein he did not only a thing vncomely for his yeares, and dishonored the maiesty of his office and dignity, but thereby also grew careless & negligent in matters of great importance, whereunto he should haue taken good regard. For after he was once set at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very actiue, painefull, and seuere: yet falling into such company, by drinking, bowsing, & making good cheere, he suddenly became another maner of man. So that without all compasse of modesty and iudgement, he was too familiar and conuersant with players, iesters, tumblers, and dancers: who when they had him in that veine, might do what they would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of letchery, whereunto he was greatly giuen, and easily drawne after loue and pleasure: in such sort, as his gray haires could not restraine his voluptuous life. His unlawfull lusting loue began in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire vntill his latter age. For at the first he loued Nicopolis a rich curtisan: & frequenting her company by oft accesse, besides that he spent the prime of his beauty and youth in feasting her with great delight and passing pleasure, she afterwards became in loue with him, so that when she died, she made Sylla her heire of all she had. He was heire also vnto his mother in law, who loued him as her own begotten sonne: and by these two good haps he was stept vp to pretie wealth. Afterwards being chosen Quæstor (to say treasurer) the first time that Marius was Consull, he imbarked with him in his iourny into Africke, to warre with king Iugurth. When he was arriued at the campe, he shewed himselfe a man of great seruice in all other things, but in this especially, that he could wisely vse the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wan Bocchus king of the Nvmidians to be his fast and faithfull friend: whose Ambassadours, that scaped from a company of Nvmidian theeues, he courteously entertained, and hauing giuen them goodly presents, sent them backe againe with a safe conuoy. Now concerning king Bocchus, he had of long time both hated and feared king Iugurth his sonne in law: insomuch, that after he was ouercome in battell, and came to him for succour, Bocchus practised treason against him, and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Iugurth should be taken by Sylla, then by himselfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a small number of souldiers to accompany him (without respect of perill or danger) went and committed himselfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take another: considering also that the king whom he trusted was so vniust of his word, euen vnto his neerest friends and confederates. Now Bocchus hauing Iugurth and Sylla both in his power, and brought himselfe to that pinch, that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to resolue which of the two he should deale withall, in the end went on with his first plot and deuice of treason, and so deliuered Iugurth into Syllaes hands. Indeed Marius triumphed for taking of king Iugurth: but his euill willers, for the spite and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory & honor of Iugurths taking wholly vnto Sylla. That secretly went to Marius heart, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from a base, obscure, and vnknown life, to be knowne and well accepted of the people of ROME, and to taste also what honor meant) became so ambitious and couetous of glory: that he caused the story to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vse to weare & seale withall: wherein king Bocchus was deliuering of Iugurth vnto Sylla, and Sylla also receiuing Iugurth prisoner. These things misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, iudging that Sylla was not so much enuied as himselfe, he tooke him with him vnto the wars. Marius in his second Consulship, made Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Consulship, he had charge vnder him of a thousand footemen, and did many notable and profitable exploits for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant, he tooke one Copillus, a Generall of the GAVLES Tectosages. And when he was Colonell of a thousand footmen, he so wrought the MARSIANS (a populous nation of ITALIE) that he perswaded them to remaine good friends and confederates of the ROMAINES. For this his good seruice, he found that Marius grew in great misliking with him, because from thenceforth he neuer gaue him any honourable charge, or occasion to shew good seruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Consulship. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somewhat slacke and cold in martiall matters, which was the cause that indeed he did commit vnto Sylla all the speciall seruice and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gaue him occasion not only to increase his estimation, but also his credit and power. For by force of armes, he conquered the most part of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe lacking victuals, hauing commission, he made a maruellous great quantity of prouision to be brought thither, insomuch as Catulus camp being plentifully victualled, they sent their store and surplussage vnto Marius souldiers, the which Sylla himselfe writeth, did much mislike Marius. And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon so light occasion, was followed with ciuill warres, great effusion of bloud, and with incurable factions and dissentions, that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the ROMAINE state and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that foresaw the ruines of commonweales, when he counselled, and also commanded gouernors to flie ambition, as a most pestilent and mortall fury vnto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the wars, would haue made his way open to preferre him to some honorable office in the city of ROME: he was no sooner returned from the wars, but he would needs proue the peoples good wils vnto him, & procured his name to be billed among them that sued for the Prætorship of the city (that is to say, the office of the ordinary Iudge that ministreth iustice vnto the citizens) but he was reiected by the voyce of the people. For the which he layd the fault vpon the meaner sort, saying, that the communalty knew well inough the friendship he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them see noble huntings and great fightings of wild beasts of LYBIA: and that therefore they did chuse other Prætors, and put him by his suite, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusall: for his own act doth condemne himselfe: because the next yeare following he was chosen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with curtesie, and partly with mony. So he falling out with Cæsar vpon that occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would vse the power and authority of his office vpon him. But Cæsar smiling, answered him, Thou hast reason to call it thine office, for indeed it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Prætorship was expired, he was sent with an army into CAPPADOCIA, colouring his voyage thither with commission to restore Ariobarzanes into his kingdome againe: howbeit the only cause of his iourny was indeed to suppresse king Mithridates a little, who took too many things in hand, and increased his power and dominion with a new signiory of no lesse greatnes then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great army out of ITALY with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the cõfederates of the ROMAINES in euery place, through whose aide he ouerthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS, & afterwards also a great number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like case to aide them: so that he

expulsed Gordius king of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and restored Ariobarzanes to his Realme againe. After which victory Sylla, remained by the riuer of Euphrates, and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassadour of Arsaces king of the PARTHIANS. Now these two nations, the ROMAINES and the PARTHIANS, were neuer friends before: and that with other things shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came first to him by his meanes to seeke friendship with the ROMAINES. They say, that receiuing this Ambassadour Orobazus, he made three chaires to be brought out, the one for King Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassadour, and the third for himselfe, which he placed in the middest betweene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaue audience vnto the Ambassadour: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwards put Orobazus to death. Some do commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maiestie among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing himselfe stately out of time, and to no purpose. We do reade that a Soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed and considered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouings and gestures of mind and bodie, to iudge not by the climate of the countrey, but according to the rules of his art what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayd that Sylla one day must needes come to be a great man, and that he maruelled how he could suffer it, that he was not euen then the chiefest man of the world. When Sylla was returned againe to ROME, one Censorinus accused him of extortion, that he had carried away a great summe of money with him, contrarie to the law, out of one of their confederates countrey: howbeit he prosecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time the enmitie begunne betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe vpon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauour of ROME, and partly also for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carrying tokens of triumph, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Iugurth, which he deliuered into the hand of Sylla, being all of pure gold. This did so offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the city of ROME taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederates of ITALY bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruellous great warre which fell out very dangerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMAINES, Marius did no notable exploite: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath neede of a strong, lustie, and able body. For Sylla to the contrarie, hauing done notable seruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wan the fame and estimation among the ROMAINES, of a noble souldier, and worthie Captaine: and among the enemies themselues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done: who, when his aduersaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deeds vnto the fauour of Fortune, and did paint Fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and snared in nets whilest he slept, he tooke it in very ill part, and was maruellous angrie with them that did it, saying, that they robbed him of the glory that iustly belonged vnto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole discourse of his doings in his voyage, he sayd vnto them: My Lords of ATHENS, Fortune hath had no part in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the gods, it should seeme, were so angry with this foolish ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went vtterly against the haire with him: vntill at the length he came to be so hated of the people, that in the end they banished him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not onely patiently abide their words, that said, he was a happie man, and singularly beloued of Fortune: but also increasing this opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the gods, did attribute the honour of his doings vnto Fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fancie, that the gods did prosper him in all his doings. For he wrote himselfe in his commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotely according to the sudden occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good aduice he had determined of. Furthermore, when he said that he was better borne vnto Fortune, then to the warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperitie came rather by Fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly ſubmit himſelfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: conſidering that he did attribute it to the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the gods, that he neuer diſagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignity and authority as himſelfe was. For where it was thought he would haue bene a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very courteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reaſon of the ſociety of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counſelled him to think nothing more certain & aſſured, then that which the gods ſhould reueale vnto him, and command him in his nights dreame. He writeth alſo that when he was ſent with an armie vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth ſuddenly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a maruellous bright flame of fire that aſcended vp to the element. The wiſe men being asked their opinions about the ſame, made anſwer, that a very honeſt man, and alſo a maruellous faire man of complexion taking ſoueraigne authority in his hands, ſhould pacifie all tumults and ſeditions which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla ſaid it was himſelfe whom the gods meant, becauſe that amongſt other things he had the ſingular gift of beauty, that his haire was yellow as gold: and he was not aſhamed to name himſelfe an honeſt man, after he had wonne ſo many notable great victories. Thus haue we ſufficiently ſpoken of the truſt he had in the fauour of the gods. And furthermore he ſeemed to be very contrary in his maners, and vnlike to himſelf. For if he took away much in one place, he gaue as much more alſo in another. Some he preferred without cauſe: and others he put downe without reaſon. Hee would be very gentle vnto them of whom he would haue ought: and vnto thoſe that ſought of him, he would ſtand much vpon his honour, and look for great reuerence. Whereby men could hardly diſcerne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vſed in puniſhing of them that had offended him: ſometimes he hanged vp men for very ſmall and light cauſes: ſome other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the moſt grieuous offences in the world, and lightly pardoned and forgaue ſuch faults as were in no wiſe to be forgiuen: and afterwards againe would puniſh right ſmall crimes, with murthers, effuſion of blood, and confiſcation of goods. This iudgement may be giuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging mind: yet notwithſtanding he quallified that naturall bitterneſſe with reaſon, giuing place to neceſſity, and his benefit. For in this war of the confederates, his ſouldiers ſlue Albinus one of his Lieutenants, beating him to death with ſtaues and ſtones, being a man of goodly quality, and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he paſſed ouer with ſilence, vſing no maner of puniſhment, and turned it to a boaſt in the end, ſaying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any peece of ſeruice that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faults by worthy ſeruice. And furthermore, hee did not regard them that did reproue him: but hauing determined with himſelfe to deſtroy Marius, and to procure that he might be choſen Generall in the wars againſt king Mithridates, becauſe that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cauſe he flattered and curried fauour with his ſouldiers that ſerued vnder him. At his returne to ROME from theſe wars of the confederates, he was choſen Conſull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeares old, and maried with Cæcilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe Biſhop of ROME, for which mariage the common people ſang ſongs and ballads vp and downe ROME againſt him: and many of the Noble men enuied him for it, thinking him vnworthy of ſo noble a Lady, whom they thought worthy to be Conſull, as Titus Liuius ſaith. Now ſhe was not his only wife, for he had a young wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After he had maried Ælia, then a third called Celia, whom he put away becauſe ſhe brought him no children. But notwithſtanding ſhe went honourably away from him, with very good words of her, beſides many other goodly rich gifts he gaue her: howbeit ſhortly after he maried Metella which made the world ſuſpect that Celia was put away for her naughtineſſe. Howſoeuer it was, Sylla did euer honour and loue Metella: in ſo much as the people of ROME afterwards making ſute, that they that were baniſhed for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refuſed by Sylla, they cryed out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their requeſt. And it ſeemeth alſo that when he had taken the city of ATHENS, he dealt more cruelly with them, becauſe that ſome of them had ſcoffed at Metella from the wals: howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Conſulſhip was a ſmall matter, in compariſon of that which he looked for in the time to come: was maruellous marueilous desirous to go against Mithridates. But therein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition and couetousnesse of glory stood against him, and sued to go that iourny in like maner, being subiect to those passions, which neuer wax old, as we may daily see by experiēce. For being now a heauie man, sickly of body, and broken in seruice abroad in the wars, from the which he came but newly home, and bruised moreouer with age: did notwithstanding yet aspire to haue the charge of the wars so farre off beyond the seas. Wherefore to obtaine his purpose, whilest Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to giue order for certaine things that were to be done, he remaining in the city, did practise this pestilent mortall sedition, which alone did more hurt vnto the city of ROME, then all the enemies that ROME euer had: the which the gods themselues had foreshewed by many signes and tokens. For fire tooke of it selfe in the staues of the ensignes, which they had much ado to quench. Three Rauens brought their yong ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the sight of many people, and afterwards caried the garbage they left of them in their nests. Rats also hauing gnawne some iewels of gold in a Church, the sextens setting a trap for them, as a rat was taken full of yong, and kindled fiue yong rats in the trap, of the which she eat vp three. But more yet, on a faire bright day when there was no cloud seene in the element at all, men heard such a sharpe sound of a trumpet, that they were almost all out of their wits, for feare of so great a noise. Whereupon the wise men and soothsayers of THVSCAN being asked their opinions, they answered: that this so strange and wonderfull a signe did foreshew the change of the world, and the departure out of this into another life: for they hold opinion, that there should be eight worlds, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and fashions of life: vnto euery one of the which, sayd they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance: but that they should all end their course within the space of the reuolution of the great yeare: and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there shall appeare such strange signes on the earth, or in the element. So that such as haue studied that science, do certainly know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contrary vnto the first in their liues and maners, and which are either more or lesse acceptable vnto the gods, then those which liued in former age. For they say, that amongst great changes and alterations which are done in those places from one age vnto another, the science of diuination and foretelling of things to come, doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth God to send most certaine and manifest signes, to know and foretel things to come. And in contrariwise also in another age it groweth to contempt, and loseth her reputation, for that it is very rash, and faileth to meete with the most part of her predictions, because she hath but obscure meanes, and all her instruments defaced, to know what should come. And these be the fables which the wisest soothsayers of THVSCAN reported abroad, and they specially who seemed to haue some singular speculation aboue others. But as the Senate were talking with the soothsayers of these woders, being assembled together within the temple of the goddesse Bellona, a sparrow came flying into the church in sight of them all, and caried a grashopper in her bill, and parted it in the middest, & left one part within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wise men and interpreters of such wonders, said, that they doubted a commotion & a rising of the country men against the commons of the city, because the common people of the city do crie out continually like grashoppers, & the husbandmen do keepe themselues vpon their lands in the country. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar with Saturninus, one of the Tribunes of the people, who in all kinds of wickednesse and mischiefe that a man can reckon, would giue place to no liuing creature: so that a man need not to seeke or demand any where for worse then he, but the question is rather wherein he himselfe was not the worst of all others. For he was full repleat with all kinds of cruelty, auarice, and rashnesse, and that so extremely, as he cared not what villany and wickednesse he openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had set vp a table in the open market place, where he sold freedome, making slaues and strangers denizons of ROME for their money: and for that purpose he entertained a guard of three thousand about him, besides a band of yong gentlemen of the order of knights that attended alwaies vpon his person ready at his commandement, whom he called the gard against the Senate. And furthermore, himselfe hauing passed a law by the voice of the people, that no Senatour should borrow nor owe aboue two thousand Drachmas: it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beast, being left by Marius amongst the people, turned all things topsie turuey, by force of armes and maine ſtrength. He made alſo many wicked lawes to paſſe by voice of the people, and amongſt others, that one ſpecially, whereby he gaue Marius commiſſion to make warres againſt king Mithridates. For which extreme oppreſſions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Conſuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike cauſes, and ceaſſed the common courſe of law and iuſtice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the law, in an open aſſembly in the market place, before the temple of Caſtor and Pollux: Sulpitius the Tribune came vpon them with his ſouldiers, and ſlue many people, and among others, the Conſull Pompeius owne ſonne, and the father himſelfe being Conſull, had much ado to ſaue his life by flying. And Sylla the other Conſull, was alſo purſued euen into Marius houſe, where he was compelled to promiſe before his departure, preſently to go and reuoke the adiornement of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing depriued Pompeius of his Conſulſhip, did not depoſe Sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had giuen him to make warres againſt Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And ſending Colonels to the city of Nola to receiue the armie that lay there, and to bring them vnto Marius, Sylla preuented them, and fled to the campe before them, and told the ſouldiers all what had paſt, as it was indeed: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and ſlue Marius Colonels with ſtones. Marius on the other ſide put all Syllaes friends to death at Rome, and tooke the ſpoyle of their goods and houſes: ſo was there nothing elſe but flying from the campe to Rome, and from Rome to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner beſides themſelues, not being able to gouerne as they would, but driuen to obey Marius and Sulpitius commandements. Who being aduertiſed that Sylla was comming towards Rome, ſent ſtraight two Prætors vnto him, Brutus and Seruilius, to command him as from the Senate, to approch no nearer. Theſe two Prætors ſpake a litle too boldly vnto Sylla: wherupon the ſouldiers fell to a mutiny, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood indifferent whether to kill them preſently in the field, or no: howbeit they brake their axes and bundels of rods, which were caried before them, & took their purple robes wherwith they were apparelled as magiſtates, from thē, & ſent them home thus ſhamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now to Rome, their ſad ſilence only, and themſelues ſo ſtripped beſides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignity, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes, but ſuch as were the worſt that poſſible could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie the ſedition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make himſelfe ſtrong by force: and Sylla with his companion Quintus Pompeius, departed in the meane time from the city Nola, and brought ſixe entire legions on with him, who deſired no other thing but to make haſt to march to Rome ward. Howbeit Sylla ſtood in doubt with himſelfe what to do, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill ſuch time as his ſoothſayer Poſthumius hauing conſidered the ſignes and tokens of the ſacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his hands, and bad him bind them hard, and ſhut him vp faſt, vntill the day of battell ſhould be paſt: ſaying, that he was contented to ſuffer death, if he had not good ſucceſſe, and that out of hand, to his great honour. And it is ſaid alſo, that the ſame night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame the goddeſſe Bellona, whom the Romaines do greatly honour, following therein the Cappadocians: and I know not whether it be the Moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddeſſe of battels. So he thought, that ſhe comming to him did put lightning into his hand, commanding him that he ſhould lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after another by their proper names: and that they being ſtriken with this lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This viſion incouraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the ſame to Pompeius, his fellow Conſull and companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rome. When he was at Picines, there came other Ambaſſadours vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and furie, declaring therewithall that the Senate would grant him all things that ſhould be meete and reaſonable. When Sylla had heard the meſſage, he anſwered them, that he would campe there: and ſo commanded the marſhals to deuide the ſquadrons according to their manner. The Ambaſſadours beleeuing that he would haue done ſo indeed, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backes were no ſooner turned, but Sylla ſtraight ſent Lucius Baſillus, and Caius Mummius, before to ſeize one of the gates of Rome, and the walls which were on the ſide of mount Eſquilin, and he himſelfe alſo in perſon with all poſſible ſpeed marched after them. Baſillus entred Rome, and wanne the gate by

by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp ſtraight to the top of their houſes, and with tiles and ſtones ſtayed and kept him, not onely for entring any further: but alſo draue him backe againe, euen to the very wals of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla himſelfe to ROME, who ſeeing apparantly in what ſtate things ſtood, cryed out to his men, and bade them ſet fire on the houſes: and himſelfe taking a torch light in his hand, ſhewed them the way what they ſhould do, appointing his archers and darters to hurle and beſtow their darts and other fiery inſtruments, to the tops of the houſes. Herein he was too much ouercome with vnreaſonable choler, paſſion, and deſire of reuenge: for ſeeking onely to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to friends, to parents or confederates, neither had he yet any manner of remorſe or pitie: ſuch and ſo fierie was his anger then, that he put no kinde of difference betweene thoſe that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that he would make free all the ſlaues that would come to his part. But forthwith came his enemies, ſet vpon him, and preſt him ſo neare, that he was conſtrained vtterly to flie and forſake the city. Then Sylla aſſembling the Senate, cauſed Marius, and certaine others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed by a ſlaue of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promiſe paſt by publike edict: but when he had made him free, he cauſed him to be throwne downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he promiſed by proclamation a great ſumme of mony to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and vnthankfull part, conſidering that Marius not many daies before, hauing Sylla in his owne houſe, in his hands and cuſtodie, deliuered him from peril, and ſet him in ſafety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had ſuffered Sulpitius to haue ſlaine him, himſelfe had bene ſoueraigne Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might haue ruled all things at his own will and pleaſure. But Sylla ſhortly after vpon the like aduantage, vſed no ſuch maner of requitall or grauity towards him, which bred a ſecret miſliking amongſt the Senate: howbeit the common people made open ſhew of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his nephew, and one Seruius, who vpon confidence of his fauour, preſented themſelues to ſue for certaine offices. And beſides the ſhame of this refuſall, to ſpite him the more, they choſe others in their ſteades, whoſe honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely miſlike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wiſely diſſembling the matter, ſeemed to be very glad, ſaying that by this meanes the people of ROME enioyned a full and perfect liberty, that in ſuch caſes of election they might freely do what themſelues liſted. And to mitigate ſomewhat the peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuſe Lucius Cinna Conſull, who was of a contrarie faction vnto him: hauing firſt bound him by ſolemne oath and curſe to fauour his doings and whole proceedings. Whereupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a ſtone in his hand, did ſolemnely ſweare and promiſe, that he would be Syllaes faithfull friend: beſeeching the gods if he did the contrarie, that he might be throwne out of ROME, euen as he threw that ſtone out of his hand: and with thoſe words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithſtanding all theſe curſes, Cinna was no ſooner entred into his Conſulſhip, but preſently he began to change and alterall. For amongſt other things, he would needs haue Sylla accuſed: and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuſer. But Sylla left him with his Iudges, and went to make warres againſt Mithridates. And it is ſaid, that about the time that Sylla tooke ſhip, and departed out of ITALIE, there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods vnto king Mithridates, who was at that preſent in the citie of PERGAMVS: as amongſt others, that the PERGAMENIANS to honour Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victory, carrying a garland of triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: ſo ſoone as ſhe was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middeſt of the Theater, and burſt al to peeces. Whereby all the people that were preſent, were ſtricken with a maruellous feare, and Mithridates himſelfe beganne to miſlike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA from the ROMAINES, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the kings which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the city of PERGAMVS, to deuide the riches and great territories among his friends. As touching his ſonnes, the eldeſt gouerned the realme of PONTVS, and BOSPHORVS, which he inherited from his predeceſſors, euen vnto the deserts beyond the marishes of Mœotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great army in conquering of THRACIA, and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenants moreouer, did many notable conquests in diuerse places, with a great power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and master of all the sea for the great number of ships he had, conquered the Iles CYCLADES, and all those beyond the head of MALEA, and specially amongst others, the Ile of EVBOEA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GRECE to rebell, euen vnto THESSALIE, sauing that he receiued some losse by the city of CHÆRONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenants of Sentius gouernour of MACEDON (a man of great wisedome and valiantnesse) came against him, and stayed him for going any further, ouerrunning the whole countrey of BOEOTIA like a furious raging riuer. And setting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHÆRONEA, ouerthrew him in three seuerall battels: repulsed, and enforced him to take the seas againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commandement to giue place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commission in that behalfe giuen him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the countrey of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his Generall Sentius, notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could haue wished, and that all GRECE were very willing to reuolt, for the reputation of his wisedome and goodnesse. Howbeit the things that we before haue spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those parts. Sylla now vpon his arriuall, recouered immediatly all the other cities of GRECE: who being aduertised of his comming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of ATHENS onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Aristion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, besieged the hauen of PIRÆA round, causing it to be battered and assaulted on euery side, with all sorts of engines and instruments of batterie: whereas if he could haue had patience but a little longer, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting himselfe in any manner of danger, the same being brought to such extreme dearth and scarcity of all kinde of victuals. But the haste that he made to returne againe to ROME, for feare of the new change which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that sort with great danger, many battels, and infinite charge: considering also, that besides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thousand mules and mulets labouring daily to furnish his engines of batterie. And when all other wood failed him, because his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of themselues by reason of their weight, others consumed with fire throwne from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, then any other parke of pleasure in all the suburbes of the city, and felled downe all the wood of the parke Lycæum. And standing in need of a great summe of money to entertaine this warre withall, he dealt also with the holiest temples of al GRECE, causing them to bring him from the temples of EPIDAVRVM and OLYMPVS, all the richest and most precious iewels they had. He wrote moreouer vnto the councell of the AMPHICTYONS holden in the city of DELPHES, to bring him the ready mony they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, then if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to vse it, he would restore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis PHOCIAN, one of his very friends and familiars, and commanded him to weigh all that he took. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in presence of the councell of the AMPHYCTYONS he wept, that the teares ranne downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to do such an acte against his will. And when some that were present, told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes Citherne in the temple: whether he beleeued it was so indeede, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he maruelled he could not consider, that singing and playing on the Citherne, were tokens rather of ioy then of anger, and therefore that he should not faile to proceede farther, and bring him those things which he commanded, for that (said he) Apollo did giue them him. Now for the other iewels of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew not that they were sent vnto Sylla: but the siluer tunne, which only was that that remained of the offerings of the kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in peeces, because it was so great and massie, that the beasts of draught could could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other ancient Romaine captaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus Æmylius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of Greece, and the rest also hauing ouerthrowne the kings of Macedon, they neuer once touched the gold and siluer of the temples of Greece: but contrarily sent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honour and reuerence. But as to them, they were all captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their souldiers well trained, and obedient at commandement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutinie. And for themselues, were kings in greatnesse of courage and magnanimity of mind: but in expence of their persons, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but needfull and necessary, proportioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, sought not their preferment in the common-wealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with another, then with strangers their enemies, were compelled to flatter their souldiers whom they should command, and to buy their paines and seruice, feeding them still with large and great expences, to please and content them. Wherein they did not consider, that they brought their country into bondage, and made themselues slaues of the vilest people of the world, whilst that in the meane time they sought to commaund by all meanes possible those, which in many respects were farre better then themselues. And this was the cause that both draue Marius out of Rome, and made him also to returne againe against Sylla. This selfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octauius, and Fimbria to slay Flaccus: of which euils Sylla was the very first and only author, spending out of all reason, and giuing the souldiers largely that serued vnder him, to win their goodwils the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, Sylla had need of mountaines of money, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make strangers trayters, and besides, to furnish and satisfie his owne dissolute souldiers: for he had such an earnest desire to take the city of Athens, that he could not possibly be disswaded from it. And either it was of a certaine vaine ambition he had to fight against the ancient reputation of that city, being then but a shadow to that it had bene: or else of a very anger, for the mockes and gibes which the tyrant Aristion gaue in his speeches from the wals, against him and Metella, to spite him the more withall. This tyrant Aristion was full of all cruelty and wickednesse, hauing taken vp all the worst qualities and greatest imperfections of king Mithridates, and heaped them wholly together in himselfe: by reason whereof the poore city of Athens which had escaped from so many warres, tyrannies, and ciuill dissentions vntill that present time, was by him, as by an vncurable disease, brought vnto al extremity: for a bushell of wheate was worth a thousand Drachmas, and men were driuen for famine to eate feuerfew that grew about the castle: and they caused old shooes and old oyle pots to be sodden, to deliuer some sauour vnto that they did eate, whilst the tyrant himself did nothing all day long but cram in meate, and drinke drunke, dance, maske, scoffe, and flout at the enemies, suffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane season to go out for lack of oyle. And when the Nun of the same temple sent vnto him for a quarter of a bushell of wheate, he sent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellors of the city, the priests & religious came to the castle, holding vp their hands, and beseeching him to take some pitie of the city, and fall to composition with Sylla: he made them to be driuen away & scattered with slings. In the end, very late, & yet with great ado, he sent two or three of his quaffing companions vnto Sylla, who whē they were come to him, made no demand of composition for the towne, but began to praise and magnifie the deeds of Theseus, of Eumolpus, and of the Athenians against the Medes. Whereupon Sylla made them this answer: My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rhetoricke: for the Romaines sent me not hither to learne nor to study, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meane time there were certaine spies in the city that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant because he kept no better watch on that side of the wall that was directly ouer against the Heptachalchon, which was the onely place where the enemies might easilieſt get vp vpon the wals. Those spies wēt straight vnto Sylla & told him what they had heard the old men say. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to see it: and perceiuing that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And himselfe writes in his commentaries, that the first man that scaled the wals, was Marcus Teius: who finding a souldier ready to resist him, gaue him such a sore blow with his sword vpon his headpeece, that his sword brake in two; and yet notwithstanding that he saw himselfe naked & disarmed of a sword, did not for al that giue backe, but stood still to it, and kept the place so long till through him the city was taken, and all vpon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe betweene the hauen of PIRÆA, and the holy hauen: and hauing before made the breach very plaine, entred into the city about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruellous noise with a number of hornes, and sounding of trumpets, and all his armie with him in order of battell, crying, To the sacke, to the sacke: kill, kill. For he had giuen them the towne in spoyle, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ran through the streetes with their swords drawne, making an vncredible slaughter: so that to this day they be not acknowne, nor do not declare what number of persons were slaine, but to shew the greatnes of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the blood ranne. For besides them that were slaine through all the city, the blood of them onely that were slaine in the market steed, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbes of the city. But if the multitude of the people that were slaine in this sort were great, much more (or so many at the least) it is said were those that slue themselues, for the sorrow and compassion they had to see their countrey in such pitifull state, supposing certainly that their city was now come to vtter ruine and destruction. This opinion made the noblest men of the city to despaire of their owne safetie, and feared to liue any longer, because they thought they should find no mercy, nor moderation of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the ROMAINE Senators that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the body of the city, and the rather for that he had already quenched the thirst of his rauening mind sufficiently well: after that he had somewhat said in praise of the ancient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to giue the greater number vnto the smaller, and the liuing to the dead. Sylla writeth himselfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the city of ATHENS on the very selfe day of the calends of March, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at ATHENS in memory of Noes floud, and of the vniuersall destruction of the whole world, that was in old time by rage of waters, falling out euen in that very moneth. When the city was thus taken, the tyrant Aristion fled into the castle, where he was besieged by Curio, whom Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last constrained thereunto for lacke of water, he yeelded. The castle was no sooner giuen vp, but immediatly by Gods prouidence, the weather miraculously altered. For the selfe same day, and the very selfe instant that Curio carried the tyrant Aristion out of the castle, the element being very faire and cleare, the cloudes suddenly gathered together, and there fell such a maruellous glut of raine, that all the castle was full of water. Shortly after also, Sylla hauing gotten the hauen of PIRÆA, burnt the greatest part of the buildings: amongst others was the arsenall and armorie, which Philo in old time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of King Mithridates, comming from THRACIA and MACEDON, with a hundred thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and foure score and ten thousand carts of warre all armed with sithes: sent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at anker in the hauen of MYNYCHIA, and not willing to leaue the sea, nor come to fight with the ROMAINES, but seeking rather to draw these warres out in length, and to cut off all victuals from his enemies. Sylla vnderstanding this drift better then himselfe, departed out of the countrey of ATTICA (a very barren soyle, and indeed not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into BOEOTIA: wherein most men thought he committed great errour to leaue ATTICA, which is a very hard countrey for horsemen, and to go into BOEOTIA, a plaine champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well inough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen, and their armed carts with sithes. But to auoide famine, and lacke of victuals as we haue said, he was compelled to seeke battell. Furthermore, he had another cause also that made him afraid, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensius a famous Captaine, and very valiant also, who brought him aide out of THESSALIE; and the barbarous people lay in waite for him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into BOEOTIA. But in the meane time, Caphis that was our countrey man, deceiuing the barbarous barbarous people, guided Hortensius another way by mount Parnassus, and brought him vnder the city of TITHORA, which was not then so great a city as now at this present it is, but was a castle onely, situated vpon the point of a rocke, hewne all about: whither the PHOCIANS in old time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retired themselues for their safetie. Hortensius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his enemies, so long as day-light lasted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard stonie waies, vnto the city of PATRONIDE, where he ioyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. Thus being ioyned together, they camped vpon a hill that standeth about the middest of the plaine of Elatea: the soyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of trees and water at the foot of the same. The hill is called Philobœotus, the nature and situation whereof, Sylla doth maruellously commend. When they were camped, they seemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more they were indeede, for they had not aboue fifteene hundred horse, and lesse then fifteene thousand footmen. Whereupon the other Captaines their enemies, against Archelaus mind, brought out their bands into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horsemen, with carts, with shields and targets, so that the aire was euen cut asunder as it were with the violence of the noise and cries of so many sundry nations which all together did put themselues in battel ray. The sumptuousnesse of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether superfluous and vnprofitable, but serued greatly to feare the beholders. For the glistering of their harnesse, so richly trimmed and set foorth with gold and siluer, the colours of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the fashion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright glistering steele and shining copper, gaue such a shew as they went and remoued too and fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to look vpon. Insomuch as the ROMAINES durst not so much as once go out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perswasion could take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore (and because also he would not compell them to go foorth in this feare) he was driuen not to stir, but close to abide, (though it grieued him greatly) to see the barbarous people so proudly and villainously laugh him and his men to scorne. Howbeit the disdaine and scoffing of his enemies, stood him to great good purpose afterwards: for they making now no account of him, kept small watch and ward, strayed vp and downe disorderly besides, though otherwise they were not very obedient vnto their Captaines, being many commanders, and few good followers: by reason whereof, a small number kept in the campe, and all the rest of the great multitude enticed with the gaine they made by spoyling and sacking of townes thereabouts, dispersed themselues many daies iourny from their campe. For it is said, that at that very time they destroyed the city of PANOPÆIA, sacked the city of LEBADIA, and spoyled the temple without commandement or licence of any of all their Captaines to do it. In the meane while, Sylla seeing so many cities & townes spoiled and destroyed, took it both grieuously and also angrily: howbeit he suffered not his men to lie idle, but kept them in labour, to turne the course of the riuer of Cephisus, and to cast great trenches, not suffering any man to take ease or rest, but contrarily with great seuerity punished such as went faintly and lazily to worke, to the end that being wearied with the paine they tooke after so many works, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out indeed. For the third day after they had begun thus to labour, as Sylla passed by them, they cryed out vnto him, to leade them against their enemies. But this answer was vnto them againe: That those were but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then desirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be so indeed, and that you haue so good a will to fight as you make shew of: then I will, said he, that you arme your selues presently, and get you to yonder place; shewing them therewithall where the castle of the PARAPOTAMIANS stood in old time, which then (the city being destroyed) was no more but the top of a stonie mountaine cut all about, and seuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Assus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the same mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephisus, and both these riuers running in one, carying a swift streame, do make the knap of the said hill very strong of situatiō to lodge a camp vpon. And therefore Sylla seeing the souldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to take vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as indeed he did) he marched thither in all hast possible, and got it euen with the earnest goodwill of al his souldiers. Archelaus being so repulsed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHOERONEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHOERONEANS that were in Syllaes campe, besought him that he would not forſake their city, and leaue it to their enemie. Sylla deſiring to gratifie them therein, ſent Gabinius one of his Colonels with a legion, and therewithall gaue the CHOERONEANS leaue to go thither, who did what they could poſſible to get into the city before Gabinius: but that they could not, ſuch was the diligence and honeſtie of the man, as he ſeemed more deſirous of their ſafety, then they were themſelues. Neuertheleſſe, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was ſent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was the city of CHOERONEA preſerued from the danger it ſtood in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the ROMAINES, both of oracles and prophecies, which promiſed them victory from the temple of LEBADIA, and the caue of Trophonius: of which prophecies, thoſe countreymen make great mention. But Sylla in the tenth booke of his commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius, a man of quality and name amongſt them that trafficked into the countrey of GREECE, came vnto him after he had wonne the battell of CHOERONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gaue him to vnderſtand, that ſhortly after he ſhould haue a ſecond battel, and that he ſhould yet again haue another victory in the ſame place. After him another mã of war called Saluenius, told him alſo what ſucceſſe he ſhould haue in the wars of ITALY, ſaying, that he knew it by reuelation: & both theſe men agreed in the maner of the reuelation. For they ſaid, that they had ſeene a god, in maieſtie, beauty and greatnes, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympias. Sylla hauing paſſed the riuer of Aſſus, went to lodge at the foot of mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed & fortified his campe betweene the two mountaines of Acontium & of Edylium, ioyning to the city of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his own name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Muræna in his campe with a legion, and two cohorts, to keepe the enemies ſtill occupied that were in great trouble, & he himſelfe in ỹ meane time went & ſacrificed by the riuer of Cephiſus. His ſacrifice being ended, he marched towards the city of CHOERONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountain alſo called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knap of a mountaine very ſteepe and ſharpe of al ſides, with a narrow point like a pine apple, by reaſon wherof we do call it Orthopagum. At the foot of the ſame runneth the riuer called Morion, and there is alſo the temple of Apollo ſurnamed Thurias: & they ſay, that this ſurname of Thurias was giuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Chæron, the founder and builder of the city of CHOERONEA. Other think that the cow which was giuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath euer ſince kept ỹ name, for that the PHOENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neare vnto CHOERONEA, the Colonel Gabinius whom he had ſent thither with a garriſon to defend the ſame, went to meete him, with his men very well armed, wearing a laurell garland: and Sylla after he had ſaluted him & his ſouldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting, And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHOERONEA to him, one his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promiſed him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but giue them ſome ſmal number of ſouldiers. For there was a little path-way, which the barbarous people miſtruſted not beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muſes, by the which they might eaſily go to the top of this mountaine Thurium: ſo that following that path, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, & they might eaſily kill them with ſtones, or at the leaſt they ſhould driue them maugre their heads downe into the valley. Gabinius aſſuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and ſuch as he might boldly truſt vnto: Sylla gaue them men, and commanded them to execute their enterpriſe: and he himſelfe in the meane ſeaſon went and ſet his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horſemen on the wings, placed himſelfe in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Muræna. Galba and Hortenſius his Lieutenants, were placed in the taile with certaine bands of the rereguard, which thy kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies ſhould not encloſe them behind: becauſe they perceiued a farre off that the enemies put foorth a great number of horſemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to the end that the points of their battell might the more eaſily bow and enlarge themſelues, to compaſſe in the ROMAINES on the backe ſide. Now in the meane time, theſe two CHOERONEANS whom Sylla had ſent vnder Hircius their Captaine, hauing compaſſed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them, ſodainly came to ſhew themſelues vpon the top of the mountaine, which did ſo feare the barbarous people, that they beganne immediatly to flie, one of them for the moſt part killing another. There was no reſiſtance, but flying downe the

the mountaine, fell vpon the points of their owne partisans and pikes, and one of them thrusting in anothers necke, tumbled headlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behind where they lay open vnto them: so as there were slaine three thousand of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that sought to saue themselues by flight, Murena that was already set in battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slue them downeright. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footemen, put the most part of them quite out of order, and maruellously troubled their captaines before they could set them againe in order: which was one of the chiefest causes of their ouerthrow. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vpon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly won the ground that was betweene both armies, whereby he took away the force of al their armed carts with sythes, which are then of greatest force, when they haue the longest course, to giue them a swift and violent stroke in their chase: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker and of lesse strength, euen as arrowes are, that a far offenter not deepe into the thing they be shot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their first carts set foorth so faintly, and came on with so feeble a force, that the Romaines sent them backe, and easily repulsed them, with great slaughter, and clapping of hands one to another, as they commonly vse in the ordinarie games of horse-running at Rome. When they had thus repulsed the carts, the battel of Syllaes footmen began to charge the barbarous people, who basing their pikes stood close one to another, because they would not be broke: and the Romaines on the other side, bestowed first their darts among them, and then sodainly drew out their swords in the heate they were in, and put aside the enemies pikes, whereby they might come nearer to their bodies. There were fifteene thousand slaues in the front of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open proclamation, & had deuided them by bands, amongst the other footmen. By occasion whereof, there was a Romaine Centurion spake pleasantly at that time, saying, That he neuer saw slaues before haue liberty to speake & do like free men, but only at Saturnes feasts. Neuertheless, they against the nature of slaues, were very valiant to abide the shocke, and the Romaine footemen could not so readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them giue backe, because they stood very close one to another, and their rankes were of such a length besides: vntill such time as the Romaines that were behind the first rankes, did so pelt them with their slings, hurling stones, bestowing their darts and arrowes vpon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backes and flie amaine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his armie, supposing to enclose the Romaines behind, Hortensius straightwayes caused the bands he had with him to run and charge vpon the flankes: which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horsemen he had about him, turne their faces foorthwith, which were in number aboue two thousand: insomuch as Hortensius being set vpon with all his troupe, was compelled to retire by litle and litle towards the mountaine, perceiuing himselfe farre from the battell of his footmen, and enuironed round about with his enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speed returned againe towards the right wing of his enemies, from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to command them. Taxilles on the other side, caused his copper targets also to march against Murena: so as the noise they made on both sides, caused the mountaines to ring againe; wherewithall Sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resolued to returne to the place from whence he came, and sent Hortensius with foure ensignes to aide Murena: and himselfe with the fifth in great speede went towards the right wing of his armie, the which was now already bickering, and ioyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did easily distresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them, flying for life to the riuer, and vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithstanding forgat not Murena, but went againe to his relieefe: and finding that he on his side had also put the enemies to flight, followed him with the chase of them that fled. There was a maruellous slaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, & many of them supposing to haue recouered their campe, were slaine by the way: so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped onely ten thousand, who saued themſelues by flying vnto the city of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckening of no more but foureteene of his ſouldiers only that were ſlaine, whereof there came two againe to him the ſame night. Wherfore in the markes of triumph which he ſet vp for tokens of that victory, he cauſed to be written on the top thereof, Mars, Victorie, and Venus: ſignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in theſe warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall diſcipline. Theſe marks of triumph were ſet vp for the battel which he wan in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he ſet vp another alſo on the top of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were ſet vpon behind: and there is written in Greeke letters: That the valiant deedes of Omoloichus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victory. Sylla for the ioy of this great wonne battell, cauſed muſitians to play in the city of THEBES, where he builded a ſtage for all the muſitians neare vnto ỹ fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GRECIANS were appointed iudges of that muſicke, whom he cauſed to be ſent for out of other cities, becauſe he mortally hated the THEBANS: inſomuch as he tooke from them halfe their lands, which he conſecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue thereof, they ſhould redeliuer and pay back the mony which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was choſen Conſull at ROME, and had paſſed the ſea Ionium with an army, vnder pretext to make warre againſt king Mithridates, but indeede to make war with himſelfe: tooke his iourney towards THESSALY to meet him. But when he was in the city of MELITEA, there came newes to him out of all parts, that there was a new and ſecond armie of the kings arriued, no leſſe then the firſt, the which ſpoyled and deſtroyed all the countrey which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenants, was arriued in the city of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of ſhippes, hauing brought thither with him foureſcore thouſand fighting men, the beſt trained, the beſt armed and appointed ſouldiers that were in all his kingdome of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that country at commandement, and ſought to fight with Sylla, notwithſtanding that Archelaus alledged many reaſons to diſſwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that ſo many thouſands of ſouldiers could not haue bene caſt away in the firſt battel, without ſome notable treaſon. Wherupon Sylla returned with all poſſible ſpeed, and made Dorylaus know before many daies paſſed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wiſe man, and knew well enough the worthineſſe & valiant courage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus hauing had but a little proofe only in certaine light skirmiſhes which he made againſt Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALY: himſelfe was the firſt that could ſay then, it was not for them to hazard battel, but rather to draw out the wars in length, and ſupplant the ROMAINES with charge and expence. And yet notwithſtãding, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth al about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to giue battel in, ſpecially becauſe he was the ſtronger of horſemẽ in the field. For al the plaines that are within the country of BOEOTIA, the greateſt and largeſt of them, is the plaine neare to the city of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the mariſhes where the riuer of Melas diſperſeth it ſelfe abroad. The head of the ſame riuer is not far from the city of ORCHOMENE, and that riuer only of all other riuers of GREECE, from the very head whence it cometh, is nauigable: & hath beſides another ſingular property, that it riſeth & ſwelleth euen in the longeſt ſommer daies, as the riuer of Nilus doth, & bringeth forth the ſelfe ſame plants & trees, ſauing that they beare no fruit, neither are they ſo great as thoſe of ÆGYPT. This riuer hath no long courſe, becauſe that the moſt part of the water runneth into lakes and mariſhes, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litle part of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, in the place that the reedes grow where they make good flutes withall. When they were camped one neare to another, Archelaus lay quietly and ſtirred not: but Sylla preſently caſt great trenches frõ one ſide to another, to ſtop the way againſt their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine, where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, & haue driuen the ROMAINS into the mariſhes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, ſo ſoone as their captains had giuen them liberty, diſcharged with ſuch a fury, that they did not only ſcatter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the moſt part of their guard alſo that ſtood in battel ray to defend them, in a maruellous feare, who alſo began to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted ſtraight from his horſe, and taking an enſigne in his hand, ran ranne through the middeſt of his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, ſaid vnto them: O my Romaine ſouldiers, mine honour commandeth me to die here, and therfore when any man asketh you where you forſooke your captaine, remember that you anſwer, It was at Orchomene. They were ſo aſhamed at theſe words, that he made them turne: beſides that, there came two cohorts vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue ſuch a hot charge vpon their enemies, that they fled foorthwith vpon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine: and thereupon by and by ſet them againe to the trenches to encloſe his enemies campe, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues ſonne ſlaine, fighting valiantly before them all, in the right wing of their battell. And the bow-men being preſſed ſo neare by the Romaines, that their bowes would do no good, took their arrowes in their hands in ſtead of ſwords, and ſtrake their enemies with them, to force them to giue back, vntill ſuch time as at the laſt they were all driuen into their campe, where they paſſed that night in great ſorrow, as well for the loſſe of them that were ſlaine, as alſo for the number of thoſe that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towards the camp of his enemies, went on ſtill continuing his trenches: and certaine of them being come out to skirmiſh with them, he ſet vpon them ſo luſtily, that at the firſt charge he put them to flight. That brought ſuch a feare to all the whole campe of the enemies, that not a man durſt abide any longer: ſo as Sylla valiantly following on his victory, ſhuffled in among them as they fled, and in the end took all together. Straightway all the mariſhes were filled with bloud, and the lake full of dead bodies: ſo that vntill this preſent day they find there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people, morians, peeces of taſſes, and ſwords drowned in the mud of the mariſhes, notwithſtanding that it is wel-neare two hundred yeares ago ſince this battell was ſtricken. And thus much for the wars about the cities of Choeronea and Orchomene. Now the wars being paſt in this ſort in Greece, Cinna and Carbo dealt very cruelly and vnnaturally at Rome with the Noblemen and greateſt perſons: by reaſon whereof, many flying their tyranny, went to Syllaes campe, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulneſſe of felicitie, ſo that in ſhort time Sylla had an aſſembly of a Romaine Senate about him. Metella her ſelfe, his wife, hauing ſtolen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houſes in the city and country both, were all burnt and deſtroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go & helpe them that yet remained at Rome. Sylla vpon hearing of theſe newes, fell in great perplexity. For on the one ſide, it grieued him to ſee his countrey ſo miſerably afflicted: and on the other ſide, he knew not well how he might go, leauing ſo great an enterpriſe as that war was, and ſpecially againſt a king of ſuch might and power as Mithridates ſhewed himſelfe to be. And being in theſe dumps, there came one Archelaus a merchant to him, borne in the city of Deliym, who brought him a ſecret meſſage from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleaſed Sylla ſo well, that he deſired that Archelaus and himſelfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the ſea ſide, neare vnto the city of Deliym, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto Sylla, that he would wiſh him to leaue the cõqueſt of Aſia, & of the realme of Pont, and to returne into his country to the ciuill warres at Rome: and in ſo doing, the king would furniſh him, not only with as much money, but with as many ſhips and men, as he himſelfe would deſire. Sylla vpon this motion told him againe, that he would wiſh him to forſake Mithridates ſeruice, and to make himſelfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and confederate of the Romaines, ſo that he would deliuer him all the nauie which then he had in his hands. Archelaus ſeemed much to abhorre to heare him ſpeake of treaſon. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him: Why Archelaus, ſaid he, thou that art a Cappadocian, and ſeruant to a barbarous King, or his friend at the leaſt: haſt thou ſo good a heart with thee, that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act? And art thou indeed ſo bold to ſpeake to me of treaſon, which am the Romaines Lieutenant generall, and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the battell of Choeronea diddeſt ſaue thy ſelfe by flying, with a ſmall number left thee of ſixe ſcore thouſand fighting men, which thou before haddſt in thy campe: and that hid thy ſelfe two daies together in the mariſhes of Orchomene, leauing the fields of Boeotia with ſuch heapes of dead bodies, that no man could paſſe for them? After this reply, Archelaus altered his ſpeech, and falling downe at Syllaes feete, humbly beſought him to end this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla anſwered, that he was very well contented

Sylla ouercame Archelaus in two famous battels, at Chæronea and at Orchomene.

Talke betwixt Sylla and Archelaus at their meeting.

Peace concluded betwixt Sylla and Archelaus in Mithridates behalfe vpon conditiõs

withall. And thereupon peace was concluded betweene them vnder conditions: that Mithridates ſhould depart from ASIA the leſſe, and from PAPHLAGONIA, that he ſhould reſtore BITHYNIA vnto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA vnto Ariobarzanes, that he ſhould pay 2000 talents to the ROMAINES, and giue them threeſcore and ten gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon this, Sylla would alſo aſſure him the reſt of his Realme: and would cauſe him to be proclaimed a friend of the ROMAINES. Theſe articles being paſt by agreement betwixt them, Sylla taking his iourney through THESSALY & MACEDON, into the country of HELLESPONT, carried Archelaus with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerouſly ſicke of a diſeaſe in the city of LARISSA, he ſtayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefeſt Captaines and companions. And this was the cauſe that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHOERONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly wonne it, but by treaſon. And againe, Archelaus was the more ſuſpected, becauſe Sylla redeliuered Mithridates all his ſeruants and friends which he had priſoners, ſauing the tyrant Ariſtion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyſoned, becauſe he was Archelaus enemy: but ſpecially for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him ten thouſand Iugera, (or acres of land) within the Ile of EVBOEA, and gaue him moreouer the title of a friend of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denyeth all theſe things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambaſſadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their maſter did ratifie and accept all the articles of peace, ſauing that he only prayed him he would not take the country of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the gallies, he would not ſo much as once ſay he would promiſe them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly anſwered thẽ againe: Then Mithridates (as ye ſay) meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA ſtill, and refuſeth to giue the ſhips I demanded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put ſo many ROMAINE citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another tale, if I come once into ASIA: but now at PERGAMVS, he ſpeaketh his pleaſure of this war which he hath not ſeene. The Ambaſſadours being afraid of his words, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus ſpake, and beſought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreatie, in the end he obtained of Sylla to ſend him vnto Mithridates: promiſing that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himſelfe with his owne hands. Vpon this promiſe Sylla ſent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the countrey of MEDICA: and after he had deſtroyed the moſt part thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, found him neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all ſhould be well: howbeit that his maſter Mithridates prayed him he might ſpeake with him in any caſe. Now the matter that made Mithridates ſo earneſt to ſpeake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who hauing ſlaine Flaccus the Conſull, being of the contrary faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants alſo, went himſelfe againſt him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, choſe rather to make himſelfe Syllaes friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the countrey of TROADE, in the city of DARDANE, Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred ſale of ſhippes with oares at ſea, with twenty thouſand footemen, ſixe thouſand horſe, and a number of armed carts with ſithes beſides by land, Sylla hauing onely but foure enſignes of footmen, and two hundred horſemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him firſt, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no anſwer. Sylla following on his tale, ſaid vnto him: It is for ſuters to ſpeake firſt, that haue requeſt to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will ſay. Then began Mithridates to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the occaſion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinance of the gods that ſo had appointed it, and partly alſo vpon the ROMAINES themſelues. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, ſeeing that he lacked no comely words to cloke his foule and ſhamefull deedes: but withall he ſharpely reproued him, and draue him to confeſſe the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made anſwer, that he did. Then Sylla ſaluted, embraced, and kiſſed him: and calling for the kings Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe.

In concluſion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla threeſcore and ten gallies, and fiue hundred bow-men, he returned by ſea into his realme of PONTVS. But Sylla hearing that his ſouldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, becauſe they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their moſt cruell and mortall enemie, (hauing in one ſelfe day cauſed a hundred and fiftie thouſand ROMAINE citizens to be ſlaine, that were diſperſed abroad in diuers places of ASIA) ſo to depart, and go his way ſafe, with the riches and ſpoyles of the countrey, which he had bereft them of, and vſed at his pleaſure, the ſpace of forty yeares together: anſwered them in excuſe of himſelfe, that he was not able to make warres with Mithridates, and Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together againſt him. And ſo Sylla departing thence went againſt Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the city of THYATIRA, and lodged himſelfe as neare vnto him as he conueniently might. Now whileſt he was compaſſing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes ſouldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any armour or weapon, to ſalute Syllaes ſouldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their trench: which Fimbria ſeeing, and perceiuing his ſouldiers mindes ſo changed, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whoſe hands he looked for no mercie, killed himſelfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole countrey of ASIA the leſſe, to pay the ſumme of twenty thouſand talents amongſt them, and preſently alſo he vndid many poore houſholders through his inſolent ſouldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garriſon there. For he ordained, that euery houſholder ſhould giue the ſouldier that lodged in his houſe, foure Tetradrachmaes a day, and ſhould be bound to giue him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their ſupper alſo: and that euery Captaine ſhould haue fiftie Drachmaes a day, a night gowne for the houſe, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had giuen this order, he departed from the city of EPHESVS with all his fleete, and in three daies ſayling arriued in the hauen of Piræa at ATHENS, where he was receiued into the fraternity of the Myſteries, and reſerued for himſelfe the Librarie of Appellicon Teian: in the which were the moſt part of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus workes, not then thought meete to come in euerie mans hands. And they ſay, that this Librarie being brought to ROME, Tirannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN hauing recouered the originals into his hands, publiſhed them, and wrote the ſummaries which we haue at this preſent. For the ancient Peripateticke Philoſophers were of themſelues very wiſe and learned men, but they had not all Ariſtotles works, nor Theophraſtus amongſt them, and yet thoſe few they had, were not by them ſeene all whole and perfect together: becauſe that the goods of Neleus SCEPSIAN (to whom Theophraſtus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and eſtimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS, had ſuch a paine and numneſſe in his legges, and was ſo heauie withall, that Strabo calleth it a ſpice of the gout, that is to ſay, a feeling or entring therinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occaſion he tooke the ſeas, and went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hot baths: and there remained a while ſolacing himſelf all the day long with muſick, ſeeing of playes, and entertaining ſuch kind of people. Vpon a day as he was walking by the ſea ſide, certain fiſher mē made him a preſent of fiſh, which pleaſed him maruellous well: and demanding of them whence they were: they anſwered him againe, that they were of the city of ALES. What? of ALES ſaid he: is there any of them yet left aliue? ſpeaking it, becauſe that after the battell of ORCHOMENE, when he followed the chace of his enemies, he had taken and deſtroyed three cities of BOEOTIA all at one ſelfe time, to wit, ANTHEDON, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poore fiſher men were ſo amazed with theſe words, that they ſtood ſtill, and could not tell what to ſay. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their wayes a Gods name, and be not afraid, for they brought no ſmall interceſſours with them, which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had giuen them theſe words, the ALEIANS went home with a mery heart, to gather themſelues together againe in their city. Sylla ſo paſſing through THESSALY & MACEDON, came to the ſea ſide, intending to go from the city of DYRRACHIVM vnto BRVNDVSIVM with 120 ſayle. The city of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIVM, & thereabouts is a park conſecrated vnto the Nymphs, where in a faire goodly greene medow in many places there commeth out great bubbles of fire that flame continually: and it is ſaid, that there was a Satyre taken ſleeping, euen in the very ſelfe ſame forme the painters and image-grauers haue ſet him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all ſorts of interpreters what he was, he made no answer that a man could vnderstand, but onely put foorth a sharpe voice like the neying of a horse, or whinnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be carried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to passe the sea, he was afraid that so soone as they had landed in ITALY, they would shrinke from him, and euery man go home to his own city. But they sware and promised first of themselues, that they would tarie & keepe together, and by their wils would do no hurt in ITALY. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in need of mony, they offered him of theirs, and euery man to lend him as his ability serued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant souldiers, he went against fifteene Generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fiftie ensignes of footmen well armed, as he himselfe writeth in his commentaries. But the gods promised him good fortune in his wars, by many sundry apparent signes. For in a sacrifice he made by TARENTVM, after he was come on land, the liuer of a certaine beast sacrifised, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a crowne or garland of lawrell, out of the which did hang two bands or rolles. And a litle before he went into CAMPANIA, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuertheless was no matter of truth, but a vision only that appeared, and rising from the earth disperſed it selfe by little and little here and there in the aire, and in the end vanished quite away as clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowne by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded only vpon the courage and life of his soulders, whose good will to serue against them was such, as following this victory, he compelled the Consull Norbanus after he had slaine sixe thousand of his men, to take the city of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exploit (as himselfe reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he saith furthermore, that in the city of SYLVIVM, there was a slaue of one Pontius a citizen, who being inspired with a propheticall spirit, came to tel him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, and cary away the victory of these wars: howbeit that if he did not hie him the sooner, the Capitoll at ROME should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the sixteenth day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neare vnto the city of FIDENTIA with sixteene ensignes onely, against fiftie ensignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, because the most part of them were naked and vnarmed, was afraid to hazard the battell: and as he was euen bethinking himselfe what was best to determine thereof, there rose a litle wind out of a goodly meadow, that blew a wonderfull sort of flowers vpon the souldiers on euery part of them. These flowers staied of themselues as they fell, some vpon their targets, and others vpon their morians, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their enemies a far off, as if they had bene garlands of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus souldiers more lusty a great deale then they were before, & with this good will they determined to giue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, slue eighteene thousand of them in the field, & took their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates & Tigranes. Neuertheless, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vse policie with force: and therefore practised with Scipio one of the Consuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: and thereupon were oft meetings and assemblies of both sides. Now Sylla draue off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasiõ of delay, to the end that his soldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft & subtilty as well as himselfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes souldiers by repaire into his campe: for they coming into Scipioes campe, being very conuersant with them, straight corrupted some of them with readie mony, other with promises, and other with faire flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practise had continued a while, Sylla coming neare vnto Scipioes campe with 20 ensignes onely: all his men saluted Scipioes soldiers, & they resaluting them again, yeelded themselues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was left post alone in his tẽt, where he was takẽ, but they afterwards let him go. So Sylla with his 20 ensignes, like to the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birds into into their nets, hauing gotten forty enſignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo ſaid of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe, and a lion both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and miſchiefe then the lion. After this, Marius the younger hauing foureſcore and fiue enſignes in his campe neare vnto the city of SIONIVM, preſented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good deſire to fight, and ſpecially on that day, becauſe the night before he had ſeene this viſion in his dreame, that he thought he ſaw Marius the father (who was deceaſſed long before) warning his ſonne that he ſhould come to him. Sylla for this reſpect deſired maruellouſly to fight that day: and thereupon cauſed Dolabella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies ſtept betweene him and home, and ſtopped his paſſage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes ſouldiers to the contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with ſo great labour and paine, that they were al weary and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great ſhower of raine vpon them as they were buſie opening the way, that troubled them more then the labour they had in hand. Wherupon the priuat captaines of the bands went to make Sylla vnderſtand it, and to pray him to deferre the battel vntil another day: ſhewing him how the ſouldiers wearied with labor, lay down vpon their targets on the ground to take their eaſe. Sylla perceiuing this, was cõtented withall, though greatly indeed againſt his will. But when he had giuen the ſignall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their campe, Marius the younger cometh on horſebacke marching brauely before all his company, hoping to haue ſurpriſed his enemies in diſorder, and by that meanes to haue ouerthrowne them eaſily. But far ôtherwiſe did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his foreſaid dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, ſtucke their darts vpon the banke, ran vpon their enemies with their ſwords drawne, and with a maruellous crie ſet vpon them ſo valiantly, that they were not able to reſiſt their furie, but ſodainly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable ſlaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the city of PRÆNESTE, where he found the gates ſhut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and ſo was triced vp by it. Yet ſome writers ſay, and Feneſtella among other, that Marius neuer ſaw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and very ſleepie, he lay vnder ſome tree in the ſhadow to reſt a little, after he had giuen the ſignall and word of the battell, and ſlept ſo ſoundly, that he could ſcant awake with the noiſe and flying of his men. Sylla himſelfe writeth, that he loſt at this battell but three and twenty men, ſlue twentie thouſand of his enemies, and tooke eight thouſand priſoners. His Lieutenants alſo had the like good ſucceſſe in other places, Pompeius, Craſſus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any loſſe of their men, or but with a very ſmall, ouerthrew many great mighty armies of their enemies. Inſomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrary faction, and he that moſt maintained it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyond the ſeas into AFRICKE. The laſt battell that Sylla had, was againſt Theleſinus SAMNITE, who comming like a freſh champion to ſet vpon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battels, had almoſt ſlaine him euen at ROME gates. For Theleſinus hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers, with one Lamponius LVCANIAN, marched with all ſpeede towards the city of PRÆNESTE, to deliuer Marius the younger that was beſieged there. But vnderſtanding that Sylla on the one ſide came in great haſte alſo to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other ſide, and perceiuing moreouer that the way was ſo ſhut vp, that he could goe neither forward nor backward, being a valiant ſouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fields, moſt dangerouſly ventured to go ſtraight to ROME. And ſo ſtole away by night with all his whole power, and marching to ROME ward, had almoſt taken it at his firſt comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he ſtayed happily tenne furlongs from the gate Collina, bragging with himſelfe, and beleeuing that he ſhould do wonders, for that he had mocked ſo many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came diuers young Noblemen and Gentlemen out of the city to skirmiſh with Theleſinus: who ſlue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young Gentleman of a noble houſe, and very honeſt. Whereupon (as you may eaſily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and ſpecially the women, who fell a ſhreeking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had ſent) came firſt with ſeuen hundred horſe vpon the ſpurre, and ſtaying but a little to coole and giue them breath, bridled ſtraight again, & went to ſet vpon

the enemies, thereby to ſtay them. Soone after him came Sylla alſo, who commanded his men that came firſt, quickly to eate ſomewhat, and that done, put them ſtraight in battell ray: notwithſtanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perſwaded him to the contrarie, and beſought him not to put his ſouldiers wearied with their iourney, to ſo great and manifeſt a danger: and the rather, becauſe they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNITES and LVCANS, who were both warlike nations and good ſouldiers, & thoſe beſides that moſt deadly hated the ROMAINES. But for all that, Sylla ſent them backe, and commanded his trumpets to ſound the alarme, being almoſt within foure houres of night: and this battell was ſharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Craſſus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very ſore diſtreſſed, and ſtood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courſer that was both ſwift & very ſtrong. The enemies knew him, & there were two that hifted vp their armes to throw their darts at him, whom he ſaw not: but his page gaue his horſe ſuch a laſh with his whippe, that he made him ſo to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horſe tayle & ſtucke faſt in the ground. Some ſay, that Sylla had a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of DELPHES, and in time of warres wore it alwaies in his boſome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kiſſing it, ſaid: O Apollo Pythias, haſt thou ſo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, ſo fortunate hitherto through ſo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with ſhame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his own naturall city among his countreymen? And ſo crying out to Apollo for helpe, thruſt into the preaſe among his men, intreating ſome, threatning others, and laying vpon the reſt to ſtay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his armie was broken and ouerthrowne by his enemies: and himſelfe amongſt them that fled, was compelled to recouer his camp with ſpeed, hauing loſt many of his friends and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens ſlaine and troden vnder feete (both with horſe and men) that came onely to ſee the battell fought: ſo that they within the city thought themſelues verily vndone. Lucretius Offella furthermore (he that beſieged Marius in the city of PRÆNESTE) had almoſt raiſed his ſiege, vpon the words of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wiſhed him to remoue with all ſpeed poſſible, for Sylla was ſlaine, and Theleſinus had taken ROME. Now about midnight came certaine ſouldiers from Craſſus to Syllaes campe, and asked for meate for Craſſus ſupper, and his mens, who hauing chaſed his flying enemies whom he had ouerthrowne vnto the city of ANTEMNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderſtanding that, and being aduertiſed that the moſt part of his enemies were ouerthrowne at this battell, went himſelfe the next morning betimes vnto ANTEMNA, where three thouſand of his enemies ſent to know if he would receiue them to mercy if they yeelded themſelues vnto him. His anſwer was, that he would pardon their liues, ſo as they would do ſome miſchief to their fellowes before they came to him. Theſe three thouſand hereupon truſting to his promiſe, fell vpon their companions: and for the moſt part one of them killed another. Notwithſtanding Sylla hauing gathered all thoſe together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thouſand, as the reſt, amounting in all to the number of ſix thouſand, within the ſhew-place where they vſed to run their horſes: whileſt he himſelfe held a councell in the temple of the goddeſſe Bellona, and was making his oration there, he had appointed certaine to ſet vpon thoſe 6000, and put them to the ſword euery man. Great & terrible were the cries of ſuch a number of men ſlaine in ſo ſmall a roome, as may eaſily be coniectured: inſomuch as the Senators ſitting in councell heard them very eaſily, and maruelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begun with a ſet ſteadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken what he ſaid, and not to trouble themſelues with any thing done abroad, for they were but certaine offenders and leud perſons that were puniſhed by his commandement. This was enough to ſhew the ſimpleſt ROMAINE in ROME, that they had but onely changed the tyrant, and not the tyrannie. Now for Martus, that had euer bene of a churliſh and ſeuere nature, euen from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall ſtubburnnes. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modeſt and ciuill in al his proſperity, & gaue great good hope, that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yet loue notwithſtanding the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth giuen to all pleaſure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, & weepe for tender hartin that he became after ſo cruell and bloudy, the great alteration gaue manifeſt cauſe to condemne the increaſe of honour honor and authority, as the only meanes wherby mens manners continue not such as they were at the first, but still do change and varie, making some fooles, others vaine and phantastical, and others extreame cruell and vnnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by changing his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shew it selfe, when the way of liberty was layed open: this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fell to shedding of bloud, and filled all Rome with infinite and vnspeakeable murthers: for diuers were killed for priuate quarels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffered his friends and those about him to worke their wicked wills: vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was so bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should know that all the miseries were finished the which they dayly saw. For, said he, we will not intreate you to pardon life, where you haue determined death: but only to put them out of doubt whom you haue determined to saue. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolued whom he would saue. Metellus replyed, Then tell vs (quoth he) who they are that shall die. Sylla answered, he would. Howbeit some say, it was not Metellus, but Ausidius one of his flatterers, that spake this last word vnto him. Wherfore Sylla immediatly, without making any of the magistrates priuie, caused fourescore mens names to be set vp vpon posts, whom he would put to death. Euery man being offended withall, the next day following he set vp 220 mens names more: and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly, that he had appointed all them to die, that he could cal to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should die, by daies, as he did call them to mind. Whosoeuer saued an outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindnesse, he himselfe was condemned to die: not excepting them that had receiued their brothers, their sonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the reward of euery homicide & murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a slaue that had killed his master, or the sonne that had slaine the father. But the most wicked and vniust act of all was, that he depriued the sonnes, and sonnes sons of them whom he had killed, of all credit and good name; and besides that, had taken all their goods as confiscate. And this was not onely done in Rome, but also in all the cities of Italie throughout: and there was no temple of any god whatsoeuer, no altar in any bodies house, no libertie of hospitall, nor fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were slaine in their wiues armes, and the children on their mothers laps: and yet they which were slaine for priuate hatred and malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them, might well say, His goodly great house made that man die, his goodly faire garden the other, and his hote bathes another. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thing, and least looked that these euils should light vpon him, and that onely pitied those which he saw so miserably murthered, went one day into the market place, and reading the bill set vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cryed out aloud: Alas the day that euer I was borne, my house of Alba maketh me be put to death. He went not far from the market place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time Marius the yonger seeing he could by no meanes escape if he were taken, slue himselfe. And Sylla coming to Præneste, did first execute them by one & by one, keeping a certaine forme of iustice in putting them to death; but afterwards, as if he had no longer leysure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelue thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword euery man, sauing his host onely; vnto whom he said, that he shewed him speciall fauour to saue his life. But his host answered him stoutly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his countreymen: and so thrusting in amongst the citizens, was willingly slaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, who had slaine his owne brother before the ciuill war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereupon to shew his thankfulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently and slue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction, and brought him his head for a present before all the people, in the midst of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed font of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murthers committed, yet were there other things also that

Sylla Dictator. grieued the people maruellously. For he proclaimed himself Dictator, which office had not bin of sixscore yeares before in vse, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, giuing him free libertie afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy cities, and to build vp new as he listed: to take away kingdomes, and to giue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly sold the goods confiscate, by the cryer, sitting so proudly & stately in his chaire of state, that it grieued the people more to see those goods packt vp by them to whom he gaue and disposed them, then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For sometimes he would giue a whole country, or the whole reuenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleasant iesters, minstrels, or wicked slaues made free: and vnto some he would giue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be married against their wils. For he desiring (howsoeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking Æmylia (the daughter of Æmilius Scaurus, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to mary her great with child as she was by Glabrio: but she died in childbed in Pompeys house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse at the city of PRÆNESTE, suing to be Consull, Sylla commanded him to ceasse his suite: but he notwithstanding that expresse commandement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cause: whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slue Offella before al the people, himself sitting in a chaire of estate in the temple of Castor & Pollux, & seeing frō aboue the murther done. The people that were about Offella, laid hold of the murtherer straight, and brought him before Sylla: but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him go, because he commanded them to do it. Furthermore, as touching his triumph, it was a sumptuous sight to behold, for the rareneſſe of the riches, and princely spoyles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished ROMAINES, who were the chiefest noblemē of al the city of ROME, following his chariot triumphant wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father and sauiour: because that by his meanes they returned to their country, and recouered their goods, wiues & children. In the end of his triumph, he made an oration, in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare vnto thē (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to say, happie or fortunate. And he himselfe when he wrote vnto the GRECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them, surnamed himselfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloued and fauoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our countrey, haue this superscription: Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a son and a daughter: he named his son Faustus, signifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausta: because the ROMAINES call Faustum that which falleth out prosperously & happily. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed & put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innouation in the commonwealth, yet of himself he left off his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man among the citizens, offering himselfe to euery man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rash enemy of his was chosen Consull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenance & fauour vnto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come merry homewards from the election, & ioyfull that he had obtained his friends sute from all other suters: took him aside, and told him: Indeed thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all ROME, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hadst not neede to sleepe: for thou hast strengthened an enemie, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla consecrating the dismes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding sumptuous feastes vnto the ROMAINES, the prouision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that euery day they threw a great deale of meate into the riuer, and they dranke wine of forty yeares old and aboue.

During

During theſe feaſts which continued many daies, his wife Metella ſickened, and died, and in her ſickneſſe the Prieſts and Soothſayers willed Sylla he ſhould not come neare her, nor ſuffer his houſe to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was diuorced from her in her ſickneſſe, and cauſed her to be carried into another houſe, whileſt ſhe liued. And thus did Sylla curiouſly obſerue the ſuperſtition and ordinance of the Soothſayers: but yet he brake the law which he made himſelfe, touching the order of funerals, ſparing no coſt at Metellaes buriall. So did he alſo breake another order himſelfe had made, touching the reformation of bankets: comforting his ſorrow with ordinarie feaſts, full of all vanitie and laſciuiouſneſſe. Within a few moneths after, he had fencers games at the ſharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnſeuered, men and women ſitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Ladie, and of a noble houſe, that ſate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: ſhe was the daughter of Meſſala, and ſiſter of Hortenſius the Orator, that had bene diuorced not long before from her husband. This Ladie paſſing by Sylla behind him, did ſoftly put her hand on his ſhoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and ſo went on to her place, and ſate her downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiarity, looking earneſtly vpon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth ſhe) but that I deſire with others to be partaker a little of your happineſſe. Her words miſliked not Sylla, but contrarily he ſhewed that ſhe had tickled him with them: for he ſent ſtraight to aske her name, and enquired of what houſe ſhe was, and how ſhe had liued. But after many ſlie lookes betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vpon euery occaſion, with prettie ſmiling countenances: ſo that in the end, they came to promiſe and contract mariage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though ſhe was as wiſe, as honeſt, and as vertuous a Ladie as could be poſſible, yet the occaſion that made Sylla marrie her, was neither good nor commendable, becauſe he was taken ſtraight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a yong boy: which commonly ſhew forth the filthieſt paſſions of the minde, to be ſo carried, and with ſuch motions. Now, notwithſtanding he had this faire young Ladie in his houſe, he left not the company of women minſtrels and tumblers, and to haue pleaſant ieſters and muſitions about him, with whom he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, vpon little couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greateſt eſtimation with him at that time, were theſe three: Roſcius a maker of common playes, Sorax a prince of ſcoffers, and one Metrobius a ſinging man, whom he was in loue withall while he liued, and yet did not diſſemble his loue, though he was paſt age to be beloued. This wicked life of his was cauſe of increaſing his diſeaſe, the originall cauſe whereof had light foundation at the firſt. For he liued a great time before he perceiued that he had an impoſtume in his body, the which by proceſſe of time came to corrupt his fleſh in ſuch ſort, that it turned all to lice: ſo that notwithſtanding he had many men about him, to ſhift him continually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in reſpect of them that multiplied ſtill vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, waſhing, nor meate it ſelfe, but was preſently filled with ſwarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to waſh and cleanſe himſelfe of them, but all would not ſerue: for the changing of his fleſh into this putriture wan it ſtraight againe, that there was no cleanſing, nor ſhifting of him, that could keepe ſuch a number of lice from him. Some ſay, that in old time (amongſt the moſt ancient men, whereof there is any memorie) Acaſtus the ſonne of Pelius, died of the lowſie euill: and long time after alſo, the Poet Alcman, and Pherecides the diuine: and ſo did Calliſthenes OLYNTHIAN in priſon, and Mutius a wiſe lawyer. And if we ſhall make mention of thoſe that are famous, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bond man called Eunus, he that was the firſt procurer of the warres of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and carried to ROME, died alſo of the ſame diſeaſe. Furthermore, Sylla did not onely foreſee his death, but he wrote ſomething of it alſo: for he made an end of writing the two and twentieth booke of his commentaries, two daies before he died. In that booke he ſaith, that the wiſe men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had liued honourably, he ſhould end his daies in the flower of all his proſperity. And there he ſaith alſo, that his ſonne (who departed a little before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his ſleepe, apparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thence foorth to liue in peace and reſt with her. But for all his diſeaſe, he would not giue ouer to deale in matters of ſtate. For ten daies before his death, he pacified a ſedition and tumult riſen among the inhabitants of the citie of PVTEOLANVM (in Italian called POZZOLO) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, whereby they ſhould gouerne themſelues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the commonwealth, deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he ſent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there cauſed his men to compaſſe him about, and commanded them to ſtrangle him in his ſight. The paſſion of his anger was ſo vehement againſt him, that by the extreme ſtraining of himſelfe, he brake the impoſtume in his bodie, ſo as there guſhed out a wonderfull deale of blood: by reaſon whereof his ſtrength failing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and ſo died, leauing the two little children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Poſthumia, becauſe the ROMAINES call thoſe children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Poſthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Conſull Lepidus, to let that his body ſhould not be honourably buried, as they were accuſtomed to burie noblemen and men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, becauſe he had giuen him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made ſome for loue, ſome by intreatie, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corpes into ROME, gaue both ſafetie and honour vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is ſayd alſo, that the ROMAINE Ladies, amongſt other things, beſtowed ſuch a quantity of perfume and odoriferous matter towards the ſame: that beſides thoſe which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a great image to the likeneſſe of Sylla himſelfe, and another of a ſergeant carrying the axes before him, all of excellent incenſe and cinamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing leſt it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being ſo cloudie, they deferred to carrie forth the body to be burnt, vntill paſt three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then roſe there ſuch a ſudden boiſterous wind, that it ſet all the ſtake of wood ſtraight on fire, that the body was burnt at a trice; and the fire going out, fell a great ſhower of raine that held on till night: ſo that it ſeemed, good fortune following him euen to his end, did alſo helpe his obſequies after his death. His tombe is to be ſeene in the field of Mars: and they ſay that he himſelfe made his owne Epitaph that is written vpon it, which was: That no man did euer paſſe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing miſchiefe to his enemies.

NOW that we haue at large alſo ſet forth the life of the Romaine, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike, that both of them grew to be great men, riſing of themſelues through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lyſander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vnto in the common-wealth, were layd vpon him through the peoples goodwils and conſents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither vſurped he any extraordinarie authority vpon them, contrarie to law: for as the common ſaying is:

Where partialitie, and diſcord once do raigne:
There wicked men are moſt eſteem'd, and rule with greateſt gaine.

As at that time in Rome, the people being corrupted, and the ſtate of gouernement vtterly ſubuerted and brought to nought: to day there roſe vp one tyrant, to morrow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vſurped and ruled all, when ſuch fellowes as Glaucias & Saturnius, did both baniſh and driue out of Rome ſuch men as Metellus was: and where alſo in open aſſembly they ſlue the Conſuls ſons in the market place, and where force of armes was bought and ſold for gold and ſiluer, with the which the ſouldiers were corrupted: and where they made new lawes with fire and ſword, and forced men to obey the ſame. Yet I ſpeake not this in reproach of him that in ſuch troubleſome times found meanes to make himſelfe the greateſt man: but to ſhew that I meaſure not his honeſty by the dignity he grew vnto in ſo vnfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from Sparta (at what time it flouriſhed moſt, and was the beſt gouerned commonweale) he in all great cauſes, and in moſt honourable offices, was reputed for the beſt of all beſts, and the chiefe of all chiefes: whereof it came to paſſe, that the one did often reſigne vp his authoritie to his citizens, which they had giuen him, who alſo reſtored it to him againe many and ſundrie times; for the honour of his vertue did alwaies remaine, and made him iuſtly accounted for the worthieſt man: where the other being onely once choſen Generall of an armie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hoſtility, making himſelfe by force, ſometime Conſull, ſometime vice Conſull, and ſometime Dictator, but alwaies continued a tyrant. Indeed Lyſander attempted to change and alter the ſtate of gouernement in his countrey, howbeit it was with great lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he ſought it by reaſon, and good perſwaſion, not by the ſword: neither would he make a change of the whole at one ſelf time as Sylla did, but ſought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtleſſe ſeemed very iuſt: that he which was the beſt amongſt good men, ſhould be choſen king of that city, which was the chiefe ouer all Greece, not for her nobility, but for her vertue onely.

The chiefe perſon is not alwaies the honeſteſt.

For like as a good hunter doth not ſeek for the whelp of a good dog, but for the good dog himſelfe: nor a wiſe man of armes alſo, the colt that commeth of a good horſe, but the good horſe himſelfe. Euen ſo, he that taketh vpon him to ſtabliſh a ciuill gouernement, committeth a foule fault, if he looke of whom his Prince ſhould be borne, and not what the Prince himſelfe ſhould be, conſidering that the LACEDÆMONIANS themſelues haue depriued diuerſe of their kings from their crowne and realme, becauſe they were not princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is alwaies ill of it ſelfe: but vertue is honoured for her ſelfe alone, and not becauſe ſhe is placed with nobility. Now for the wrongs and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleaſure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lyſander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the moſt part of them whom he put to death, was to eſtabliſh the tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla ſought for ſpite to take away his army from Pompey and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himſelfe had giuen him, and cauſed Lucretius Offella to be ſlaine openly in his owne ſight, becauſe he ſought to be Conſul, for recompence of the good ſeruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, cauſing his owne friends to be ſlaine in ſuch ſort, he made euery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiours touching couetouſneſſe and pleaſure doth ſhew, that the intent of the one was the deſire of a good Prince, and the other that of a tyrant. For we do not find that Lyſander, for all his great princely authority, did euer vſe any inſolency or laſciuiouſneſſe in his deeds, but alwaies auoided as much as a man might, the reproach of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: he led ſuch a true LACONIAN life, ſtraightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull luſts, neither for pouerty when he was young, nor for age, when it came vpon him. But whileſt he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimoniall honeſtie and chaſtitie, himſelfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adulteries, as Saluſt writeth. By meanes whereof he ſo much impoueriſhed ROME, and left it ſo voide of gold and ſiluer, that for readie mony he ſold abſolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his daily ſtudie to confiſcate & take for forfeit, the richeſt and moſt wealthy houſes in al the whole city of ROME. But all this ſpoyle & hauock was nothing in compariſon of that which he daily caſt away vpon his ieſters and flatterers. What ſparing, or meaſure may we think he kept in his gifts and priuate bankets, when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being preſent, to ſee him ſell the goods which he had cauſed to be confiſcate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to truſſe vp a great deale of houſhold ſtuffe, for a very little price? and when any other had out-bidden his price, and that the cryer had cried it out aloud: then was he angry, and ſaid: My friends, I haue great wrong done me here, not to ſuffer me ſell the ſpoile I haue gotten, at mine owne pleaſure, & diſpoſe it as I liſt my ſelf. Where Lyſander contrarily ſent to the commonwealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very preſents that were giuen to himſelfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peraduenture he did more hurt to SPARTA, bringing thither that gold and ſiluer, then Sylla did to ROME, in waſting and conſuming that he conſumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely for proofe and declaration, that Lyſander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their city, which neuer any other but themſelues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithſtanding to good order and gouernement: and Lyſander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not infected withall himſelfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worſe then he was himſelfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to deſire thoſe things, which he aboue all things had learned to deſpiſe. And thus much concerning peace and ciuill gouernement. Now for matters of warre and battels fought, there is no compariſon to be made of Lyſander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lyſander wan onely but two battels by ſea, beſides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I grant him) being rightly conſidered, was no great exploit of war, howbeit it was a noble act, conſidering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the city of ALIARTE: a man might ſay peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes alſo there was a fault in him, for that he ſtaied not for king Pauſanias aide (the which came from PLATÆES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and becauſe he went in a gaire, in fury, and in a vaine ambition to run his head againſt a wall: ſo that men of al ſorts making a deſperate ſally out of ALIARTE vpon him ſlue him there to no purpoſe. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of

of LEVCTRES, resisting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keep his men from flying, and to giue them assured victory, receiued his deadly wound: for all these men died like noble kings, and valiant captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast himselfe away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the ancient SPARTANS did like wise men, to auoide the fight with wals. For the noblest and valiantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not onely by the first souldier that commeth, but by euery silly woman or child. As they say, that the worthie Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary againe, the victories that Sylla wan in set battels, and the thousands of enemies which he slue, are not easily to be numbered, besides also that he took the city of ROME twice: and the hauen of ATHENS, not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driuen Archelaus out of firme land into the maine sea. It is to be considered also, against what captaines they made warres. For me thinks it was but a pastime as a man might say, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a pilot of Alcibiades, or to surprise and deceiue Philocles, a common Orator at ATHENS:

Whose busie tongue, much worse then two edg'd sword did seeme:
Which prated still, and honestly did neuer once esteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchsafe to compare with his horse-keeper, nor Marius with one of his sergeants or mace-bearers. But to leaue aside ỹ particular names of all other Princes, Lords, Consuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made wars with Sylla: what ROMAINE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of such power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenants of armies in all ITALY, were there any euer more valiant, then Lamponius & Thelesinus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and slue the two last? But the greatest matter of al that we haue spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his noble acts, with the aide of his whole countrey, where Sylla to the contrary did his (being banished from his countrey) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time that they draue Syllaes wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrew his houses, and slue his friends also in ROME: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousands of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventured his person in manifold dangers, so that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer stoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offered him, neither yeeld vnto him for any aide of men, or mony, to war against his enemies: but (a thing most chiefly to be noted aboue the rest) he would not vouchsafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand only, before he had spoken it with his own mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would forgo ASIA, deliuer him his galleys, and giue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA & CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kings. This me thinks was the goodliest act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimitie, to haue preferred the benefit of the cõmonwealth in that sort, before his priuate commodity. For therin he was like vnto a good greyhound, that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast till he haue ouerthrowne him: and then afterwards followeth the pursuite of his own priuate quarrell. And lastly, me thinks it is easily iudged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of ATHENS. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizẽs had made fierce wars with him for the increase of king Mithridates greatnesse: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lysander to the contrary, seeing such a mighty state and Empire as that ouerthrowne from the great rule it bare, had no pitie of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before, and establishe there very cruell and wicked tyrants. And therfore in mine opinion, we shall not much swarue from the troth, if we giue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lysander committed the fewer faults. And that we giue to the one the honour of a continent and modest man: and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull souldier.

Sylla fought with men of greatest power and ouercame them.

THE LIFE OF Cimon.

Peripoltas and his posterity.

Peripoltas the Soothsayer, he that brought King Opheltas out of THESSALY into the country of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time flouriſhed in that country, the more part of the which were euer reſident in the city of CHÆRONEA, becauſe it was the firſt city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expulſed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were ſo forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inuaſions of the MEDES into GREECE, and in the battels of the GAVLES) that they were ſlaine all of them, but onely Damon (a little childe left fatherleſſe and motherleſſe) ſurnamed Peripoltas that eſcaped; who for goodly perſonage and noble courage excelled all the luſty youths of his time, though otherwiſe he were very rude, & of a ſeuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growne of full age, a ROMAINE Captaine of an enſigne of footemen (lying in garriſon for the winter ſeaſon in the citie of CHÆRONEA) fell in great loue with Damon: and becauſe he could not reape the fruites of his diſhoneſt loue by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement preſumptions, that by force he wēt about to abuſe him, for that CHÆRONEA at that time (being my naturall citie where I was borne) was a ſmall thing, and (being of no ſtrength nor power) little regarded. Damon miſtruſting the Captaines villany, and deteſting his abominable deſire, watched him a ſhrewd turne, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, becauſe he might the more ſecretly compaſſe his enterpriſe) to be of counſell with him, and take his part againſt the Captaine. Now there were ſixteene of them in conſort together, that one night blacked their faces al with ſoote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day ſet vpon this ROMAINE Captaine, that was making ſacrifice in the market place, and ſlue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was ſtraight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereupon they called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to ſuffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocency for the fact done vnto the ROMAINES. But the ſelf ſame night, as al the magiſtrates and officers of the city were at ſupper together in the towne-houſe, according to their cuſtome:

The maners and lewd parts of Damon Peripoltas.

cuſtome: Damon and his followers ſtole vpon them ſuddenly, ſlue them all, and fled againe vpon it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being ſent on ſome iourny, paſſed by the city of CHÆRONEA with his army, & becauſe this murther was but newly done, he ſtayed there a few daies to examine the troth and originall thereof: and found that the commons of the city were in no fault, but that they themſelues alſo had receiued hurt: whereupon he tooke the ſouldiers of the ROMAINES that remained of the garriſon, and carried them away with him. In the meane time, Damon deſtroyed all the country thereabout, and ſtill houered neare to the city, inſomuch as the inhabitants of the ſame were driuen in the end to ſend vnto him, and by gentle words & fauourable decrees handled him ſo, that they inticed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongſt them, they choſe him Gymnaſiarchus, to ſay, a maſter of exerciſes of youth. But ſhortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his ſtoue or hot-houſe, ſtarke naked as he was, they ſlue him by treaſon. And becauſe that there appeared ſpirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard gronings and ſighings as our fathers told vs, they cauſed the doore of the hot-houſe to be walled vp: yet for al that, there are viſions ſeene, & terrible voices & cries heard in that ſelfe place vnto this preſent time, as the neighbors dwelling by do teſtifie. Now they that were de[redacted]ded of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of PHOCIDES, neare vnto the ci[redacted], who do only of all other both keepe the language & maners of the ÆTOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, ſignifying black, and beſmeared with ſoote: becauſe that Damon and his fellowes did black their faces with ſoote, when they ſlue the ROMAINE captaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neare neighbours vnto the CHERONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of ROME, a malicious accuſer, to accuſe the whole city (as if it had bin one priuate perſon alone) for the murther of the ROMAINES, whom Damon and his companions had ſlaine. The inditement was drawne, and the caſe pleaded before the gouernor of MACEDON, for that the ROMAINES did ſend no gouernors at that time into GRECE: & the counſellors that pleaded for the city of CHÆRONEA, relied vpon the teſtimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themſelues to his report, who knew the troth & how it was. Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of anſwer aduertiſed the very troth: ſo was our city cleared of the accuſation, which otherwiſe ſtood in danger of vtter deſtruction. The inhabitants of the city of CHERONEA, for that they had eſcaped the danger by teſtimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honour him withall, they ſet vp his image in ſtone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we alſo that be liuing at this preſent, though many yeares be gone & paſſed ſince, do notwithſtanding reckon our ſelues partakers of his forepaſſed benefit. And becauſe we are perſwaded, that the image & portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens maners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that repreſenteth any mans perſon or ſhape only: we will comprehend his life & doings according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we do compare and ſort them one with another. It ſhall be ſufficient for vs therefore, that we ſhew our ſelues thankfull for his benefit: and we think, that he himſelf would miſlike, for reward of his true teſtimony, to be required with a fauorable lie told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a paſſing faire face drawne, and liuely counterfeited, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, yet ſome manner of blemiſh or imperfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiouſly to ſhew it, becauſe the one would deforme the counterfeit, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euen ſo, becauſe it is a hard thing (or to ſay better, peraduenture vnpoſſible) to deſcribe a man, whoſe life ſhould altogether be innocent, and perfect: we muſt firſt ſtudie to write his vertues at large, and thereby ſeeke perfectly to repreſent the troth, euen as the life it ſelfe. But where by chance we find certaine faults and errours in their doings, proceeding either of paſſion of the minde, by neceſſitie of the time or ſtate of the commonwealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accompliſhed, then any purpoſed wickedneſſe proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we ſhall not neede too curiouſly to expreſſe in our hiſtorie, but rather to paſſe them lightly ouer, of reuerent ſhame to the meere frailty of mans nature, which cannot bring forth a man of ſuch vertue and perfection, but there is euer ſome imperfection in him. And therefore, conſidering with my ſelfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it beſt to compare him with Cimon, becauſe they haue bene both valiant ſouldiers againſt their enemies, hauing both done notable exploits in warres againſt the barbarous people: and moreouer, they haue both bene courteous and mercifull vnto their citizens, and were both the onely men that pacified the ciuill wars and diſſention in their country, and both the one and the other of thē wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer GRECIAN captaine before Cimon, nor ROMAINE captaine before Lucullus, that had made wars ſo farre off from their country, leauing apart the deeds of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the acts alſo of Perſeus againſt the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Iaſon alſo, if there remaine any monument extant ſince that time, worthy of credit in theſe our daies. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together, that they neuer ended their warres: they onely ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Againe, we may note in them a great reſemblance of nature, for their honeſty, curteſie and humanity, which they ſhewed vnto ſtrangers in their country: and for the magnificence and ſumptuouſneſſe of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we do leaue out ſome other ſimilitudes betweene them: howbeit in the diſcourſe of their liues they will eaſily appeare. Cimon was the ſonne of Miltiades and of Hegeſipyle, a THRACIAN woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde written in certaine poeticall verſes which Melanthius and Archelaus haue written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the hiſtoriographer himſelf, who was of kin alſo vnto Cimon, was called in like maner Olorus, ſhewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his anceſtours, and did alſo poſſeſſe mines of gold in the countrey of THRACIA. It is ſaid moreouer, that he died in a certaine place called the ditchy forreſt, where he was ſlaine: howbeit that his aſhes and bones were caried into the countrey of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongſt the tombes of them of the houſe and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne ſiſter called Elpinice. Notwithſtanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Miltiades of the village of LACIA. This Miltiades, Cimons father, being condemned by the ſtate to pay the ſumme of fiftie talents, was for non payment caſt into priſon, and there died: and left Cimon and his ſiſter Elpinice aliue, both orphanes, and very yong. Now, Cimon in his firſt young yeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimons faſhions vp and downe, as he had alſo his name: ſauing that his grandfather for his beaſtlineſſe was ſurnamed Coalemos, as much to ſay, as foole. Steſimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned muſicke, nor any other of the liberall ſciences, accuſtomably taught to yong noble mens ſons of GREECE, and that he had no ſharpe wit, nor good grace of ſpeaking, a vertue proper vnto children borne in the country of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diſſimulation, ſo that he rather liued PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was euen ſuch as the Poet Euripides deſcribed Hercules to be:

Cimons linage.
Thucydides linage.
Miltiades died in priſon.
Cimon defamed in his youth.
Coalemos, foole.
Cimons conditions.

A ſimple man he was, and could not well diſguiſe:
As honeſt cke in things of weight, as wit could well deuiſe.

This ſerued fitly to be applied vnto Steſimbrotus words written of him: but notwithſtanding, in his firſt young yeares he was ſuſpected of incontinencie with his ſiſter, who indeed otherwiſe had no very good name. For ſhe was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies priſoners vpon the wals of the gallery, called the Pleſianaction, and now Pœcile: (to ſay, ſet out and beautified with diuers pictures) he drew (as they ſay) Laodices face vpon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for monies ſake, but gaue his labour franckly to the commonwealth, as all the hiſtoriographers that wrote in that time do witneſſe: and as the Poet Melanthius alſo reciteth in theſe verſes:

Elpinice Cimons ſiſter, a chaſte.
Polignotus the Painter.

At his owne proper charge, greate coſt he hath beſtowed,
In decking vp our temples here with gilded roofes embowed,
For honour of the gods. And in our tongue likewiſe,
He hath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine deuiſe:
Painting and ſetting forth, in ſtately ſhew to ſee,
The images of demy-gods that here amongſt vs be.

Yet ſome ſay that Elpinice did not ſecretly company with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull maried wife, becauſe ſhe could not for her pouertie haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her ſelfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richeſt men in the city, did afterwards fall in fancie with her, and deſired to marrie her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fiftie talents, wherein he ſtood condemned a debter to the ſtate, Elpinice being poore, had regard to match according to her ſtate and calling.

ſtate, ſo that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vpon that condition maried his ſiſter Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithſtanding, it is certaine that Cimon was ſomewhat amorous and giuen to loue women. For Melanthius the Poet in certaine of his Elegies, maketh mention for his pleaſure of one Aſteria borne at SALAMINA, and of another called Mneſtra, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoubtedly, he loued his lawfull wife Iſodice maruellous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles ſonne, and tooke her death very grieuouſly, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were written vnto him, to comfort him in his ſorrow. Panætius the Philoſopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Phiſition wrote theſe elegies: and ſure it is not vnlikely, conſidering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions deſerued great commendation. For his valiantneſſe he gaue not place vnto Miltiades, and for his wiſedome and iudgement, he was not inferiour vnto Themiſtocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuſter and honeſter man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the beſt of either of both in the diſcipline of warres, and for the valiantneſſe of a noble captaine: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good gouernour, and in the adminiſtration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themiſtocles at the comming in of the MEDES counſelled the people of ATHENS to go out of the city, to leaue their lands and country, and to ſhip into galleyes, and fight with the barbarous people by ſea in the ſtraight of SALAMINA: as euery man was wondering at his bold and venturous counſell, Cimon was the firſt man that went with a life and iolity through the ſtreete Ceramicus, vnto the caſtle, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carrying a bit of a bridle in his hand to conſecrate vnto the goddeſſe Minerua, ſignifying thereby, that the city had no need of horſemen at that time, but of mariners and ſeamen. And after he had giuen vp his offering, he tooke one of the targets that hung vpon the wall of the temple, and hauing made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the hauen, and was the firſt that made the moſt part of the citizens to take a good heart to them, and courageouſly to leaue the land, and take the ſea. Beſides all this, he was a man of a goodly ſtature, as Ion the Poet teſtifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought ſo valiantly at the day of the battell, that he wan immediatly great reputation, with the loue and good will of euerie man. So that many were ſtill about him to encourage him to be liuely and valiant, and to thinke thinceforth to do ſome acts worthy of the glory that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwards, ſo ſoone as he began to deale in matters of ſtate, the people were maruellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themiſtocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was preſently aduanced and preferred to the chiefeſt offices of honour in the citie, being very well thought on of the common people, becauſe of his ſoft and plaine nature. Moreouer, Ariſtides alſo did greatly further his aduancement, becauſe he ſaw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vſe him as a counterpoiſe to controle Themiſtocles craft and ſtoutneſſe. Wherfore after the MEDES were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being ſent for by the ATHENIANS for their General by ſea, when the city of ATHENS had then no maner of rule nor commandemẽt, but followed king Pauſanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his countreymen and citizen in maruellous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to do good ſeruice, then any other nation in the whole army whatſoeuer. And when king Pauſanias had practiſed with the barbarous people to betray GREECE, had written alſo to the king of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and ſtraightly with the confederates of his countrey, and committed many inſolent parts by reaſon of the great authoritie he had, and through his fooliſh pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwiſe, gently entertained them whom Pauſanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his courteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS having no eye to his doings, he ſtole away the rule and commandement of all GREECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be ſole Lords of all, not by force and crueltie, but by his ſweete tongue, and gracious manner of vſing all men. For the moſt part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Pauſanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and ſubmitted themſelues vnder the protection of Cimon and Ariſtides: who did not onely receiue them, but wrote alſo to the councell of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they ſhould call Pauſanias home, for that he diſhonoured SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they ſay that king Pauſanias being on a time in the city of BYZANCE, ſent for Cleonice, a yong maiden of a noble houſe, to take his pleaſure of her.

King Pauſanias through his inſolencie and pride, loſt the Lacedæmonians all their rule of Greece.

Her parents durſt not keepe her from him, by reaſon of his cruelty, but ſuffered him to carry her away. The yong gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pauſanias chamber to take away the lights, and thinking in the darke to come to Pauſanias bed that was aſleepe, groping for the bed as ſoftly as ſhe could to make no noiſe, ſhe vnfortunately hit againſt the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made ſuch a noiſe, that it waked him on the ſudden, who thought ſtraight therewithall that ſome of his enemies had bene come traiterouſly to kill him, whereupon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beds head, and ſo ſtabbed it in the young virgine, that ſhe died immediatly vpon it. Howbeit ſhe neuer let Pauſanias take reſt after that, becauſe her ſpirit came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine haue ſlept, and ſpake this angerly to him in verſe, as followeth:

Pauſanias killed the young Bizantine virgine.

Keepe thou thy ſelfe vpright, and iuſtice ſee thou feare,
For wo and ſhame be vnto him, that iuſtice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did ſo ſtirre vp al the confederates hearts againſt him, that they came to beſiege him in BIZANTIVM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithſtanding he eſcaped, and ſecretly ſaued himſelfe. And becauſe that this maidens ſpirit would neuer let him reſt, but vexed him continually, he fled vnto the city of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that coniured dead ſpirits, & there was the ſpirit of Cleonice coniured to pray her to be cõtented. So ſhe appeared vnto him, & told him that he ſhould be deliuered of all his troubles ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA: ſignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he ſhould ſuffer there. Diuerſe writers do thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRECIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was aduertiſed that certaine great mẽ of PERSIA, and allied to the king himſelfe, who kept the city of EIONE, vpon the riuer of Strymon in the countrey of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he took the ſea with his armie, and went thither, where at his firſt comming he vanquiſhed and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: and hauing ouerthrowne them, draue all the reſt into the city of EIONE. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other ſide of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forſake the countrey, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himſelf. Whereupon he held them that were beſieged at EIONE ſo ſtraightly from victuals, that Butes the king of PERSIANS Lieutenãt, deſpayring of the ſtate of the city, ſet fire on the ſame, and burnt himſelfe, his friends, and all the goods in it. By reaſon whereof, the ſpoile taken in that city was but ſmall, becauſe the barbarous people burnt all the beſt things in it with themſelues: howbeit he conquered the countrey thereabouts, and gaue it to the ATHENIANS to inhabit, being a very pleaſant and fertile ſoile. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS ſuffered him to conſecrate and ſet vp openly three Hermes of ſtone (which are foure ſquare pillars) vpon the tops of the which they ſet vp heads of Mercurie: vpon the firſt of the three pillars, this inſcription is ingrauen.

Butes burneth himſelfe, citie, & friends, for feare of Cimon.

Statues of Mercurie.

The people truly were, of courage ſtout and fierce,
Who hauing ſhut the Medes faſt vp (as ſtories do rehearſe)
Within the walled towne, of Eione that tide,
Which on the ſtreame of Strymon ſtands, they made them there abide
The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feele
The dint of warre ſo many a time, with truſtie tooles of ſteele:
Till in the end, deſpaire ſo pierced in their thought,
As there they did deſtroy themſelues, and ſo were brought to nought.

Vpon the ſecond there is ſuch another:

The citizens which dwell in Athens ſtately towne,
Haue here ſet vp theſe monuments, and pictures of renowne,
To honor ſo the facts, and celebrate the fame,
Their valiant chieftains did atchieue, in many a martiall game:
That ſuch as after come, when they thereby perceiue,
How men of ſeruice for their deeds, did rich rewards receiue,
Encouraged may be, ſuch men for to reſemble,
In valiant acts and dreadfull deeds, which makes their foes to tremble.

And vpon the third another:

When Meneſtheus did leade forth of this citie here,
An armie to the Troian warres, (by Homer doth appeare)
He was aboue the reſt, that out of Græcia went,
A valiant knight, a worthie wight, a captaine excellent,
To take in hand the charge, an armie for to guide:
And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide.
That praiſe of proweſſe then (ô graue Athenians)
Is now no newes to fill the eares of theſe our citizens,
Since through the world ſo wide, the fame and worthie praiſe,
For martiall feates, to you of yore hath iudged bene alwaies.

Now though Cimons name be not compriſed in theſe inſcriptions, yet they thought that this was a ſingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themiſtocles had euer the like. For when Miltiades requeſted the people one day that they would licence him to weare a garland of oliue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of Decelea, that ſtanding vp in open aſſembly ſpake againſt him, & ſaid a thing that maruellouſly pleaſed the people, though indeed it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good ſeruice he had done to the commonwealth. When you haue Miltiades (ſaid he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aske to be honoured alone alſo. But how was it then, that Cimons ſeruice was ſo acceptable to the Athenians? It was in mine opinion, becauſe they had with other captaines fought to defend themſelues and their countrey onely: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had aſſaulted and driuen their enemies home to their owne doores, where they conquered the cities of Eione & of Amphipolis, which afterwards they did inhabit with their own citizens, and wan there alſo the Ile of Scyros, which Cimon tooke vpon this occaſion. The Dolopians did inhabit it, who were idle people, and liued without labour or tillage, & had bene rouers on the ſea of a wonderful long time, vſing piracy altogether to maintaine themſelues withal: ſo that in the end they ſpared not ſo much as the merchants and paſſengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine Theſſalians that went thither to traffick. And whē they had taken their goods frō thē, yet would they caſt thē in priſon beſides. Howbeit the priſoners foūd means to eſcape, & after they had ſaued themſelues, repaired to the parliament of the Amphictyons, which is a generall councell of all the ſtates & people of Græce. The Amphictyons vnderſtanding the matter, condemned the city of the Scyrians to pay a great ſum of money. The citizens refuſed to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, and bad them that robbed the merchants and had the goods in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, becauſe there was no other likelihood, but that the theeues thēſelues ſhould be driuē to anſwer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed them to come with his army, & they would deliuer their city into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing conquered the Iland, draue out the Dolopians thence, and rid the ſea Ægeum of all pirats thereby. That done, remēbring that the ancient Theſeus, the ſon of Ægeus, flying from Athens came into that Iland of Scyros, where king Lycomedes ſuſpecting his comming had traiterouſly ſlaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to ſeeke out his tombe, becauſe the Athenians had an Oracle & prophecy, that commanded them to bring his aſhes and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitāts of the Iland would neuer afore cōfeſſe where it was, nor ſuffer any man to ſeeke it out, till he at the laſt with much ado found the tomb, put his bones aboord the Admirall galley ſumptuouſly decked and ſet forth, and ſo brought him againe into his countrey, foure hundred yeares after Theſeus death. For this, the people thanked him maruellouſly, and thereby he wan exceedingly the Athenians good wils: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragicall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a yong man had played his firſt tragedy, Aphepſion the preſident perceiuing there was great ſtrife and contention amongſt the lookers on, would not draw them by lots that ſhould be Iudges of this play, to giue the victory vnto that Poet that had beſt deſerued: but when Cimon and the other captaines were come into the Theater to ſee the ſame (after they had made their accuſtomed oblations vnto the god, in honour of whom theſe playes were celebrated) he ſtayed, and made them to miniſter an oath vnto ten (which were of euery tribe of the people one) and the oath being giuen, he cauſed them to ſit as Iudges to giue ſentence, which of the Poets ſhould carie away the priſe. This made all the Poets ſtriue and contend who beſt ſhould do, for the honour of the Iudges: but Sophocles by their ſentence bare away the victory. But Æſchylus (as they ſay) was ſo angry and grieued withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, but went for ſpite into SILICIA, where he died, and was buried neare vnto the city of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO vnto ATHENS, ſupped one night with Cimon at Laomedons houſe, and that after ſupper when they had giuen the gods thanks, Cimon was intreated by the company to ſing. And he did ſing with ſo good a grace, that euery man praiſed him that heard him, and ſaid he was more curteous then Themiſtocles farre: who being in like company, and requeſted alſo to play vpon the cithern, anſwered them, he was neuer taught to ſing or play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich & mighty city. After that done, the company diſcourſing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in ſpeech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and hauing rehearſed the chiefeſt of them, he himſelfe told one, which was the notableſt and wiſeſt part of all the reſt that euer he played. For the ATHENIANS & their confederates together, hauing taken a great number of barbarous people priſoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIVM, the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to diuide the ſpoyle amongſt them. Whereupon he made the diuiſion, and ſet out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themſelues, and layd the ſpoyles and their apparell by themſelues; The confederates found this diſtribution very vnequall: but neuertheleſſe Cimon gaue them the choiſe to chuſe which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counſell rather to take the ſpoyles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themſelues, and ſo they did: for they tooke the ſpoyle of the priſoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Wherupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common ſoldiers to be but an ill diuider of ſpoile, becauſe that the confederates caried away great ſtore of chaines, carkanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN faſhion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But ſhortly after, the parents and friendes of theſe priſoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great ranſome: ſo that Cimon gathered ſuch a maſſe of ready money together by their ranſome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his galleys with the ſame for the ſpace of foure moneths after, and left a great ſumme of mony beſides in the ſparing treaſure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, beſtowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honourably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens: for he brake vp all his hedges and incloſures and laid them plaine and open, that trauellers paſſing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much fruite thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continuall table in his houſe, not furniſhed with many diſhes, but with meate ſufficient for many perſons, and where his poore countrymen were daily refreſhed, that would come vnto that ordinarie: ſo as they needed not otherwiſe care to labour for their liuing, but might be the readier, and haue the more leiſure to ſerue the commonwealth. Yet Ariſtotle the Philoſopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore towns men only in the village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwaies certain young men waiting on him of his houſhold ſeruants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the city, any old citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of theſe young men ſtrip himſelfe, and change apparell with the old man, & that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreouer theſe young men caried euer good ſtore of money about them: and when they met with any honeſt poore citizen in the market place, or elſewhere, knowing his pouerty, they ſecretly gaue him money in his hand, and ſaid neuer a word. Furthermore, Gorgias Leontine ſaid, that Cimon got goods to vſe them, and that he vſed them to be honoured by them. And Critias that was one of the thirty tyrants of ATHENS, he wiſheth and deſireth of the gods in his Elegies: How Cimon vſed his goods.

The goods of Scopas heires, the great magnificence,
And noble heart of Cimon, he who ſpared none expence:
The glorious victories and high triumphant ſhowes,
Of good Ageſilaus king: good gods, oh grant me thoſe.

The name of Lichas SPARTAN hath bene famous amongſt the GRECIANS: and yet we know no other cauſe why, ſauing that he vſed to feaſt ſtrangers that came to LACEDÆMON on their feſtiuall day, to ſee the ſports and exerciſes of the young men dancing naked in the citie. But the magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceed the ancient liberality, courteſie, and hoſpitality of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the firſt men that taught the GRECIANS throughout al GREECE, how they ſhould ſow corne, and gather it to maintaine themſelues withal, & alſo ſhewed them the vſe of wels, and how they ſhould light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an hoſpitall of his own houſe, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting ſtrangers that trauelled by his grounds, to gather ſuch fruits there as the time and ſeaſon of the yeare yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goods to be common amongſt them, as the Poets ſay they were in the old time of Saturnes reigne. And now, where ſome accuſed this honeſt liberality of Cimon, obiecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to win their good wils by that meanes: the manner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke part with the Nobility, and liued after the LACEDÆMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies againſt Themiſtocles, who without all compaſſe of reaſon increaſed the authority & power of the people: and for this cauſe he ioyned with Ariſtides, and was againſt Ephialtes, who would for the peoples ſake haue put downe and aboliſhed Areopagus court. And where all other gouernours in his time were extortioners and bribe-takers, (Ariſtides and Epialtes onely excepted) he to the contrary led an vncorrupt life in adminiſtration of iuſtice, and euer had cleane hands, whatſoeuer he ſpake or did for the ſtate and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take mony of any man liuing. And for proofe hereof, we find it writtē, that a nobleman of PERSIA called Reſaces, being a traitor to his maſter the king of PERSIA fled on a time vnto ATHENS, where being continually baited and wearied with the common accuſations of theſe tale-bearers and picke-thankes that accuſed him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimon, and brought him home to his owne doore two bolles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of ſiluer, which be peeces of money ſo called, becauſe that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon ſeeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chuſe, to haue him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous nobleman anſwered him, that he had rather haue him his friend. Then ſaid Cimon to him againe, Away with thy gold and ſiluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that gold and ſiluer ſhall euer be at my commandement, to take and diſpoſe it as I haue need. About that time began the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the wars againſt the barbarous people, deſiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to haue leyſure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alſo, conſidering that they had driuen their enemies out of their countrey, and that now they did them no more hurt: by reaſon whereof they payed the mony they were ſeſſed at, but they would furniſh no moe men nor ſhips as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and proſecuted law againſt them that failed paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that ſo cruelly, that they made the ſeigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary courſe to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take mony and void ſhips of them that would not, or could not ſerue in their perſons, being very glad to ſuffer them to become ſlouthfull mongrels in their houſes, by too much reſt, and to tranſpoſe themſelues from good ſoldiers which they had bene, to labourers, merchants, & farmers, altogether altered from armes and wars, through the beaſtly ſlothfull deſire they had to liue pleaſantly at home. And cōtrarily, cauſing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to ſerue in gallies, he ſo acquainted them with continuall pains in his voyages, that he made them in ſhort ſpace become lords & maſters ouer them that gaue them pay & entertainment. For they began by litle & litle

to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they saw trained continually in the wars, euer bearing armour, and carrying their weapons in their hands, becoming expert souldiers at their charge, by reason of the pay they gaue them: so that in the end, they became subiects and contributaries as it were vnto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there neuer was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the cruelty and power of that mighty PERSIAN king, then Cimon did: for after he had driuen him out of all GREECE, he left him not so, but following him foote-hote, as we commonly say, before the barbarous people could take breath, or giue wise and direct order for their doings, he made so great speed, that he took some of their cities from them by force, and other some by practise, causing them to rebell against the king, and turne to the GRECIANS side: insomuch as there was not a man of warre left for the king of PERSIA in al ASIA, from the country of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being aduertised that the kings Captaines were vpon the coast of PAMPHYLIA, with a great army by sea, because he would feare them in such sort, that they should not dare any more to shew themselues vpon the sea, on this side of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GNIDOS, and from the city of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred galleys, the which at the first had bene excellently well made and deuised by Themistocles, as well for swift sailing, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carrie the greater number of men of warre in battell, to assault the enemies. And so went first against the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS borne, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receiue their army into their hauēs) landed there, destroyed all the country, and then came and camped with his armie hard at their walles. But the men of CHIO being ancient friends of the PHASELITES, and in Cimons army at that iourney, did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertisement to them of the city of their doings, by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and shot ouer the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace, with condition, that the PHASELITES should pay ten talents for a fine: and furthermore, should also follow the armie of the GRECIANS, and from thenceforth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorus saith, that the PERSIAN captaine that had charge of the army by sea, was called Tithraustes, and the Captaine of the army by land, Pherendates. But Callisthenes writeth, that Ariomandes, the son of Gobrias, was the kings Lieutenant, hauing chiefe authority ouer the whole army that lay at anker before the riuer of Eurymedon, & had no desire to fight, because they looked for a new supply of foure score sayle of the PHOENICIANS, that should come to them from CYPRVS. But Cimon contrarily, sought to fight before these galleys of the PHOENICIANS came to ioyne, with them, and put his galleys in order of battell, determining to giue a charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not: which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew nearer into the mouth of the riuer Eurymedon, because they should not compasse them in behind, nor force them to come to battel against their wils. Which notwithstanding, when they saw the ATHENIANS come to set vpon them where they lay, they made out against them a fleete of sixe hundred sayle, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fiftie saile onely. But they did nothing worthie of so great a power, at the least touching the fight by sea, but turned their prores straight to the riuer: where such as could recouer the mouth thereof in time saued themselues, flying to their army by land, which was not farre from that place, set also in order of battell. But the rest that were taken tardie by the way, they were slaine, and their gallies sunke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were saued, as it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two hundred of them prisoners. In the meane season, their armie by land came neare to the sea side: which Cimon perceiuing, stood in some doubt, whether he should land his men or not, because it seemed a hard and dangerous thing vnto him, to land in spite of his enemies: and to put forth the GRECIANS already wearied with the first battell against the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, fresh, and lustie, and withall many in number against one. Neuertheless, perceiuing that his men trusted in their force, besides the courage which the first victory gaue them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them on land while they were hot yet with the first battel. And so with great furie and loud cries they ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who stood still and stirred not, & receiued their first charge very valiantly: by reason whereof, the battell grew sharpe and bloudy, insomuch as there were slaine all the greatest personages and

and men of beſt account of all the ATHENIANS army. But the other fought it out ſo valiantly, that in the end they wanne the field, and with maruellous difficulty made the barbarous people flie, whereof they ſlue a great number in the place, and tooke the reſt priſoners, with all their tents and pauillions, which were full of all ſorts of riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant champion of the holy games, hauing in one ſelfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by ſea alſo which the GRECIANS had wonne within the channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then vpon the land: and the battell which the GRECIANS wan by land before the citie of PLATÆES, with that which he wanne the day before on the ſea: yet was he not contented with all this. For after two ſo famous victories obtained, he would once againe fight for the honour of the tokens of triumph: and being aduertiſed that the foureſcore ſayle of the PHOENICIANS (comming too late to be preſent at the firſt battell by ſea) were arriued at the head of Hydra, he ſayled thither with all poſſible ſpeede. Now the Captaines of this fleete knew no certainty of the ouerthrow of their chiefeſt armie, but ſtood in doubt of it, and would not be perſwaded that it was ouerthrowne in that ſort: and therefore were they ſo much the more affraid, when they deſcried a farre off the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they loſt all their ſhippes, and the greateſt part of their men, which were either drowned or ſlaine. This victory againſt the PERSIANS did ſo daunt and plucke downe the pride and loftie minde of the barbarous PERSIAN king, as he made that condition of peace ſo much ſpoken of in ancient hiſtories, in the which he promiſed and ſware, that his armies thencefoorth ſhould come no neerer to the GRECIAN ſea, then the cariere of a horſe; and that he would ſayle no farther forward then the Iſles CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any galleys or other ſhippes of warre. Howbeit the Hiſtoriographer Calliſthenes writeth, that it was no part of any article compriſed within the condition of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this ſo great an ouerthrow: and that afterwards he kept ſo farre from the GRECIAN ſea, that Pericles with fiftie ſayle, and Ephialtes with thirtie onely, did ſaile beyond the Iſles CHELIDONIÆ, and no barbarous fleete euer came againſt them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, amongſt the common actes of ATHENS, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true indeede. And it is ſaid, that for this occaſion the ATHENIANS built an altar of peace, and that they did Callias great honour, for that he was ſent Ambaſſadour vnto the king of PERSIA to take his oath for confirmation of this peace. So when all theſe ſpoyles of the enemies were ſold to them that would giue moſt, there was ſuch ſtore of gold and ſiluer in the ſparing coffers of their treaſurie, that there was enough to ſerue their turne for any ſeruice they would employ it to; and beſides that, they had ſufficient to build vp the ſide of the wall of the caſtell which looketh towards the South, this voyage and great ſpoyle did ſo enrich them. And it is ſaid moreouer, that the building of the long wals that ioyne to the city, with the hauen, which they call the legs, was built and finiſhed afterwards: howbeit the firſt foundations thereof were built with the money Cimon gaue towards it, for that the worke met with mooriſh & watery places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the mariſhes with force of flints and great logs, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he alſo that firſt did beautifie and ſet forth the city of ATHENS, with places of liberall exerciſe & honeſt paſtime, which ſhortly after were much eſteemed. For he cauſed plane trees to be ſet in the market place: and the Academie which before was very drie and naked, he made it now a pleaſant groue, and full of goodly ſprings which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbours to walke in, and goodly long ſmooth alleys to runne a good courſe in. On a time he had news brought him, that certain PERSIANS dwelling in CHERRONESVS (to ſay a demie Ile of the country of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but ſent to the people of high THRACIA, to pray their aide to defend themſelues againſt Cimon: of whom they made but little account, becauſe he was departed from ATHENS with a very few ſhips, who ſet vpon them only with foure galleys, and took thirteene of theirs. And ſo hauing driuen the PERSIANS out of CHERRONESVS, and ſubdued the THRACIANS, he conquered all the countrey of CHERRONESVS, from THRACIA vnto his owne countrey. And departing from thence, went againſt them of the Ile of THASOS, that had rebelled againſt the ATHENIANS: and hauing ouercome them in battell by ſea, he wan three and thirtie of their ſhips, and beſides that tooke their city by ſiege, and wanne the mines of gold lying beyond the ſame to the ATHENIANS, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conqueſt made his way open into MACEDON, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the beſt part thereof

at that preſent time. But becauſe he let it alone, and followed not that opportunity, he was ſuſpected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by preſents of king Alexander: whereupon his ſecret enemies laid their heads together, and accuſed him. But Cimon to cleare himſelf before the Iudges of this accuſation, ſaid vnto them: I haue practiſed friendſhip neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as ſome other haue done, to receiue both honour and profit by them. But indeed I am a friend to the LACEDÆMONIANS; for I confeſſe I loue them, and deſire to follow their ſobriety and temperance of life, the which I preferre and eſteeme aboue any riches or treaſure: although I am very glad notwithſtanding to enrich our ſtate and commō-wealth with the ſpoiles of our enemies. Steſimbrotus reporteth this accuſation, and ſaith, that his ſiſter Elpinice went to Pericles houſe, (who was the ſharpeſt and ſtraighteſt accuſer of his) to pray him not to deale ſo extreamely with her brother: & that Pericles laughing on her, ſaid: Alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, thou, now to ouercome theſe matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cauſe came to hearing, he was a more gentle aduerſarie then any other of his accuſers, and roſe vp but once to ſpeake againſt him, and that for manners ſake onely: ſo that Cimon thereby eſcaped, and was cleared of this accuſation. And furthermore, ſo long as he was preſent in ATHENS, he alwaies kept the ſeditious people in obedience, who would euer croſſe and thwart the authority of the Nobility, becauſe they would haue all the ſway and rule in their owne hands. But when Cimon was ſent abroad any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no body to gainſay them, turned and altered the gouernement of the city top ſie turuey, and confounded all the ancient lawes and cuſtome which they had obſerued of long time, and that by the procurement and ſetting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of cauſes in manner from the court of * Areopagus, and put all authority of matters iudiciall into the hands of the people, and brought the ſtate of the city into a pure Democratia, to ſay, a common weale ruled by the ſole and abſolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauoured the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the authority of the Senate and councell ſo ſhamefully defaced and troden vnder foot, was maruellouſly offended withall, and ſought to reſtore the ancient ſtate of iudgement againe as it was before, and ſet vp the gouernment of the Nobility (called Optimatia) that was eſtabliſhed in the time of Cliſthenes. But then began his enemies againe with open mouth to crie out vpon him, reuiuing the old former naughty rumor that ranne of him before, that he kept his own ſiſter: and furthermore accuſing him, that he did fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongſt other things, there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verſes of the Poet Eupolis, which were made againſt Cimon:

No wicked man he was, but very negligent,
And therewithall to wine much more, then vnto mony bent.
He ſtole ſometimes away, at Sparta for to ſleepe:

And if it be ſo, that being thus negligent and giuen to wine, he haue gotten ſo many cities, and wonne ſuch ſundrie great battels: it is out of doubt then, that if he had bene ſober and carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor ſince, any GRECIAN captaine that had paſſed him in glory of the wars. Indeed it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twins which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedæmonius, and the other Eleus, as Steſimbrotus writeth, ſaying, that for that cauſe Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers ſtocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both theſe two, and another third called Theſſalus, were borne of Iſodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the ſonne of Megacles. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauour and countenance which the LACEDÆMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themiſtocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a young man, did beare more ſway in ATHENS then he: which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning, becauſe the good will of the LACEDÆMONIANS towards him, did bring them great commodity. For whē the ATHENIANS began to grow of great power, and to practiſe ſecretly, that the confederates of the GRECIANS ſhould forſake the LACEDÆMONIANS to ioyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angry withall, for the honour and loue they bare vnto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of GRECE at that time, becauſe he was very courteous vnto the confederates, & alſo alſo thankfull vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. But afterwards when the ATHENIANS were aloft, and of great power, and that they ſaw Cimon ſtucke not for a little matter with the LACEDÆMONIANS, but loued them more then they would haue had him: they began then to enuie him, becauſe in all his matters he had to doe, he euer highly praiſed and extolled the LACEDÆMONIANS before them. But ſpecially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perſwade them to do any thing: The LACEDÆMONIANS (ſaid he) I warrant ye do not ſo. That, as Steſimbrotus ſaith, made him maruellouſly to be maliced of the people. But the chiefeſt thing they accuſed him of, and that moſt did hurt him, fell out vpon this occaſion. The fourth yeare of the reigne of Archidamus, the ſonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, there fortuned the wonderfulleſt and moſt fearefull earth-quake in the city of LACEDÆMON, and thereabouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the countrey opened, and fell as into a bottomleſſe pit. The mountaine Taygetum ſhooke ſo terribly, that points of rocks fell downe from it. All the city was layed on the ground and ouerthrowne, fiue houſes only excepted, the reſt being wholly deſtroyed. And it is ſaid alſo, that a little before this earth-quake came, the young men of that city were playing with the young boyes, exerciſing themſelues ſtarke naked vnder a great gallerie couered ouer: and as they were ſporting together, there ſtarted vp a Hare hard by them. The young men ſpying her, ranne after the Hare ſtarke naked and oyled as they were with great laughter. They were no ſooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell downe vpon the boyes that were left, and ſquaſhed them all to death. And in memorie of the ſame, the tombe where they were afterwards buried, is called vnto this day Siſmatias, as much to ſay, as the tombe of thoſe which the earth-quake had ſlaine. But king Archidamus foreſeeing ſtraight vpon the ſodaine, the danger that was to come, by that he ſaw preſent, perceiuing his citizens buſie in ſauing their houſhold ſtuffe, and that they were running out of their houſes, made the trumpeters to ſound a hote alarme vpon it, as if their enemies had come ſtealingly vpon them to take the city, to the end that all the inhabitants ſhould preſently repaire vnto him (ſetting all buſineſſe apart) with armour and weapon. That ſodaine alarme doubtleſſe ſaued the city of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOTÆ, which are their ſlaues and bond-men in the country of LACONIA, and the country clownes of little villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all parts, to ſpoile and rob them vpon the ſodaine that were eſcaped from this earth-quake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then beganne afterwards to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawne certaine of their neighbours vnto their confederacie, and ſpecially the MESSENIANS, who made hote warres vpon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent Periclidas vnto ATHENS, to demaund aide: of whom Ariſtophanes the Poet in mockage, ſaid:

A maruellous great earth-quake in Lacedamon.

Taygetum mons.

Archidamus ſodaine policie ſaued the city.

Ilote ſlaues and bond-men to the Lacedæmonians.

With viſage pale and wanne he on the altar ſate,
In ſcarlet gowne requiring aide, to ſuccour their eſtate.

Againſt whom Ephialtes alſo ſpake very much, proteſting that they ſhould not aide nor relieue a city that was an enemy vnto ATHENS, but rather ſuffer it to fall to the ground, and to ſpurne ý pride and arrogancy of SPARTA vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Critias ſaith) being more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for the enlarging and increaſing of his countrey, brought it to paſſe by his perſwaſion, that the ATHENIANS ſent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore, Ion rehearſeth the very ſelfe words that Cimon ſpake to moue the people to grant his requeſt. For he beſought them that they would not ſuffer GREECE to halt, as if LACEDÆMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: nor to ſuffer their citie to loſe another city their friend, and ſubiect to the yoke and defence of GREECE. Hauing therefore obtained aide to lead vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, he went with his army through the CORINTHIANS country: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of CORINTH was maruellouſly offended, ſaying, that he ſhould not haue entred into their countrey with an army before he had asked licence of them of the city. For (ſaid he) when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he commeth not in before the maſter of the houſe commandeth him. But ye CORINTHIANS (ſaid Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEONÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinking that all ſhould be open vnto them that are the ſtronger. Thus did Cimon ſtoutly anſwer the CORINTHIAN captaine againe, becauſe it ſtood him vpon, and ſo went on with his army through the countrey of CORINTH. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require aide againſt the MESSINIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their ſlaues) who had won the city of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDÆMONIANS were afraid of the great power they had brought, and of their boldneſſe beſides: wherefore they ſent them back againe, and would not employ them of all other their confederates that came to their ſuccour, becauſe they knew them to be men very tickle, deſiring change and alterations. The ATHENIANS returned home, miſliking much that they were ſent backe againe, inſomuch as euer after they hated them that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDÆMONIANS ſake therefore, taking a ſmall occaſion of offence againſt Cimon, they baniſhed him out of their countrey for ten yeares: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment. Now within the terme of theſe ten yeares, the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuned to vndertake the deliuery of ẏ city of DELPHES, from the ſeruitude and bondage of the PHOCIANS, and to put them from the cuſtodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the ſaid city. Wherefore to obtaine their deſire and purpoſe, they came to plant their campe neare vnto the city of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon vnderſtanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS campe armed, with intent to doe his duty to fight with his countreymen againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſo went into the bands of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was himſelfe. But his owne countrey enemies cried out againſt him, and ſaid, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwards bring them to the city ſelfe of ATHENS. Whereupon the great councel of the fiue hundred men were afraide, and ſent to the Captaines to command them they ſhould not receiue him into the battell: ſo that Cimon was compelled to depart the campe. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other friends that were ſuſpected as himſelfe was to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings: that they ſhould do their beſt endeuour to fight valiantly againſt their enemies, to the intent their good ſeruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towards their countrymen: and ſo they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the ſouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were an hundred in all, they ſet them apart by themſelues in a ſquadron, who fought it ſo valiantly and deſperately that they were ſlaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the ATHENIANS maruellous ſorie for them, and repenting them that they had ſo vniuſtly miſtruſted them as traitors to their country. Wherfore they kept not their malice long againſt Cimon, partly as I am perſwaded, becauſe they called his former good ſeruice to mind which he had done to their country aforetime, and partly alſo, becauſe the neceſſity of the time ſo required it. For ẏ ATHENIANS hauing loſt a great battel before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the ſpring of the yeare, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would inuade them with a great power: wherefore they reuoked Cimons baniſhment by decree, whereof Pericles ſelfe was the only author and procurer. So ciuill and temperate were mens enmities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publike ſtate and weale: and ſo much did their ambition (being the moſt vehement paſſion of all other, and that moſt troubleth mens minds) giue place, and yeeld to the neceſſities and affaires of the common-weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he ſtraight pacified the warre, and reconciled both cities together. And when he ſaw that the ATHENIANS could not liue in peace, but would be doing ſtill, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lucres ſake: to preuent them that they ſhould not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by ſcouring and coaſting vp and downe the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, and the Iles of GRECE, with ſo great a nauie, ſhould moue occaſion of ciuill warres amongſt the GRECIANS, or of complaints vnto their confederates againſt them: he rigged and armed out two hundred galleys to go againe to make warre in CYPRVS, and in ÆGYPT, becauſe he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the wars of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the ſpoyles of thoſe their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readineſſe to depart, and the armie preſt to ſhip and ſaile away, Cimon dreaming in the night had this viſion: It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a bitch angrie with him, and barking earneſtly at him; and that in the middeſt of her barking, ſhe ſpake with a mans voice, and ſaid vnto him:

Cimon baniſhed for ten yeares.

This

This viſion being very hard to interprete, Aſtyphilus borne in the city of POSIDONIA, a man expert in ſuch coniectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this viſion did betoken his death, expounding it in this ſort: The dogge commonly is an enemy to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing gladdeth more our enemy, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voice with the barking of a bitch, ſignifieth nothing elſe but an enemie of the MEDES: becauſe the army of the MEDES is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRECIANS together. Beſides this viſion, as he did ſacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Prieſt opening the beaſt after it was ſacrificed, about the bloud that fell to the ground, there aſſembled a ſwarme of Ants, which caried the congealed bloud off from the ground by little and little, and layd it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the laſt ſpied it by chance; and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the miniſter of the ſacrifice brought the beaſts liuer that was ſacrificed, to ſhew him, whereof the biggeſt end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithſtanding, hauing all things ready for preparation of this iourney, ſo as he could not well go backe, he launched into the ſea, and hoiſed ſaile, and ſending threeſcore of his gallies into ÆGYPT, ſayled with the reſt vpon ỹ coaſt of PAMPHILIA, where he wan a battell by ſea of the king of PERSIA, ouercoming the gallies of the PHOENICIANS & the CILICIANS, and conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into ÆGYPT. For he had no ſmall thoughts in his mind, but reached to high enterpriſes, and determined vtterly to deſtroy the whole Empire of the mighty king of PERSIA, and ſpecially for that he vnderſtood Themiſtocles was in maruellous credite and reputation amongſt the barbarous people, becauſe he had promiſed the king of PERSIA to leade his armie for him, and to do him notable ſeruice whenſoeuer he ſhould haue occaſion to warre with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cauſe that made Themiſtocles poyſon himſelfe, becauſe he deſpaired that he could not performe that ſeruice againſt GREECE which he had promiſed: aſſuring himſelfe that it was no eaſie matter to vanquiſh Cimons courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with his army all alongſt the Ile of CYPRVS, promiſing himſelfe great matters at that inſtant. But in the meane ſeaſon, Cimon ſent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iupiter Ammon, to aſk him ſome ſecret queſtion: for no man euer knew neither then nor ſince, for what cauſe he had ſent them thither, neither did they alſo bring backe any anſwer. For they were no ſooner come thither, but the oracle commanded them ſtraight to returne: ſaying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this anſwer, left the oracle, and tooke their iourney backe to the ſeawards. Now when they were come againe to the GRECIANS campe, which at that preſent lay in ÆGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this world: and reckening the daies ſince his death, with the inſtant of their anſwer receiued from the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him; they knew ſtraight that darkly he had ſignified his death vnto them, and that at that very time he was with the gods. He died at the ſiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as ſome report, or elſe of a hurt he received at a skirmiſh, as other hold opinion. When he died, he commanded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their countrey againe, and in no caſe to publiſh his death: which commandement was ſo wiſely and cunningly handled, that they all came home ſafe, and not an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once vnderſtood any thing of it. So was the armie of the GRECIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though himſelfe was dead the ſpace of thirty dayes, as Phanodemus writeth. But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Captaine that did any notable thing worthy of fame againſt the barbarous people, becauſe the Orators and gouernours of the chiefeſt cities of GREECE ſtirred them vp one againſt another, and there was no man that would once ſteppe in as a mediator to make peace betweene them. And thus the GRECIANS now did one deſtroy and ſpoile another by ciuill warre amongſt themſelues, which happily gaue the king of PERSIA leyſure and time to reſtore himſelfe againe, and contrarily was cauſe of ſuch vtter ruine and deſtruction of the whole power and force of GREECE, as no tongue can well expreſſe. Indeede a long time after, king Ageſilaus came with an armie of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and beganne a ſmall warre againſt the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIAES gouernours of the lower countries of ASIA: but before he could do any notable exploit, he was called home againe by occaſion of new troubles and ciuill warres riſing among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his countrey, leauing the treaſurers of the king of PERSIA raiſing of ſubſidies and taxes vpon the cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were confede-rats of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they neuer ſaw any of the kings Sergeants at armes, or Commiſſioner, that brought any letters patents or commandement from the king, or any ſouldier that durſt come neare the ſea, by forty furlongs. The tombes which they call vnto this preſent day Cimonia, do witneſſe that his aſhes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuertheleſſe, they of the city of CITIVM do honour a certaine tombe, which they ſay is Cimons tombe: becauſe that in a great dearth and barrenneſſe of the earth, they had an oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Orator Nauſicrates writeth it, but to honour and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRECIAN Captaine.

THE LIFE OF Lucius Lucullus.

Lucullus parents.

AS for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Conſull, and ſo was Metellus (ſurnamed Numidicus, becauſe of his conqueſt of NVMIDIA) his vncle by the mothers ſide. His father notwithſtanding was conuict of fellonie, for robbing the treaſure of the State whileſt he was officer: and Cæcilia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchaſte life. But for Lucullus ſelfe, before he bare office or rule in matters of State, the firſt thing he touched and tooke in hand for the cauſe of his countrey, was the accuſation of Seruilius the ſoothſayer (who before had accuſed his father) for that he alſo had dealt falſely in his office, and deceiued the commonwealth. And this the ROMAINES thought very well handled of him, inſomuch as a prety while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valiant act done by him. For otherwiſe, though priuatly they had no iuſt occaſion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuſe the wicked, and it pleaſed them as much to ſee the young men put law-breakers in ſute, as to ſee a notable good courſe of a dogge at a hare. Howbeit there followed ſuch ſtirre and banding vpon this ſute, that ſome were very ſore hurt, and other ſlaine in the market place: but in fine, Seruilius was cleared and quite diſmiſſed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well ſpoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latine tongues: inſomuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which he himſelfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole hiſtorie thereof, and couch it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a readie tongue to vtter that he would ſpeake and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be ſeene to do, hauing matters of ſute or open audience:

Lucullus accuſeth Seruilius the ſoothſayer.

The Romaines thought it a noble deed to accuſe the wicked.

For Lucullus had ſtudied humanity from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall ſciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refreſh his wit (after great troubles) he fell to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which quickened the contemplatiue part of his ſoule, and mortified, or at the leaſt betimes bridled the ambitious & actiue part, ſpecially after the diſſention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is ſaid, that when he was a yong man, he layed a great wager with Hortenſius the Orator, and Siſenna the Hiſtoriographer (in ieaſt as it were at the firſt, but afterwards it fell to good earneſt) that he would write the breuiarie of the MARSIAN warres in verſe or proſe, in the Latine or Greeke tongue, which ſoeuer fell to his lot: and I thinke his hap was to do it in proſe in the Greeke tongue, becauſe we find a little Greeke ſtorie extant of the warres of the ROMAINES againſt the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother M. Lucullus, as appeared by many manifeſt proofes; but the chiefeſt and moſt noted proofe among the ROMAINES was this. Himſelfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer ſue to beare office in the commonwealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwaies till he ſhould be choſen, and let his owne time paſſe ouer. This great curteſie to his brother ſo wanne the peoples hearts, as Lucius being abſent, they choſe him Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his ſake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIAN warres, wherein he did many wiſe and valiant deeds. The cauſe notwithſtanding that moued Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his conſtancie and good courteous nature, then for any other reſpect. For when Sylla had once won him, he euer after employed him continually in his moſt weighty cauſes: as in commiſſion ſpecially, he gaue to him to coine money. For indeed part of the mony that Sylla ſpent in the warres againſt king Mithridates, was coined by Lucullus cõmandement, within the country of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian pecces, and were currant a long time amongſt the ſouldiers, to buy ſuch things as they ſtood in neede of, and neuer refuſed by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the ſtronger by land, but the weaker by ſea, ſo as his enemies cut off his victuals from him, ſent Lucullus into ÆGYPT and LYBIA, to bring him ſuch ſhips as he found in thoſe parts. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he ſpared not to ſaile with three brigantines of GREECE, and as many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himſelfe not onely to the danger of the ſea in ſo long a voyage, but of his enemies in like manner: who knowing themſelues to be the ſtronger, went ſailing euery where with a great nauie. But for all theſe dangers, he firſt arriued in the Ile of CRETA, & wan their good wils. From thence went to the city of CYRENE, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with ciuil warres, and continuall oppreſſions of tyrants: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them laws to eſtabliſh gouernment among them, putting them in remembrance of Platoes words ſpoken to their anceſtors in old time, in the ſpirit of a prophecie. For when they prayed Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them ſome forme of gouernment for their commonwealth, he made them anſwer: It was a hard thing to giue lawes to ſo rich and fortunate a people as they were. For to ſay truly, as nothing is harder to be ruled then a rich man; ſo contrarily, nothing readier to receiue counſell and gouernment then a man in aduerſitie. This leſſon framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coaſted towards ÆGYPT, where he loſt the more part of his ſhippes by pirates: but for his own perſon, ſcaping their hands, he was very honorably receiued in the city of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kings armie came to meete him at ſea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the king when he returned from any voyage by ſea: and king Ptolomie himſelfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honourable entertainment as he poſſible could. For amongſt other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his Court, and defrayed his ordinarie diet, where neuer ſtrange Captaine was lodged before: and did not onely ſpend the ordinary allowance in feaſting of him which hee vſed vnto others, but commanded foure times as much prouiſion more to be made as he had before. Notwithſtanding, Lucullus tooke no more then was reaſonable for his perſon: nor yet would he receiue any maner of gift, although the king had ſent him preſents to the value of foureſcore talents. And which more is, would not ſo much as go ſee the city of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull ſights in ÆGYPT, ſaying, that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleaſure, and had leyſure withall, to ſee ſuch things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the field, at the ſiege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomie would in no caſe fall in friendſhip with Sylla, fearing leſt he ſhould thereby put himſelfe into warres, but gaue him men and ſhippes to bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was readie to imbark, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich Emerald ſet in gold, which Lucullus at the firſt refuſed, vntill the king ſhewed him his picture grauen in it: and then he accepted the gift, fearing leſt the vtter refuſall might cauſe the king thinke he went away diſcontented, and ſhould perhaps therefore lay an ambuſh by ſea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of ſhips together of the port townes thereabouts, ouer and beſides ſuch as the pirates and ſea-rouers had hidden, being part of their ſpoiles, and beſtowed with their receitors, went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderſtood that his enemies lay cloſe in certaine creekes vnder the foreland, watching to boord him as he ſailed by. Whereupon he vnrigged and beſtowed his ſhips in dockes, and ſent word to all the port townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him victuals and other neceſſarie munition to be in readineſſe againſt the Spring. But in the meane while, when he ſaw time conuenient, he put his whole fleete againe to the ſea with all poſſible ſpeede, went himſelfe away, and in the day time caried a low ſaile, but in the night packt on all the cloath he could for life: ſo that by this crafty fetch he wanne RHODES, and loſt not one ſhip. The RHODIANS they alſo furniſhed him with ſhips: and beſides them, he ſo perſwaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitants of the Ile of Co, that they forſooke king Mithridates, & went to make wars with him againſt them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus himſelf alone draue king Mithridates men out of CHIO, reſtored the COLOPHONIANS againe to libertie, and tooke Epigonus the tyrant priſoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forſake the city of PERGAMVS, and to retire to the city PITANE, within the which Fimbria kept him beſieged very ſtraightly by land. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the ſea open vpon him, ſent for his force and nauie out of all parts, not daring to hazard battell againſt Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreouer was himſelfe a conquerour. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates meant, and hauing no power by ſea of his owne, ſent ſtraight to Lucullus, to requeſt him to come with his nauie into thoſe parts to his aide, for the ouercomming of this king, the greateſt & moſt cruell enemie that euer the ROMAINE people had. Becauſe that ſo notable a prey, which they followed with ſuch danger and trouble, ſhould not eſcape the ROMAINES, while they had him in their hands, and was come himſelfe within their danger: and that therefore he ſhould ſo much the more hearken vnto it, becauſe that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man ſhould winne more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had ſtopped his paſſage, and layed hands on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby ſhould the praiſe of this noble victory runne in equalitie betweene them both: the one that had driuen him from land, and the other that had ſtopped his paſſage by ſea. And furthermore, that the ROMAINES would nothing regard all the famous battels and victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHOERONEA and ORCHOMENE, in compariſon of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes meſſage ſent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleeued him at that time (and haue gone thither with his ſhips to ſtop the hauens mouth of the city, in the which Mithridates was beſieged, conſidering alſo that he was ſo neare at hand) this warre had taken end there, and the world beſides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the conſideration and reſpect he had vnto Sylla, whoſe Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of priuate or common benefit: or that he deteſted and abhorred Fimbria as a curſed perſon, who not long before had through his wicked ambition embrued his hands in the bloud of his Captaine: or elſe, that it was through the ſecret prouidence and permiſſion of the gods, that he ſpared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reſerued as a worthy enemy, againſt whom he might afterwards ſhew his valour. Howſoeuer it was, it ſo fell out that he hearkened not vnto Fimbriaes meſſage, but gaue Mithridates time and leyſure to flie, and finally to ſcorne all Fimbriaes force and power. But Lucullus ſelfe alone afterwards

afterwards ouercame the kings armie by ſea, once neare vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coaſt of TROADE: and another time neare vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by ſea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of ſhippes then he had. And yet ſo ſoone as Lucullus had deſcried him, he ſailed before all his nauie, being Admirall, in a galley of RHODES, at fiue oares to a banke, whereof one Demagoras was maſter, a man well affected to the ſeruice of the ROMAINES, and very skilfull in battell by ſea. And when Neoptolemus on the other ſide rowed againſt him with great force, commanding his pylot that he ſhould ſo order his galley, that he might ſtemme him right in the prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the kings galley, which was very ſtrong and heauie, and furthermore well armed with points and ſpurres of braſſe before, durſt not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his galley to winde about, and turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at the end, receiued the blow without hurt, conſidering that they hit vpon the dead workes, and thoſe parts which are alwaies aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other ſhippes were come, who commanding his maſter to turne the beake-head of his galley forward, did many famous acts: ſo that he made his enemies flie, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to ſeeke out Sylla euen as he was ready to paſſe ouer the ſeas, about CHERRONESVS: holpe him to waft his armie, and ſo paſſed him ouer with ſafetie. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was come into his realme and countries againe, which lie vpon the ſea Maior, Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the ſumme of twenty thouſand talents for a fine, by reaſon of their rebellion. And for leauying of his fine, he left Lucullus there with commiſſion to coine money: which was a great comfort and hearts eaſe vnto the cities of ASIA, conſidering the extremity that Sylla had vſed towards them. For in ſo grieuous and odious a commiſſion vnto them all, as that was, Lucullus did not onely behaue himſelfe vprightly and iuſtly, but alſo very fauourably and courteouſly. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in armes againſt him, he was very willing they ſhould know their fault, and that for ſatisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they ſhould ſuffer ſome light puniſhment. And ſeeing that they were furiouſly bent to continue in their naughtineſſe, he went againſt them, and hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled them to keepe within their wals, and laid ſiege vnto their city, where he vſed this policy with them. At noone dayes he lanched into the ſea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and ſayled towards the city of ELEA: howbeit in the night time ſecretly returned backe, and making no noiſe, layed an ambuſh neare vnto the city. The MITYLENIANS miſtruſting nothing, went on the next morning very raſhly without order, & without any maner watch or ward, to ſpoile the campe of the ROMAINES, ſuppoſing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming ſuddenly vpon them, tooke a great number priſoners, ſlue about fiue hundred ſuch as reſiſted, and wanne ſixe thouſand ſlaues, with an infinite quantity of other ſpoile. Now did the gods happily preſerue Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miſeries and troubles which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE ſuffer, euen then when he was occupied in the warres of ASIA: and yet notwithſtanding his abſence, he was in as good credite and fauour with Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For, as we haue ſaid before, he dedicated his Commentaries vnto him, for the good will he bare him, and by his laſt wil and teſtament appointed him tutor vnto his ſonne, leauing Pompey out: which ſeemeth to be the firſt occaſion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, becauſe they were both young men, and vehemently deſirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was choſen Conſull with Marcus Cotta, about the threeſcore Olympiade, and then they began to reuiue the matter again, that it was very needfull to make wars againſt Mithridates, and ſpecially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only ſlept for a while. Wherfore, when the Conſuls came to draw lots what prouinces they ſhould take charge of, Lucullus was maruellous ſorie that the prouince of GAVLE, lying betweene the Alpes & ITALY, fell to his lot, becauſe he thought it no country wherein any great exploits were to be done: and againe, the glory of Pompey grieued him greatly, whoſe honour daily increaſed by the famous battels he wan in SPAINE. So that it was moſt certaine, that ſo ſoone as Pompey had ended the wars there, they would haue choſen him General in the wars againſt Mithridates. Wherfore, when Pompey ſent to ROME in earneſt maner, to require money to make pay to his ſouldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not ſend him money the ſooner, he would leaue both Sertorius and SPAINE behind him, and bring his army backe into ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickly sent him, fearing lest he should returne into ITALIE vpon any occasion, while he was Consull. For he thought that if he returned againe to ROME with so great an armie, he would easily do what he list: and the rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at ROME, because he spake and did al that pleased the common people, being a vicious liuer, and dissolutely giuen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was another common Oratour among the people, called Lucius Quintius, and he would haue had all Syllaes doings reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of ROME againe with ciuill dissention, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall apart, to perswade him, and openly reproued him with such words, that he was disswaded from his euill purpose, & by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wisely and cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the common-wealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to grow. While these things were thus in hand, newes came that Octauius the Gouernour of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselues to sue for this charge, and to court Cethegus, as the onely man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckening of the gouernment of CILICIA in respect of the country, but because CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it: and perswading himselfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment thereof, they would giue none other (but himselfe) the authority to make wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure al the meanes he could, that none should haue it but himselfe. And hauing proued sundry waies, was compelled in the end against his owne nature, to practise a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deuise to obtaine his desire. There was a woman in ROME at that time called Præcia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant grace in talke and discourse, howbeit otherwise vnchast after curtisan maner. But because she employed the credit and fauor of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and seruice of the common wealth, and of them that loued her: she wan the report (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterprise, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common-wealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancy with her, that he could not be out of her sight: then had she all the whole power and authority of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Præcia wold will him to do. Thus Lucullus sought to come in fauour with her, sending her many presents, and vsing all other courtesies he could offer vnto her: besides that it seemed a great reward for so proud and ambitious a woman as she, to be sued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all assemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA: who after it was once grãted him, had then no need of the help neither of Præcia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholy of themselues with one consent did grant him the charge to make war with Mithridates, because he knew better how to ouercome him then any other Captaine, and because that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellus also growne too old, both which two were the only men that could deseruedly haue cõtended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Consull, made such sute to the Senate, that they sent him also with an army by sea, to keepe the coasts of PROPONTIDE, & to defend the country of BITHYNIA. Thus Lucullus hauing this commission, went into ASIA with one legion onely, the which he leauied anew at ROME: and when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through couetousnesse and delicacy of the country. For amongst others, were the bands which they called ỹ Fimbrian bands, men giuen ouer to selfe-will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall discipline, because they had liued a long time at their owne liberty, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe souldiers that together with Fimbria, slue their general Flaccus, Consul of the ROMAINE people, and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria himselfe, and forsooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitours, and wicked people, howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painefull souldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldnesse meetly well and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall meant, that knew how to command: but were vſed to flattering leaders, that commanded the ſouldiers no more then they themſelues liked of. Now concerning the ſtate of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bold (as theſe flouriſhing Sophiſters commonly are) vndertaking warre againſt the ROMAINES, with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but paſſing freſh and ſumptuous to the eye: after he was once foyled and ouercome, with no leſſe ſhame then loſſe, when he came to make his ſecond warre, he cut off all ſuperfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to ſerue for warres at all aſſayes. For he put by the confuſed multitude of ſundry nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in ſo many ſundry tongues, and clearely baniſht alſo the rich grauen armours with goldſmiths worke, and ſet with precious ſtones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wan them, then gaue ſtrength or courage to thoſe that ware them. And contrariwiſe, cauſed long ſtiffe ſwords to be made after the ROMAINE faſhion, and great heauy ſhields, & brought to the field a maruellous number of horſe, more ready for ſeruice, then rich in furniture. Then he ioyned ſixeſcore thouſand footemen together, appointed and ſet in order like vnto the battell of the ROMAINES, with ſixteene thouſand horſe of ſeruice, beſides thoſe that drew his armed carts with ſithes about, which were in all to the number of an hundred. And beſides all this land preparation, he brought alſo a great number of ſhips and galleys together, which were not decked with goodly golden pauilions, as at the firſt, neither with ſtoues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiouſly hanged for Ladies and Gentlewomen: but furniſhed full of armour, artilerie, and ſlings, and with money alſo to pay the ſouldiers. With all this army and preparation, he went firſt to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, and not thoſe onely, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miſeries and diſeaſes, by the cruelties of the ROMAINE farmers and vſurers, who raiſing taxes and impoſts vpon them, made them abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the Harpyæ, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reaſonable by the perſwaſions he vſed vnto them, and qualified a little the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being buſie about theſe matters, Marcus Cotta the other Conſull (and his companion) ſuppoſing that the abſence of Lucullus was a fit occaſion offered him to do notable ſeruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from ſundry places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and comming towards him: yet notwithſtanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumph aſſured alreadie in his hands, and becauſe Lucullus ſhould be no partaker of it, he aduanced forwards to giue battel. But Mithridates ouercame him both by ſea and land: ſo that Cotta by ſea loſt threeſcore of his ſhips with all the men in them, foure thouſand footmen by land, and was after with ſhame ſhut vp and beſieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopeleſſe to eſcape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earneſt with him to leaue Cotta; and to goe further, aſſuring him that he ſhould finde the Realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: ſo that he might eaſily be Lord of the whole. And theſe were the words of the ſouldiers that ſpited Cotta, becauſe his fooliſh raſhneſſe and fond imagination had not onely brought thoſe men to the ſhumbles to be ſlaine and caſt away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them alſo, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to goto his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an oration vnto them, anſwered, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in BOEOTIA in the firſt warres againſt Sylla, and now in the ſecond warre tooke part with the ROMAINES) aſſured him that ſo ſoone as they ſaw him in the Realme of PONTVS, they would all riſe againſt Mithridates, and yeeld themſelues vnto him: Lucullus anſwered him thus, that he would not ſhew himſelfe more fearefull then the good hunters, which neuer ſuffer the beaſt to recouer his denne. And when he had ſo ſaid, he marched with his armie towards Mithridates, hauing in all his campe thirty thouſand footmen, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſe. When he came ſo neare vnto his enemies, that he might eaſily at eye diſcerne all their hoſt, he wondered at the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their campe, and was in mind to giue battell, ſuppoſing

yet that the better way was to prolong time, and draw these warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMAINE captaine, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of souldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in readinesse to fight: but euen as both battels were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the sudden, without any shew of change of weather discerned before, and they plainely saw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and shape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten siluer. This celestiall signe put both the armies in such a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroake: and this wonderfull sight fortuned (as they say) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Now Lucullus afterwards considering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall so many thousands of people as Mithridates had in his campe any long time together, hauing his enemies campe so lying before them: willed that one of the prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabbin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the prisoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of men the same should maintaine: he found that all would be spent in three or foure daies at the vttermost. Whereupon he relied on his first determinatiō, to delay time without hazard of battel. So he caused a maruellous deale of wheat to be brought into his campe out of euery quarter, that the same being throughly victualled, he might easily tarry the occasion which his enemies necessity should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, sought which way he might take the city of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowne before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thousand men, and ten of their ships. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterprise, Mithridates stole away by night after supper, taking the opportunity of a darke rainie night, and marched thitherwards with such speed, that he was before the city of CYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastria standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall destinies. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight wayes step by step, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in disorder, lodged his army in a village call THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiously seated also vpon the high wayes, and throughfare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucullus wisely foreseeing what would follow, would not keepe his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had wel trenched & fortified his camp, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of assured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would giue victorie into their hands, and that without losse of one drop of bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates enuironned the GRECIANS round about by land, hauing deuided his armie into ten campes, and stopped vp the mouth of the arme of the sea, which deuided the city from firme land, with his ships from one side to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were valiant men, and determined to abide all extremitie for the ROMAINES sakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe stood in such a place, where they might easily discerne it from the city. But Mithridates souldiers deceiued them; for shewing them the ROMAINES campe that lay aboue hard by them, they said vnto them: do ye see yonder campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath sent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the CYZICENIANS in a maruellous feare, seeing such a multitude of enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus sent vnto them, but they would not beleeue him at the first, taking it for a tale, onely to make them to be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the siege: vntill such time as a little boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had taken him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whom they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they iested to aske that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMAINES campe with his finger: then they beleeued it indeed, and were couragious couragious againe. There is a lake neare vnto the citie of CYZICVS called Daſcylitide, and it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greateſt of them, put it in a cart, and ſo caried it to the ſea, and there put as many ſouldiers in her as ſhe could well carry, who by night entred into the citie, the skoute of the enemies neuer deſcrying them. This ſmall ſupplie did maruellouſly comfort the beſieged CYZICENIANS: and it ſeemeth that the gods, delighting to ſee their noble courage, would further increaſe and aſſure the ſame, by many manifeſt tokens which they ſent from heauen, and ſpecially by one, which was this. The day of the feaſt of Proſerpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cow to offer in ſolemne ſacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: ſo they made one of paſte, and brought it hard vn to the altar. Now, the cow that was vowed to this ſacrifice, & which they reared vp of purpoſe to ſerue for that day, was feeding amongſt the heard of the city in the fields, on the other ſide of the arme of the ſea. But that day ſhe kept alone from all the reſt of the heard, and ſwam ouer the arme of the ſea, and came into the city: where ſhe went of her ſelfe vnto the place of the ſacrifice. Furthermore, the goddeſſe Proſerpina her ſelf appeared vnto Ariſtagorax in his dreame, Secretary of the ſtate and commonwealth of the CYZICENIANS, and ſaid vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LYBIA againſt the trumpet of PONT, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretarie had told them this viſion, the CYZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddeſſes words, and could not imagine what they meant. Howbeit at the breake of day there aroſe a great whiſtling wind, that made the ſea billowes riſe very high: and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the city to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuiſed) began to make ſuch a noiſe, and to breake in peeces by the roughneſſe of the winde, that a man might eaſily iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one inſtant, the Southwind was become ſo vehement bigge, that in a moment it burſt all theſe engines aſunder, & ſpecially a tower of wood of the height of an hundred cubits, which the wind ſhooke ſo vehemently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is ſayd furthermore, that in the city of ILIVM the goddeſſe Minerua appeared vnto diuerſe in their ſleepe, all in a ſweat, and ſhewing part of her veile torne, as if ſhe had bene newly returned from giuing aide vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of ILIVM haue a pillar yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruellous ſorrie for the breaking and loſſe of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIANS had eſcaped the danger of aſſault, and of the ſiege in like manner, vntill he truly vnderſtood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreme dearth to be ſuch, as the ſouldiers were compelled to eate mans fleſh, which (his Captaines abuſing him) had for a time kept ſecret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left off his vaine ambition obſtinately to continue ſiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not wars with threats and brauery, but (as the common prouerbe ſaith) leapt on his bellie with both his feete, that is to ſay, he did what he could poſſible to cut off all the victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to aſſault a caſtle that troubled him, very neare vnto his campe, Mithridates becauſe he would not loſe that oportunity, ſent the moſt part of his horſemen to get victuals in BITHYNIA, with all the carts, and beaſts of carriage, and his moſt vnprofitable footmen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the ſelfe ſame night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter ſeaſon, followed them by the tracke with ten enſignes of footemen onely, and all his horſemen. But the ſnow was ſo deepe, the cold ſo terrible ſharpe, and the weather ſo rough, that many of his ſouldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on ſtill, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of Rindacus, where he gaue them ſuch an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the city of APOLLONIA, and went to ſteale the victuals they had loden, and to ſtrip the dead, which were a maruellous great number as a man may iudge in ſuch a caſe: and neuertheleſſe there were taken ſixe thouſand horſe of ſeruice, an infinite number of beaſts for carriage, and fifteene thouſand men beſides, all which ſpoyle he brought to his campe, and paſſed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the Hiſtoriographer Saluſt, who writing of this matter ſaith, that here was the firſt time that euer the ROMAINS ſaw any camels. Me thinks it ſtrange how he ſhould thinke ſo, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the Great vnder Scipio, and the others that a little before had fought againſt Archelaus, neare vnto

the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHÆRONEA, ſhould not haue ſeene camels. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, reſolued with himſelfe immediatly to flie, with all the ſpeed he could poſſibly make: and to entertaine and ſtay Lucullus for a time behind him, he determined to ſend Ariſtonicus his Admirall with his armie by ſea, into the ſea of GREECE. But as Ariſtonicus was readie to hoiſe ſaile, his owne men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thouſand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt (if he could) part of the ROMAINS army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by ſea, leauing the reſt of his army by land in the hands of his captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of Granicus, where he ſet vpon them, & after he had ſlaine twenty thouſand of them, tooke an infinite number priſoners. And they ſay there died in that wars, what ſouldiers, what ſlaues, what lackeis, & other ſtragglers that followed the camp, about the number of three hundred thouſand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the city of CYZICVS, where after he had ſpent ſome daies, enioying the glory due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to viſit the coaſt of HELLESPONT, to get ſhips together, and to prepare an army by ſea. And paſſing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he ſlept in the night, it ſeemed to him he ſaw the goddeſſe appeare before him, which ſaid theſe verſes vnto him:

O lyon fierce and ſtout, why ſleepeſt thou ſo ſound?
Since at thy hand ſo faire a prey, is readie to be found.

Herewith he roſe incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told them the viſion he had in his dreame: and about that very time alſo there came ſome vnto him from the city of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene galleys of king Mithridates, hauing fiue oares to euery banke, that were ſeene in the hauen of the ACHAIANS, and that ſailed towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ſhip ſtraight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his firſt comming he ſlue the captaine called Iſidorus, and went afterwards to the other mariners that lay at anker on the coaſt ſide, who ſeeing him come, drew towards land with their ſhips, in purpoſe to runne them all aſhore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus ſouldiers, becauſe they could not compaſſe them in behinde, and for that alſo the place where they had laied their ſhips was ſuch, as there was no way to force them before, their galleys floting in the ſea as they did, and the others being faſtned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much ado all this notwithſtanding, found meanes in the end to put aſhore certaine of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might eaſily land. Theſe ſouldiers went ſtraight and ſet vpon the enemies behind, ſlue ſome of them euen at their firſt comming, and compelled the reſt to cut aſunder the cables that faſtned the galleys to the banks. But when they thought to flie from land, the galleys bruſed and broke one another: and that worſt of all was, ranne vpon the points and ſpurres of Lucullus galleys: and ſo many of them as ſtood aboue hatches were ſlaine, the reſt taken priſoners: amongſt whom, Marius the ROMAINE captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had ſent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commanded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye, becauſe Marius ſhould not die ſo happie a death, as to be ſlaine, but that he ſhould die ſome ſhamefull death, and be condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in perſon with all the ſpeed he could poſſible to follow Mithridates, hoping to find him yet vpon the coaſt of BITHYNIA, where Voconius ſhould haue ſtayed him: for he had ſent this Voconius before with a great number of his ſhips vnto the city of NICOMEDIA, to ſtop him from flying. But he taried ſo long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA ſacrificing to the gods of the ſame, and to be receiued into the fraternitie of their religion, that he could neuer after come neare Mithridates to ſtop him from flying: hauing alreadie made ſaile with all the whole fleete, and haſting with all poſſible ſpeed to recouer the Realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in ſailing thitherwards, he met with ſuch a terrible ſtorme, that carried part of his ſhips ſo away, that they ranne ſtraggling to ſeeke their fortune, and part of them ſplitted and drowned outright: ſo that all the coaſtes and riuers thereabouts, for many daies after, were full of dead bodies and ſhipwrackes caſt aſhore by waues of the ſea. Now for Mithridates owne perſon, he was in a ſhip of great burthen, the which for her greatneſſe could not ſaile neare the ſhore, nor recouer land, ſhe was alſo very euill to be guided by the pilots in ſo boiſterous a ſtorme: the marriners beſides were put out of all their skill and knowledge knowledge: and the ſhip her ſelfe moreouer tooke in ſuch ſtore of water, and was ſo heauily charged withall, that they durſt no more put her out to the ſea. By reaſon whereof Mithridates was compelled to go aboord a little pinnace of pirats, and to put himſelfe and his life into their hands, by whoſe helpe in the end (beyond all expectation, but not without great danger) he got to land, and recouered the city of HERACLEA in the Realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great braueric Lucullus ſhewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the gods. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of theſe warres, to prepare a great nauie of ſhips, and therewithall had giuen order alſo for three thouſand talents: Lucullus ſtayed them by letters, that they ſhould not do it, writing brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be ſtrong inough to driue Mithridates from the ſea, with the onely ſhips he would borrow of their friends and confederates. And indeed, through the ſpeciall fauour of the gods, he brought it ſo to paſſe: for they ſay, that this terrible ſtorme that deſtroyed the armie of Mithridates was raiſed vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the Realme of PONTVS, becauſe they had deſtroyed her temple in the city of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuerſe that counſelled Lucullus to deferre the reſt of this warre vntill another ſeaſon: but notwithſtanding all their perſwaſions, he went through the countrey of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the Realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the firſt beginning he lacked victuals, ſo that there were thirty thouſand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a buſhell of wheate on their ſhoulders: howbeit entring farther into the countrey, and conquering the whole, there was ſuch exceeding plenty of all things, that an oxe was ſold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a ſlaue at foure times as much. And of all other ſpoyle there was ſuch great ſtore, that either they made no reckoning of it, or elſe they made hauock of it, becauſe there was no man to ſell it vnto, euery man hauing ſo much of his owne. For they ran ouer all the countrey vnto the city of THEMISYRA; and to the valleys that lay vpon the riuer of Thermodon, and ſtayed no where longer then they were a ſpoyling. Therupon the ſouldiers began to murmure at Lucullus, becauſe he aſſured all the cities vpon compoſition, & neuer took any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich themſelues by ſpoyle: and yet ſaid they, he would make vs now go farther, & leave AMISVS a great rich city which we might eaſily take by force, if it were but a little ſtraightly beſieged; and leade vs into the deſerts of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDÆIANS to fight againſt Mithridates. Lucullus paſſed ouer all theſe complaints, and made no reckoning of them, becauſe he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into ſuch mutinie and furie, as afterward they did: and contrarily excuſed himſelfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckoning, & ſuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather a new force & army together at his pleaſure. For, ſaid he, that is the marke I ſhoot at, & that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I do, wiſhing nothing more, then that he might once again make himſelfe ſtrong, and bring a ſecond armie to the field, that might embolden him to come eftſoones to fight with vs, and runne away no more. Do you not ſee, ſaid he, that at his backe he hath an infinite number of deſert countries, where it is vnpaſſable euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him alſo the mount Caucaſus, and many other vnpaſſible places, which are ſufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings beſides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a little way from the countrey of the CABIRENIANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whoſe power is ſo great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth whole townes and cities of GREECE vnto the Realme of MEDIA, and hath all SYRIA and PALÆSTINE in his hands, and hath ſlaine and rooted out the kings and ſucceſſours of the great Seleucus, and hath carried away their wiues and daughters priſoners by force. This great and mighty king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he married Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates ſhall come and intreate him to helpe him in his diſtreſſe, that Tigranes will refuſe him, but rather we muſt thinke certainely that he will make warres vpon vs in his defence. And thus, in making haſte to driue out Mithridates, we ſhall bring our ſelues into great danger, to prouoke a new enemie, euen Tigranes againſt vs, who of long time hath lurked for a iuſt occaſion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honeſter cauſe to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and ſo neare a kinſman, from vtter deſtruction, and

With this determinatiõ Lucullus taried a great while before the city of AMISVS, continuing this ſiege of purpoſe, without diſtreſſing them at all. Afterwards when winter was paſt, he left Murena there to continue the ſiege, and himſelfe with the reſt of his army went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of CABIRA, determining to tarrie the ROMAINES comming, hauing gathered together againe a new army of forty thouſand footemen, and foure thouſand horſemen, in the which he put his moſt confidence and truſt, ſo that he paſſed ouer the riuer of Lycus, and went and preſented battell to the ROMAINES in the plaine field. There the horſemen skirmiſhed, and the ROMAINS had the worſe: for there was one Pomponius a ROMAINE taken, of great eſtimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in ſauing his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his ſeruant & friend. Straight replied Pomponius, With all my heart, quoth he, ſo that thou make peace with the ROMAINES: if not, I will euer be thine enemie. The king eſteemed his courage much, and would do him no hurt. And as for Lucullus he was afraid to come into the plaine, becauſe his enemy was the ſtronger of horſemen: & he doubted alſo on the other ſide to take his way by the mountaine, becauſe it was very high, vneaſie to clime, and full of woods and forreſts. But as he ſtood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chance that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promiſed Lucullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a ſure ſtrong place to lodge his campe, where was a caſtle aboue the city of CABIRA. Lucullus beleeued the old mans words, wherefore ſo ſoone as night came, he raiſed great fires in the campe, and went his way: and after they had paſſed certaine ſtraight and dangerous waies of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promiſed to bring him. Now the enemies were marueilouſly amazed when day light came, to ſee him there ouer them, in a place where if he liſt to fight, he might come vpon them with aduantage: and if he liked not to ſtirre, it was vnpoſſible to compell him. For he ſtood indifferent then to hazard battell, or not. But in the meane ſeaſon, they ſay certaine of the kings campe by chance were a hunting the Hart. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this meane one to charge another in ſuch ſort (relief growing ſtill on either ſide) as Mithridates men grew the ſtrõger. But the ROMAINES ſeeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in ſuch a rage, that they all ran in a choler to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and giue them a ſignall to fight. Lucullus, becauſe he would ſhew them by experience how much the preſence and eye of a good wiſe captaine in time of need was worth: commanded them they ſhould not once ſtirre, and he himſelfe in perſon went downe into the valley, where he commanded the firſt of his men he met withall flying, to ſtay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they preſently did, and all the other in like caſe: and thus gathering them together againe, did eaſily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chaſe, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwards vpon this returne againe to his campe, he ſet his ſouldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to ſhame them withall, which the ROMAINES are wont to vſe in ſuch a caſe: and that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote long, being in their ſhirts, all vntruſſed, and their other companions preſent ſeeing them do it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vpon the mariſhes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his perſon, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to do any great enterpriſe, as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in company, knowing how to faſhion himſelfe with all men. This prince, being alwaies at ſtrife with other Lords of the countrey, and contending who ſhould haue the firſt place of honor and fauour about the king: went vnto Mithridates, and promiſed

promiſed him that he would do him notable ſeruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very glad of this promiſe, and praiſed him maruellouſly in ſecret: howbeit openly of purpoſe he did him many iniuries, becauſe he might haue ſome colour to counterfeit anger and diſpleaſure, and to giue way for him to go yeeld himſelfe vnto Lucullus, as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, becauſe he was one of the chiefeſt men of name in all his campe; and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediately: in the which he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that Lucullus greatly eſteemed his wiſdome, and commended his diligence, in ſuch ſort, that he did him this honour, to call him ſometimes vnto the Councell, and make him ſit at his boord. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occaſion to execute his enterpriſe, hee commaunded his ſotemen to be readie with his horſe out of the trenches of the campe: and at noone daies when the ſouldiers tooke reſt, and ſlept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no body there to [illegible] him from comming in, conſidering the familiarity Lucullus ſhewed him, ſaying alſo he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and ſure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if ſleepe that caſteth away ſo many other Captaines, had not then preſerued and ſaued Lucullus that ſlept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the doore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, becauſe Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lack of ſleepe, was but then newly layed downe to reſt. Olthacus, whatſoeuer the other ſaid to him, would not be ſo anſwered, but told him, he would come in whether he would or not, for he muſt needs ſpeake with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus anſwered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more neceſſarie, then the preſeruation of his maſters life and health, who had need to take reſt: and with theſe words he thruſt him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraid then, and withdrew himſelfe ſecretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horſe backe, and rode ſtraight to Mithridates campe without his purpoſe he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainely appeareth, that occaſion, and opportunity of time, euen in great matters deliuereth meanes to ſaue or deſtroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines giuen vnto the ſicke and diſeaſed perſons. Shortly after, Lucullus ſent one of his Captaines, called Sornatius, to get victuals, with ten enſignes of footmen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertiſed, ſent preſently at his taile one of his Captaines alſo, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and ſlue him, with great ſlaughter of his men beſide. And afterward Lucullus ſent another of his Lieutenants, called Adrianus, with a great company of ſouldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he ſhould need. Mithridates did not let ſlip this occaſion, but ſent after him two of his Captaines alſo, called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horſemen: all which were ſlaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which he ſought to ſalue as well as he could, ſaying that the loſſe was much leſſe then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and raſhneſſe of his Lieutenants. But Adrianus at his returne paſſed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maieſtie, carrying a huge number of carts loaden with corne and ſpoyles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates ſelfe into ſo great a deſpaire, and all his people into ſuch a feare and trouble, that he preſently determined to remoue thence. Whereupon, the Nobility and ſuch as had place of credite about him, began to ſend before, and ſecretly to conuey their ſtuffe out of the campe, but vtterly prohibiting others to do the ſame. The reſt of the ſouldiers ſeeing the ſtoutneſſe of the Kings minions, began to ſet vpon them with open force, not ſuffering them on the other ſide once to iſſue out of the campe. This mutinie grew to ſuch a fury, that they ouerthrew their carriages and ſumpter moyles, and ſlue them preſently. Amongſt others there was ſlaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefeſt Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermaus the Prieſt of the ſacrifices was troden vnder foote, and ſmothered at the campe gate, by reaſon of the multitude of thoſe that fled in ſo great diſorder. The King himſelfe amongſt others fled; but hauing neuer a one of his guard about him, nor any of the ſquires of his ſtable to bring him a horſe, Ptolomie, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne horſe, and gaue him the King, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMAINES that followed him were then euen hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of ſpeed they miſſed the taking of him, for they were very neare him; but the couetouſneſſe of the ſouldiers was the loſſe of the prey

they had so long sought for, with so great paine and hazard of battels, and depriued Lucullus of the honour and reward of all his victories. For they were so neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so little further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and siluer (whether by chance, or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely abandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwixt him that fled, and the ROMAINES that followed, who stayed there to rob the gold and siluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wan ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this losse was not all which the couetousnesse of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For, one of the chiefest Secretaries of the King being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucullus commanded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fiue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedinesse of them, slue him by the way; and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle and destroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the city of CABIRA, and many other castels and strong places, where he found great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the GRECIANS, and many Princes a kinne vnto the king himselfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then seeing themselues deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefite of Lucullus, thought with themselues they were not onely taken out of prison, but reuiued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates sisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her: because all Mithridates other wiues and sisters whom they placed farthest off, as out of all danger (& sent into a country of greatest safety, neare vnto the city of PHARNACIA) died pitifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sent one of the groomes of his priuie chamber vnto them, called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must al die. Amongst many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old apeece, and yet had neuer bene married: and two of his wiues also whom he had maried, both of the country of IONIA, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CHIO, and the other Monime, in the city of MILETVM. Monime, she was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being far in loue with her, in so much as he sent her fifteene thousand crownes at one time, yet she would neuer giue eare vnto his suite, vntill such time as the mariage was agreed vpon betweene them, & that he had sent her his Diademe or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore lady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a wofull life, bewailing continually her accursed beauty, that in stead of a husband, had procured her a master: & in stead of the matrimoniall company which a noble woman should enioy, had gotten her a gard & garrison of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, farre from the sweete country of GRECE: in change whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, hauing vnfortunately left them within her owne country she happily enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, and had commanded them from the king to chuse what manner of death they would, and which euery one of them thought most easie, and least painefull: Monime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her selfe, but the band not being strong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cryed out: O cursed and wicked tissue, wilt thou not yet serue me to end my sorrowfull dayes? And speaking these words, cast it on the ground, and spit vpon it, & held out her throate to Bacchides to be cut asunder. The other, Berenice, she took a cup full of poyso, her mother being present, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyson was strong enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not so quickly to destroy the daughter, because shee had not taken that proportion which would haue serued her turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, vntill such time as Bacchides hasting to dispatch her, she in the end did strangle her selfe. As for the Kings two sisters, Roxane and Statira, which were virgins yet vnmaried, they say, that one of them also dranke poyson, cursing and detesting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an ill word, nor was faint harted or sorrowfull to die, but cõtrarily did commend & thank her brother highly, that seeing himself in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cause them die, before they should fall as slaues into the hands of their enemies, and before they could come to dishonour them, or do them villanie. These pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle

of nature: neuertheleſſe he went on farther, ſtill following Mithridates at the heeles: vnto the citie of TALAVRA. And there vnderſtanding that he was fled foure dayes before vnto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned backe againe, hauing firſt ſubdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARENIANS, taken ARMENIA the leſſe, and brought the cities, caſtles and ſtrong places vnto his obedience. That done, he ſent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes to ſummon him to deliuer Mithridates vnto him: and himſelfe tooke his iourney towards the city of AMISVS, which was yet beſieged. The cauſe why this ſiege continued ſo long, was the ſufficiency & great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus, who vnderſtood ſo well how all ſorts of engines of batterie were to be vſed, and was ſo ſubtill beſides in all inuentions that might ſerue to defend a place beſieged, as he troubled the ROMAINES much in this attempt: but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour, but alſo outreached by Lucullus for all his fineneſſe. For where before he had alwaies vſed to ſound the retreate at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the aſſault to reſt them: one day he brake that order on the ſudden, and comming to aſſault the wall, at the firſt charge wanne a peece of it, before thoſe within could come in time to reſiſt them. Callimachus ſeeing that, and knowing it was now vnpoſſible to keepe the city any longer, forſooke it. But before his departing he ſet the city on fire, either for malice to the ROMAINES, becauſe he would not they ſhould enrich themſelues with the ſacke of ſo great a city: or elſe for a policie of warre to haue the more leiſure to ſaue himſelfe, and flie. For no man gaue eye to them that fled by ſea, becauſe the flame was ſo great, that it diſperſed it ſelfe euen to the very wals, and the ROMAINE ſouldiers, they onely prepared to ſpoyle. Lucullus ſeeing the fire without, had compaſſion of the city within, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpoſe prayed the ſouldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, euery one gaping after the ſpoile, making great noyſe with claſhing of harneſſe, and being very loude beſides otherwiſe, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to ſpoyle, hoping thereby to ſaue the houſes from fire, but it fell out cleane contrarie. For the ſouldiers themſelues in ſeeking all about with torches and linkes lighted, to ſee if any thing were hidden, they ſet a number of houſes on fire. So as Lucullus comming into the city the next morning, and ſeeing the great deſolation the fire had made, fell a weeping, ſaying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happie, howbeit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla ſaid he, deſired to ſaue the city of ATHENS, the gods granted him that fauour that he might do it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and ſaue this city, fortune thwarting my deſire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that cauſed CORINTH to be burnt. Neuertheleſſe he did his beſt indeuour at that time to helpe the poore city againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a ſhower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus ſelfe before he left the city made a great number of the houſes which were ſpoyled by fire, to be built vp againe, and courteouſly receiued all the inhabitants that were fled, beſides them he placed other GRECIANS there alſo, that were willing to dwell amongſt them, and increaſed the bounds and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlongs in the countrey. This city was a colonie of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire flouriſhed, and that they ruled the ſeas: by reaſon whereof, many flying the tyrannie of Ariſtion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the ſame. This good hap fell vpon them, that forſaking their owne goods, they went to poſſeſſe and enioy the goods of other men: but the very citizens of ATHENS it ſelfe that had eſcaped from this great deſolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas apeece, and ſent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the Grammarian was taken at that time, whom Muræna begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus hauing granted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt very diſcourteouſly, and did much abuſe Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in beſtowing this priſoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Muræna ſhould take him for a bondman, whereby he ſhould need afterwards to make him free. For ſeeming to make him free, and reſtore him to liberty, was no more then to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Muræna laid himſelfe open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Captaine ſhould haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISVS, he went to viſite

the cities of Asia, to the end that whileſt he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue ſome refreſhing of lawes and iuſtice. For, by reaſon that law was not executed of long time in Asia, the poore country was ſo afflicted and oppreſſed with ſo many euils and miſeries, as no man liuing would ſcant beleeue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible couetouſneſſe of the farmers, cuſtomers, and Romaine vſurers, did not only deuoure it, but alſo kept it in ſuch bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to ſell their goodly yong ſonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the intereſt and vſurie of the money which they had borrowed to diſcharge their fines withall; and publikely the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the ſtatues of their gods, and other church iewels: and yet in the end, they themſelues were alſo to be iudged bondmen and ſlaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their bodies in miſerable ſeruitude. And yet the worſt of all was, the paine they put them to before they were ſo condemned: for they impriſoned them, ſet them on the racke, tormented them vpon a little braſen horſe, ſet them in the ſtockes, made them ſtand naked in the greateſt heate of ſommer, and on the ice in the deepeſt of winter, ſo as that bondage ſeemed vnto them a reliefe of their miſeries, and a reſt of their torments. Lucullus found the cities of Asia full of ſuch oppreſſions, but in a ſhort time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For firſt he tooke order, they ſhould account for the vſurie that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly, he cut off all vſuries that paſſed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greateſt matter of all, he ordained that the creditor and vſurer ſhould enioy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And he that ioyned vſurie with the principall, that is to ſay, tooke vſurie vpon vſury, ſhould loſe the whole. So that by this order, all debts were payed in leſſe then foure yeares, and the owners lands and reuenues ſet cleare of all maner payments. This ſurcharge of vſuries, came of the twenty thouſand talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the country of Asia: the which ſumme they had payed twiſe before vnto the farmers and collectors of the Romains, who had raiſed it, ſtil heaping vſurie vpon vſurie to the ſumme of ſixſcore thouſand talants. Wherefore theſe collectors and farmers ranne to Rome, and cryed out vpon Lucullus, ſaying, that he did them the greateſt wrong that could be: & by meanes of mony, they procured certaine of the cõmon counſellors to ſpeake againſt him: which they might eaſily do, becauſe they had diuers of their names in their books that dealt in the affaires of the cõmonwealth of Rome. But Lucullus was not only beloued of thoſe countries whom he did good vnto, but was wiſhed for and deſired alſo of others, who thought the countries happie that might haue ſuch a gouernour. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had ſent before from Talavra vnto king Tigranes in Armenia, & whoſe ſiſter at that time was Lucullus wife: he firſt tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high coũtry, making him fetch a great compaſſe about, by many daies iourneys ſpent in vaine: vntill ſuch time as one of his infranchized bondmen that was borne in Syria, taught him the right way. Whereupon he diſcharged theſe barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong wayes they had led him, within few dayes paſt ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and arriued in the city of Antioch, ſurnamed Epidaphne. Where he had commandement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the country of Phoenicia, where he ſubdued certaine cities, and had ſome other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wan ſecretly diuers of the princes & noble men, that obeyed this Armenian king but for feare, by force, & againſt their wils, amongſt whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of Gordiæna: and promiſed the aide of Lucullus alſo to many of the cities that ſent vnto him (which had not long before bene ſubdued and brought into bondage) to whom neuertheleſſe he gaue in expreſſe charge, that for the time they ſhould not once ſtirre, nor alter any thing. For the rule of theſe Armenians was intollerable to the Grecians, and ſpecially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reaſon of his great proſperity, was growne to ſuch pride and preſumption, that whatſoeuer men did commonly eſteeme beſt, and make moſt reckoning of, he would not onely haue it, and vſe it as his owne, but alſo tooke it that all was made for himſelfe whatſoeuer: and this great ourweening grew, by reaſon of fortunes ſpeciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but verie little, and yet with this little (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downe the power of the Persians as much as any man that euer was before him. He repleniſhed the countrey of Mesopotamia with Grecian inhabitants, which he brought by force out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, compelling them

them to inhabite there. He made the ARRABIANS change their maner of liuing, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as tent dwellers, beeause they are vagrant people that dwell in no other houses but tents, which they euer vse to carrie with them; and brought them out of their naturall countrey, and made them follow him, vsing them for his commoditie in trade of merchandize. There were euer many kings in his court that waited on him: but amongst others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his person as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whither, they ranne by his stirrop in their shirts. And when he was set in his chaire of state to giue audience, they stood on their feete about his chaire holding their hands together, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could doe vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their liberty, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and master, more ready to suffer, then any thing to do. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this tragicall pompe, when audience was giuen him, told king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carry king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumph of Lucullus: and therefore did summon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or else that he proclaimed warres vpon himselfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well inough that Tigranes (although he set a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes hauing reigned (or to say better, tyrannically gouerned) fiue and twentie yeares space, had neuer heard any bold or franke speech but that. Notwithstanding, he answered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates, and if the ROMAINES made warres with him, that he would defend himselfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, King of kings, but onely king simply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he sent him goodly rich presents, which he refused. Whereupon the king sent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cup onely, beeause the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest againe vnto him, made great haste to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once see king Mithridates his so neare kinseman, who by fortune of warres had lost so puissant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder, in fennie, marish and vnwholesome grounds, without any honour giuen vnto him, as if he had bene a very prisoner indeed: howbeit then he sent for him honourably, and receiued him with great courtesie. When they were neare together in the kings pallace, they talked secretly one with another, and excusing themselues, clearing all suspitions conceiued betweene them, to the great hurt of their seruants and friends, whom they burthened with all the occasion of vnkindnesse betweene them: amongst which number Metrodorus the SCEPSIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speech, and one whom Mithridates so much loued and esteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his wars had sent him Ambassadour vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him against the ROMAINES. At which time Tigranes said vnto him: but what sayest thou to it Metrodorus: what aduice wilt thou giue me? Metrodorus either because he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe: As Ambassadour, ô King, I would wish you should do it: but as a Counsellour, that you should not doe it. Tigranes now reported this speech vnto Mithridates, not thinking he would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he presently put him to death vpon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily sorie, and repented him greatly to haue told him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, hauing but onely reuiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued against him: for he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honourably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead body of him, whom liuing he had betrayed. There died in King Tigranes Court also an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deserue that mention should be made of him, for the city of ATHENS sake wherin he was borne: for it is said, that when he was banished out of his country, he fled into the city of SELEVCIA, which standeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. When the inhabitants of the same praied him to teach them the Art of Eloquence in their country, he wold not vouchsafe it, but answered them proudly: that a platter was too little to hold a Dolphine in, meaning that their city was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected and accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieued him so much that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honourably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neare vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that countrey. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in ASIA, and had established good lawes among them, he was not careless also of games and pleasant pastimes, but while he was at leisure in the city of EPHESVS, he made many games, feasts, wrestlings, and fence-playes at the sharpe for ioy of his victory, delighting all the cities of ASIA with them; the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemne feast also in the honour of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuise to giue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Lucullus that he must make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went back againe vnto the realme of PONTVS, where he tooke his army which he had left in garrison, and brought it before the city of SINOPE to lay siege vnto it, or rather to besiege certaine CILICIANS that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they saw Lucullus come against them, they slue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the city, fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertised of it, entred the city, put eight thousand of the CILICIANS to the sword which he found there, and restored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserue the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nights dreame that one came to him, and said: goe a litle farther Lucullus, for Autolycus commeth, who is desirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision meant. It was the self same day on the which he tooke the citie of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that escaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vpon the sea side, which the CILICIANS would haue carried away: but they were taken and followed so neare, that they had no leisure to ship it. This statue (as it is reported) was one of the goodliest and notablest workes of Sthenis the image grauer. And some say it was the image of Autolycus, who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went out of THESSALIE with Hercules to go against the AMAZONES, and he was the sonne of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the ship in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made shipwracke vpon a rocke of the coast of CHERRONESVS, where she was cast away: howbeit that he and his men scaping with all their furniture, came to the city of SINOPE, which he took from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they say) of one Syrus the sonne of Apollo, and of the nymph Sinope Asopus daughter. Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a saying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may giue more credite vnto, then that which is signified to vs by dreames. In the meane season he was aduertised that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA and CILICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counsell, that sithence he was minded to war with the ROMAINES, he did not vse Mithridates aid in his wars at such time, as when he was in his best strength & force: and that he did not then ioyne his power with Mithridates, rather then suffer him to be destroyed and ouerthrowne, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselues. While these things passed in this sort, Machares king Mithridates sonne, that kept the realme of BOSPHORVS, sent a crowne of gold vnto Lucullus, of the weight of a thousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first warre, and leauing Sornatius with sixe thousand men to keepe the realme of PONTVS, he departed with twelue thousand footmen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen, to goe to the second warre. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him, to goe with so small a company to fight with so many warlike nations, and to put himselfe vnto the hazard of so many thousands of horsemen, in a maruellous large countrey, and of a wonderfull length, enuironed round about with deepe riuers and mountaines, couered with snow all the

the yeare through: so that his souldiers, which otherwise were no speciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did stubburnely disobey him. And on the other side, the common counsellors at ROME cryed out on him continually, and openly protested before all the people, that out of one warre he sowed another, which the commonwealth had nothing to do withall; and that he looked after none other thing but still to raise new occasions of warres, to the end he might alwaies haue armies at his commandement, and neuer leaue the wars, because he would make himselfe great with the cost and perill of the commonwealth. These crying counsellers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his army with all the possible speed he could, so that he came in few daies vnto the riuer of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough, by reason of the winter season: which troubled him maruellously at that present, doubting lest it would hold him there a long time in finding out of boats, and making of posts and plancks to build a bridge to passe ouer his armie. But towards night the water began to fall a little, and in the night fell so much, that the next morning the riuer was come to her ordinarie streame: and moreouer the country men themselues discerning certaine little Ilands that appeared vnto them in the middest of the water course, and the riuer very calme as a marish round about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing they had neuer seene chance before: as though at his comming the riuer had suddenly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to giue him safe and easie passage. And because he would not lose that oportunity, he passed ouer his army immediatly: and was no sooner on the other side, but he met with a happie token of good lucke, which was this. On the other side of the riuer, there was a certaine number of kine consecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyond the riuer of Euphrates, do reuerence and honour aboue all the other gods: and these kine they employ to none other vse, but onely to sacrifice them vnto this goddesse. They wander all about the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling otherwise, hauing onely the marke of the goddesse, which is, a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not easie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great ado. One of these consecrated kine, after that Lucullus army was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe vpon a rocke which they suppose is hallowed or dedicated vnto this goddesse, bowing down her head, and stretching out her neck, like those that are tyed short, as if she had come euen of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as she was. And besides her, he sacrificed a bull also vnto the riuer of Euphrates, in token of thanks for his safe passage ouer. Lucullus the first day did nothing but incampe himselfe only, on the other side of the riuer: but the next morning & the other daies following, he went farther into the country by the riuer of SOPHENE, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his armie. For when his men would haue had him to haue taken a castle by force, where they said was great store of gold and siluer, he shewed them mount Taurus afarre off, and told them, it is that which he must rather go to take: as for the things which be in this castle, they be kept for them that vanquish. And going on still with great iourneys, passed ouer the riuer of Tigris, and so entred the realme of ARMENIA with a maine army. Now for Tigranes, the first man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus coming, had no ioy of it: for he cut off his head for his labor. And therfore from thenceforth there durst no man say any thing vnto him, vntill such time as he was at the last enuironed round with fire, wch Lucullus army had raised about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was sporting & gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus indeed were a noble captaine, if he durst but tarry Tigranes coming downe in the city of EPHESVS onely, and how he would straight flie out of ASIA, so soone as he might but heare tell of his coming against him, with so triumphing an army, of so many thousand men. And thus may we see, that like as al bodies and braines, are not alike strong nor able to carrie much wine: so in like case, all wits be not resolute & constant, neuer to do amisse, nor to swarue from reasons bounds in great prosperity. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the truth: whose boldnesse had litle better reward for his newes then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediatly with three thousand horse and a good number of footmen, commanding him that he should bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, and that furthermore, he should march vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus already camped with part of his armie, and the other part comming after, when his skoutes brought him newes of the barbarous Captaines approach: which at the firſt put him in feare, that if the enemie ſhould come and aſſaile them thus ſcattered in companies, and not ranged in battel and readie to fight, he might ouerthrow them while they were in diſorder. And therefore he remained within his campe to fortifie the ſame, and ſent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thouſand ſixe hundred horſe, and as many footmen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commanding him to approach as neare to his enemie as he could without fighting, onely to ſtay him there, vntill ſuch time as he heard newes that al his armie was come together into his camp. Sextilius went to doe his commandement, but he was compelled to fight, (though againſt his will) Mithrobarzanes came ſo brauely and luſtily to aſſaile him. So was the battell ſtriken betweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was ſlaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying ſaued them ſelues. After this ouerthrow Tigranes forſooke his great royall city of TIGRANOCERTA that he built himſelfe, and went to mount Taurus, where he aſſembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would giue him no leiſure to prepare himſelfe, but ſent Murena on the one ſide to cut them off by the way, and to ouerthrow thoſe that were aſſembled about him: and on the other ſide Sextilius to ſtop a great company of the ARABIANS that were coming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius ſet vpon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in manner euery man. And Murena following king Tigranes at the heeles, ſpied an occaſion to giue the charge as he paſſed along a narrow valley, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and ſpecially for an army of ſuch a length: and taking the opportunity, ſet vpon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiuing, fled ſtraight vpon it, making all his cariage to be throwne downe in the way before the enemies to ſtay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS ſlaine in this ouerthrow, and mo taken. Thoſe things hauing this ſucceſſe, Lucullus went to the city of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he beſieged round. In that city were a maruellous number of GRECIANS that had bin brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people alſo whom they had vſed in the like forcible manner, as they had done the ADIABENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GORDIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whoſe townes and cities Tigranes had deſtroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reaſon whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of gold and ſiluer, of mettals, ſtatues, tables and pictures, becauſe euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) ſtudied to pleaſe the king, to enrich and beautifie this city, with all kinds of furniture and ornaments fit for the ſame. And hereupon Lucullus ſtraighted the ſiege as much as he could, perſwading himſelfe that Tigranes would neuer ſuffer that it ſhould be taken, but (though he had otherwiſe determined) yet for very anger would preſent him battell, therby to enforce him to raiſe his ſiege. And ſurely he geſſed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diſſwaded him by expreſſe letters and meſſengers that he ſhould in no caſe hazard battell, and perſwaded him rather to cut off the victuals on al ſides from the ROMAINS with his horſemen. The ſelfe ſame counſell and aduice did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates ſent) giue him in his campe, and prayed him very earneſtly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROMAINES. Tigranes patiently hearkened to their reaſons at the firſt; but when the ARMENIANS were come, and all the force of the countrey beſide, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kings of the MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were come alſo with all their power, and that on the other ſide there came a maruellous great hoſt of the ARABIANS that dwell vpon the ſea of BABYLON, and a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN ſea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbours, beſides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuer of Araxes, ſome coming freely to do him pleaſure, other for their penſions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor in councell, but of aſſured hope of victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, ſo that Taxiles was in great danger of himſelfe, becauſe he was againſt the determination taken in councell for giuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuie the glorie of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus diſſwade him from battell. For which reſpect Tigranes would not ſo much as tarrie for him, and becauſe alſo Mithridates ſhould haue no part of the honour of his victory: but went into the field with all his great army, vanting amongſt his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he ſhould fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all other ROMAINE Captaines. Now this brauerie was not ſo fond, nor ſo farre out of ſquare, but that there was great likelihood of it when he ſaw ſo many ſundry nations about him, ſo many many kings that followed him, ſo many battels of armed footemen, and ſo many thouſands of horſemen. For he had in his armie of bow-men and ſlings onely, twenty thouſand: fiue and fifty thouſand horſemen, whereof ſeuenteene thouſand men of armes, armed from top to toe, as Lucullus himſelfe wrote vnto the Senate: and an hundred & fifty thouſand armed footmen, deuided by enſignes and ſquadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, maſons, and ſuch other kind of handicrafts men, to plaine waies, to make bridges to paſſe ouer riuers, to ſtop ſtreames, to cut wood, and to make ſuch kind of workes; of this ſort of people, the number of fiue and thirty thouſand, who followed in battel ray in the rereward of the army, making their campe ſeeme far greater, and by ſo much the more ſtronger. When Tigranes ſhewed on the top of mount Taurus, and that they might plainely ſee his whole army from the city, and that himſelfe alſo might eaſily diſcerne Lucullus armie that beſieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the city were ſo glad of this ſight, that they made wonderfull ſhouts of ioy, and great clapping of hands, threatning the ROMAINES from their wals, and ſhewing them the army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time ſate in councell to conſider what was to be done: wherein ſome were of opinion that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege, and go with his whole army vndeuided againſt Tigranes. But others liked not that he ſhould leaue ſo great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege.. Lucullus made them anſwer, that neither of them both did counſell him well, but both together did counſell right. Whereupon he deuided his army, and left Murena at the ſiege of TIGRANOCERTA with ſixe thouſand men: and he with foure and twenty cohorts (in the which were not aboue ten thouſand armed footmen) and all his horſemen, with a thouſand bowmen and ſlings, or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad field by the riuers ſide. The ROMAINES ſeemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, ſo that for a while Tigranes paraſites made but a May-game of them to ſport withall. For ſome laughed them to ſcorne, other drew lots, and played away their part of the ſpoyles, as if they had already wonne the field: and euery one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themſelues to Tigranes, and beſought him euery man for himſelfe, that he would giue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would pleaſe him to ſit by in ſome place to ſee the ſport. Tigranes then, becauſe he would ſhew that he could be as pleaſant as the reſt, ſpake a thing knowne to euery man: If they come as Ambaſſadors (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but few. And thus they played vpon the ROMAINES, and tooke their pleaſure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battel. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on the other ſide of the riuer toward the Eaſt, and by chance the ſtreame of the riuer turned ſodainly towards the Weſt, where there was a better foord to paſſe ouer. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his army by the riuers ſide, following the ſtreame to meete with ſome foord, caſting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, & called for Taxiles, and ſaid vnto him, laughing: Doeſt thou ſee Taxiles thoſe goodly ROMAINE legions, whom thou praiſeſt to be men ſo inuincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles anſwered the king again: I would your good fortune (O king) might worke ſome miracle this day: for doubtleſſe it were a ſtrange thing that the ROMAINES ſhould flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpon their armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fields: neither do they carrie their ſhields and targets vncaſed, nor their burganets bare on their heads, as they doe at this preſent, hauing throwne away their leather caſes and couerings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we ſee ſo bright & gliſtring in our faces, is a manifeſt ſigne that they intend to fight, and that they march towards vs. Taxiles had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enſigne-bearer turne ſodainely that caried the firſt Eagle, and the bands tooke their places to paſſe the riuer in order of battel. Then Tigranes ſecretly come to himſelfe, as out of drunkenneſſe, cryed out aloud twiſe or thriſe, come they then to vs? But then was there no ſmall ſtirre and tumult, to put ſuch a world of people in battell. The king Tigranes himſelfe vndertook to leade the middle battel, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADIABENIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the moſt part of the compleate armed men, who made the firſt front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to paſſe ỹ riuer, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wiſh him to take heede that he fought not that day, becauſe it was one of thoſe which the ROMAINES thought vnfortunate, and call them Atri, as to ſay, blacke: for vpon one of thoſe dayes, one Capio was ouerthrown in a

The ordering of Tigranes battell.

Atri, black or vnfortunate daies.

ſet battell with all his army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue them a prety anſwer againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (ſaid he) for the ROMAINES. It was the ſixteenth day of the month of October. And ſo with thoſe words encouraging his men, paſſed ouer the riuer, and went himſelfe the foremoſt man, and marched directly towards his enemie, armed with an anima of ſteele, made with ſcallop ſhels, ſhining like the Sunne, and vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his ſword drawne in his hand: to let his men vnderſtand, that they muſt ſodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the ſwords point that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with ſhot and ſlings, and that he would ſo quickly winne the diſtance of ground they had to march ere they could ioyne, that they ſhould haue no leyſure to ſhoot. And furthermore, perceiuing that the ſtrength of their men of armes (wherof they made ſo great account) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and euen, and the way vp the hill not paſſing foure furlongs trauell, & not very hard nor ſteepe to clime: he ſent thither certaine horſemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commanded them to giue a charge on the flancke to diſorder them, and aſſay to cut their launces with their ſwords. For all the ſtrength of theſe men of armes conſiſteth in their launces, and they can do nothing of themſelues, nor againſt their enemies, they are ſo heauily armed and loden: ſo as it ſeemeth they are locked vp in their armour, as in an iron priſon. And he himſelf therewithall taking two enſignes of footmen, ſtroue alſo to gaine the top of the hill, his ſouldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable courage, becauſe they ſaw him the foremoſt man trauelling on foote, and digging againſt the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the top, he ſtayed a little in the higheſt place he could finde, and cryed out with a loud voice: O companions, the victory is ours. And as he ſpake thoſe words, he led them againſt theſe men of armes, commanding them they ſhould not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their ſwords in their hands they ſhould ſtrike at their thighes and legs, becauſe they haue no other parts of their bodies naked. Howbeit, there was no neede of ſuch fight, for they taried not the ROMAINES, but with great crying out turned their horſe heads immediatly, and ran cowardly (themſelues and their horſes, heauie armed as they were) through the midſt of the bands of their footmen, before they had ſtriken one ſtroke. And thus were ſo many thouſands of men broken without any ſtroke ſtriken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of bloud ſeene to be ſpilt. But the great ſlaughter was when they began to flie, or (to ſay better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ranne ſo one vpon anothers necke, by reaſon of the maruellous length & breadth of their battels. Tigranes, amongſt the reſt was one of the firſt that diſlodged with a ſmall company, and ſeeing his ſonne running the ſame fortune, flying as himſelfe did, tooke off his diademe or royall band from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commanding him to ſaue himſelfe as wel as he could by ſome other way. But the yong Prince durſt not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his truſty ſeruants to keepe, who by chance was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: ſo that amongſt the other ſpoyle and priſoners, there was taken Tigranes diadem. It is thought that there were ſlaine at this ouerthrow, aboue an hundred thouſand footmen, and very few of all the horſemen ſaued. On the ROMAINES ſide, there were about an hundred hurt, & fiue ſlaine. Antiochus the Philoſopher ſpeaking of this battell in a treatiſe he made of the gods, writeth that the Sunne neuer ſaw the like ouerthrow. And Strabo another Philoſopher in a certaine abridgement he made of ſtories, ſaid, that the ROMAINES were aſhamed and laughed at themſelues, that they had drawne their ſwords againſt ſuch daſtardly ſlaues. And Titus Liuius declareth alſo, that the ROMAINES were neuer in any battell with ſo ſmall a number of fighting men, againſt ſo great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in al the world the twentieth part (nothing like) of thoſe that were ouercome. Wherfore the oldeſt and beſt experienced Captaines of the ROMAINS did highly commend Lucullus, becauſe he had ouercome two of the greateſt & moſt mighty Princes of the world, by two ſundry contrary meanes: the one by tract and delay, and the other by ſpeed and ſwiftneſſe. For he vndermined and conſumed Mithridates by holding backe and delaying, at that time when all his ſtrength was whole: and to the contrary he deſtroyed Tigranes with great ſpeed and haſt. And thus did he that which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vſed delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to winne the victory. This was the cauſe why Mithridates made no haſte to come to the battell, thinking ſtill that Lucullus had vſed his wonted policie, to delay and giue backe alwaies: and therefore he came by ſmall iourneyes vnto Tigranes campe. the first with a few of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he straight mistrusted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troups of them naked, and sore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to seeke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forsaken of his men, and in very poore estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduersity with that pride and disdaine he had vsed him before in his misery: but lighted off his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a Kings court, that followed him to serue him, comforting him, and exhorting him to pluck vp his heart again, and to be couragious thencefoorth. Hereupon they both leauied afresh the whole force and power they could from all the parts of their dominion. In the meane season, there fell out great sedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betweene the GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon Lucullus giuing an assault to the city at that very instant, wonne it, and seized vpon the kings treasure there, leauing al the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoyle that was wonne vpon the enemies, eight hundred Drachmaes vnto euery souldier. And vnderstanding that there were diuers musitians, common players, minstrels, and such kinde of people meete for feasts and sport, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all parts, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this citie: he caused all them to serue at the sports and feasts of this victory. After the solemnization whereof, he sent the GRECIANS home againe vnto their country, and gaue them money to defray their charges by the way, and the barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their natiue cõtries. And so it fortuned, that by the desolation and destruction of a city forsaken, many others were built againe, and stored with people: because those cities had thereby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe, who euer after did loue and honour Lucullus, as their benefactour and founder. All other things prospered also according to his vertue & merits. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iustice, and of clemency, then that that came by force of martial prowesse & chiualry. For in deeds of armes, he said his army partly deserued praise, and fortune also caried the best part away: but the praise of the other, was only due vnto himselfe. Whereby he shewed the valure of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue: and so reaped the fruit of his worthy deserts. For by those good parts, he wan ỹ hearts of the barbarous people in such sort, that the Kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themselues and their goods into his hands. So did the natiõ of the SOPHENIANS also yeeld themselues vnto him. The GORDIÆNIANS, in like manner, they liked Lucullus so well, that they would willingly haue forsaken their cities, houses and country, to follow him with their wiues and children, vpon this occasion: Zarbienus King of these GORDIÆNIANS, as we haue recited before, had priuily entred amitie with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no longer away with the tyrannie of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife & children to death, before the ROMAINES maine army came into the coũtry of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but passing through this Realme, gaue him very royall funerals: for hauing heaped vp a huge pile of wood, sumptuously set out with cloth of gold and siluer, and other rich spoiles of Tigranes: he himselfe in person would needes set it on fire, and made the funerall effusions and accustomed sprinklings at funerals, with his friends & kinsmen, doing him this honor, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people, & appointed also a great summe of mony besides to erect a sumptuous tombe for him. For they found great store of gold & siluer in the Kings castell, and there was plenty of prouision also of 300000. bushels of wheate: the which did enrich his souldiers maruellously, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that hauing receiued not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at ROME, he had notwithstanding made the war entertaine it selfe. About the selfe same time also, the king of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors vnto him, to offer him friendship and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambassadours to him also of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the King of the PARTHIANS stood doubtfull how to resolue which part he should take, and that secretly he sent vnto Tigranes, to aske the Realme of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aide him against the ROMAINES. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIANS double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes & Mithridates, as two enemies wearied and ouercome, & a little to proue the force and power of the PARTHIANS by making warres vpon them, thinking it great honour vnto him, if he might discomfit and ouerthrow three so mighty kings, one after another, like a valiant conquerour that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the countries of three of the greatest Princes vnder the Sunne, alwaies a conquerour, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of PONTVS, that they should repaire to him with all speed with the bands they had vnder their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the countrey of GORDIÆNA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenants that had many times before found their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commandements, knew plainely then their cankred stomackes, and incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or perswasions they could vse: but contrarily they cried out, and told him plainely, that they would no longer tarrie where they were, but would go home to their countrey, and leaue the Realme of PONTVS without guard or garrison at al. And farther, that worst of al was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnesse to his souldiers there, to mutine in like sort, hauing good will and disposition thereunto of themselues before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with fineneſſe, were become so dull and lazie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnesse of warres, but desired to liue in all idlenesse and ease. And hearing the report of their fellowes stoutnes, called them lustie laddes, saying, they must needs take the like course, and do as they taught them, vanting of their good seruice of long time done, which well deserued leaue now to depart home with safety, and thenceforth take their rest. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, and many other their words, worse and fuller of sedition then these, brake off his enterprise against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the midst of Sommer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to see the fields so full of wheate yet standing, which came by the season of the yeare, and coldnesse of the ayre, being so slacke & slow in all those parts. Neuertheless, he came downe into the vally, & at two or three skirmishes ouerthrew the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his comming downe: and ranne ouer all the valley, and destroyed the whole country without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the prouision of corne that was made for Tigranes campe; whereby he straighted his enemies vnto that neede and necessity of victuals which himselfe feared, and yet ceassed not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell: sometime inclosing their campe with trenches about, as if he meant to famish them: sometime againe destroying and spoiling the whole countrey before their face. But becaule they had so oft bene discomfited, they would no more stirre, nor once moue against him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raised his campe, and went and laid siege vnto ARTAXATA, the chiefe city of the kingdome of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wiues and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battel, thē suffer that city to be lost. It is said, that Hannibal of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in battell by the ROMAINES) went vnto king Artaxes, whom he taught many necessarie and profitable things for his Realme, & amongst others, considering that one of the goodliest & pleasantest places of all his kingdome lay waste, and no reckoning made of it, drew a plot of a city, brought the king thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuice maruellous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to see the work finished. And thus was this noble & famous city built, and called after the kings name, ARTAXATA: and held euer after the reputation of the chiefest place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertised that Lucullus went to lay siege therunto, could not endure it, but went with all his armie to follow the ROMAINES, and the fourth day came and camped hard by them: insomuch as there was but the riuer of Arsanias betweene them, which the ROMAINES of necessity must passe ouer to go to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauing first sacrificed vnto the gods, assuring himselfe of the victory, as if he had it alreadie in his hands, made his armie passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohorts in the front, and the other behind, fearing lest the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes should enuiron them at their backes. They had against them also the MARDIAN bowmen on horseback, & the IBERIANS with their lances, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best souldiers he had in pay: & yet for all that they did no notable seruice. For when they had skirmished but a litle with the horsemen of the ROMAINES, they durst not tarie the legionaries or footbands that came behind them, but dispersed themselues, some flying one way, some another, which enticed the ROMAINES

MAINE horsemē to follow the chase. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes person, saw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to breake vpon the footmen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afraid therof: sent in hast to call in his horsemen that followed the chase, and in the meane time himselfe marched foremost, against these Lords and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the nobility of their hoast, whom he put in such a feare, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the heart so much as to abide the cries of the ROMAINES. The chase was very long: for it continued all night, vntill such time as the ROMAINES were wearied with killing, taking of prisoners, & packing vp of all kinds of spoiles. Titus Liuius saith, that there were slaine moe men in the first battell, but greater personages in the second: & the chiefe of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus heart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the country, euen vtterly to destroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that season haue thought) there fell out so great a cold, that for the most part, it did nothing but snow: and if the element did any thing cleare, then froze it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the riuers were so extremely congealed with ice. And there could no man passe ouer by foord: for they did not so soone enter, but the ice brake and cut the veines and sinewes of the horse legs asunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the countrey being full of trees, woods and forests, and the waies very narrow, not being able to passe by the fields, they were through wet with snow that fel vpon them: and when they came to their lodging, then it was worse; for there they were constrained to lye in soft and moist places. And therefore the soldiers had followed but few daies after this battell, but they refused to go any farther. And first they sent their Colonels and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue off this iourney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in troupes, and in the night time began to murmure and groine in their tents (which is a certaine signe and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a mind to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus vsed all gentle persuasions to win them with patience to abide this iourney, at the least, till time they might take the city of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there destroy the worke and memory of the greatest enemy that euer the ROMAINES had in the world, meaning Hannibal. But when he saw all this would not preuaile, he brought them back againe, & passed ouer mount Taurus another way, and came downe into the country called MYGDONIA, a very hot and fertile soile, where there is a great city, and maruellously repleniſhed with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH of MYGDONIA. In that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes owne brother: but for experience in engines of battery, and for sufficiencie and skill in such matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so maruellously troubled Lucullus before at the siege of the city of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this city besieged the same by al such meanes as might enforce it, & that so valiantly, that in very short time he tooke it by assault. And as for Gouras, who submitted himselfe to Lucullus mercy, he was very curteously intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him speake, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would saue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but himselfe onely. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gyues to receiue the punishment he had iustly deserued, for setting the city of AMISVS on fire, and taking from him the meane to shew the GRECIANS his goodnes, affection & liberality towards them. Vntill this present time, it might be truly said, that good fortune euer fauoured & followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affaires: but from that time forwards, it was quickly seene that the fauourable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great paine, and all that he did, fell out contrary vnto him, and to very ill purpose. Indeed he did euer shew the valiancie, patience, & great courage that should be in a valiant Generall, or Lieutenant of an army. But his exploits and doings had neuer after, that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue lost all that he had won before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the bralles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose. But the worst was, that they made himselfe the onely author of all these euils: because he could not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his souldiers: thinking that whatsoeuer a Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to dishonour himselfe, and to giue cause vnto his souldiers to despise his authority. But that which made most against him was this: that he gaue no estimation to gentlemen, and men of like quality to himselfe, but disdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faults and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted no vertues, nor generall gifts and good conditions that could be possibly wished for or desired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wise and discreete, as well in matters of gouernement, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encourage his souldiers in warre. Salust writeth of him, that his souldiers began to mislike with him, euen from the first entrie into these warres, because he made them lie out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of Cizicvs, & the other before the city of Amisvs. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them: for either they lay in their enemies countrey, or else if they lay in their friends, yet he made them campe abroad in the field, and shrowd themselues in their tents: for Lucullus neuer entred with his army into any city or confederate towne of Greece. Now if the souldiers of themselues misliked Lucullus, the Oratours at Rome that were his enemies, and enuied his prosperity and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they continually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out his war in length, purposely because he would alwaies haue occasion to rule, and means to get, hauing in his hands in maner all Cilicia, Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontvs, Armenia, and all the prouinces and regions as farre as to the riuer of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sacke and spoile, and not to destroy and ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors that spake these words. It was he also that most moued the people to take order that Lucullus should be called home, and other sent to succeed him in the charge and gouernment of the countries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane it was also ordained, that diuers which were vnder his charge, should be dispenced withall for their oathes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But besides these & such like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other euils being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licencious, and a harebrained man. He was Lucullus wiues brother, and she was so light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in Lucullus camp, caried not that estimation and credit he thought himselfe worthy of. For he tooke himselfe equall with the best, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when indeed there were many of far better desert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he began for spite to suborne the band called Fimbrians, and to stirre them vp against Lucullus, sowing sweet and pleasant words amongst the soldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consull Flaccus, and chuse him in his stead for their Captaine. By reason wherof they gaue good eare to Clodius words, and called him a noble captaine, and a louer of souldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should neuer see an end of their great paines and warres, but should miserably consume their daies in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and sometime with another: and that they wandred through all the countries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of so long and painefull seruice, seruing onely to guard Lucullus carts & cammels loden with plate and vessels of gold and siluer, and other precious stones. Where the souldiers that had serued vnder Pompey, took now their ease at home in their country with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire cities, as rich burgesses and wealthy citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into desert places vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of Asia, but only made a little warre in Spaine against those that were banished, and in Italie against fugitiue slaues. Shall we then, said he, carie harnesse on our backes all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntill this present, reserue our selues, our bodies and liues for that noble Captaine, who esteemeth the greatest honour and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his soldiers rich that serue vnder him? Lucullus army was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against Tigranes, Publius Clodius stirred vp the souldiers against Lucullus.

Tigranes, nor againſt Mithridates: who went preſently out of ARMENIA into his realme of PONTVS, and began to conquer it again, whileſt the ROMAINE ſouldiers mutining againſt their Generall, remained idle in the prouince of GORDIÆNA, excuſing themſelues by the winter ſeaſon, and tarying vntill Pompey or ſome other captaine ſhould quickly come to raiſe the ſiege, and ſucceed Lucullus. Notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtood that Mithridates had ouerthrowne Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went againſt Sornatius and Triarius: they were then aſhamed of themſelues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neare, made haſt to win the victory, as if it had bin cocksure before Lucullus came, and was himſelf ouerthrowne in a great battell, where ſome ſay there died aboue ſeuen thouſand ROMAINES, amongſt the which were a hundred and fiftie Centurions, and 24 Captaines or Colonels of a thouſand men apeece, and yet beſides, Mithridates took their campe alſo. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the ſouldiers ſought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proued ſundry meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once ſtirre abroad, becauſe he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereupon he determined againe to go againſt Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioyned forces together. But as he was in his iourney towards him, the FIMBRIAN bands began to rebell anew, and would not follow his enſignes, ſaying, and alledging for themſelues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to depart, and were diſcharged from their oath: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to command them, conſidering that the gouernement of the prouinces which he had, was giuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiuing this, did ſo humble himſelfe vnto them, ſuppoſing that way to win them, as there was no kind of vncomely humility, but he ſubmitted himſelfe vnto it: inſomuch as he went into their tents to pray and intreate them one after another, with water in his eyes, & with ſo great lowlineſſe, as euen to ſhake hands with them. But they fiercely reiected all his courteſies and faire intreaties, caſting their pennileſſe purſes before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, ſince he had with the ſpoile of them all ſo well enriched himſelfe alone. Neuertheleſſe, at the interceſſion and earneſt requeſt of the other ſouldiers, theſe FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promiſe, that they would yet tary all that ſommer, ſo that if no man in the meane time offered them battell, at the end of the terme they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or elſe to remaine alone, and conſequently to forſake the countrey of the barbarous people. With much ado thus he kept them together, but in ſuch ſort, as he durſt no more venture to compell them to come to battell, contenting himſelfe that they were willing onely to ſtay with him, being forced to ſuffer Tigranes in the meane time to deſtroy and ouerrunne the countrey of CAPPADOCIA, & Mithridates alſo to brag again, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: inſomuch as there came commiſſioners and deputies from ROME by his owne procurement, to order the ſtate of the Realme of PONTVS with him, as of a kingdome alreadie won to the ROMAINE Empire. But when they were come, they found him not maſter of himſelfe, and that his owne ſouldiers flouted him, and did him all the ſpite and iniury they could. For they were ſo vnruly towards their Captaine, and did ſo much diſdaine him, that when the end of the ſommer was come, they armed themſelues with armour and weapon, and drawing out their ſwords in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the field: and after they had made the noiſe and cries accuſtomed when they ioyned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling & ſwinging their ſwords in their aire, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promiſed Lucullus to tarrie. On the other ſide, Pompey had written vnto the other ſouldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauour at ROME, the practiſes and flatteries of the common counſellers there, he was ſubſtituted Generall in Lucullus place: which much miſliked the Senate and Nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a ſucceſſor ſent, not to ſucceed him in troubles and dangers, but in glory and honor of triumph. And that they ſhould compell him not onely to reſigne vp the office of a General to another, but (for the good ſeruice he long time had done) the reward of his honor due for the ſame: & this alſo more miſliked thē that were then about him. That ſo ſoone as Pompey was arriued in ASIA, he tooke all power and authority from Lucullus, to puniſh or reward any man for good or il ſeruice done to the cōmonwealth in thoſe warres; and did moreouer prohibite by publike billes ſet vp in euery common place, that they ſhould no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten Commiſſioners ſent to diſpoſe of the ſtate of the prouinces wonne by him, ſhould commaund or ordaine: and becauſe Pompey came with a greater power and armie then his, he was in ſome feare of him. Their friends thought good neuertheleſſe they ſhould meete together: and ſo they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at the firſt meeting they ſaluted each other very courteouſly, reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, becauſe he had bene Generall of the ROMAINE people in many warres, and had already triumphed twiſe. The bundels of roddes which the Sergeãts caried before them, were wreathed about with Laurell branches for the victories they had both atchieued: but Pompeys bundels were withered away, becauſe they had come a long iourney through hot and drie countries. Lucullus officers ſeeing theirs withered, courteouſly gaue them of theirs freſh and new gathered: which Pompeyes friends tooke for a ſigne of good lucke. For to ſay truly, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cauſe of the honour that Pompey afterwards wan. Howbeit in the end, for al their talk, they were no whit the better friends: but departed the one from the other more ſtrange then they met. For Pompey by a plaine Edict, brak, reuoked & diſanulled all Lucullus ordinances, and taking from him all his other ſouldiers, left him but onely ſixteene hundred to accompanie his triumph, and yet they followed him with vnwilling minds: ſuch was Lucullus imperfection and maime, either by nature or frowardneſſe of fortune, that he lacked the chiefeſt thing a Generall ſhould haue, which was, to be beloued of his ſouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongſt many other his excellent vertues, magnanimity and wiſdome, iudgement and iuſtice, the riuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermoſt confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA ſide, but it had extended as far as the ſea Hyrcane, yea euen vnto the vtmoſt part of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lie beyond that, ſauing the country of PARTHIA, which then was not ſo great nor ſtrong, as it appeared afterwards in Craſſus time: nor ſo ioyned and knit together, but (what through ciuill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and forraine warres of their neighbours abroad) was ſo weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themſelues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their skins. But to take things rightly as they be indeed, me thinkes that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his country by other, then he did benefit the ſame by himſelfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wan in ARMENIA ſo neare vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS, which he had ſacked & ſpoyled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe alſo of Tigranes, which was ſhewed in triumph as a priſoner with the reſt: moued Craſſus with ſuch a maruellous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if al the barbarous people had bene nothing but an aſſured ſpoile, and a prey expoſed vnto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus farre otherwiſe finding himſelfe gauled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not ſo much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſedome and valiantneſſe. But that ſhall be ſeene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marcus accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of Treaſurer in Syllaes time, and by his commandement, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the Iudges. But Memmius of ſpite turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring vp the people againſt him, and letting them vnderſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treaſure, which ſhould haue come to the common-wealth; and that to worke his feate the better, he had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them flatly to denie him the honour of his triumph. And truly Lucullus was in great danger to haue loſt it vtterly, but that the Noblemen of the city, and they that were of greateſt authority, intermedled themſelues with the tribes when they came to paſſe it by voices of the people; whom they intreated ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much ado, the people ſuffered him to enter the city in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entrie, not terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhew or ſight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For he cauſed the ſhew-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefly with armour and weapons of the enemies to a maruellous number: and with the kings engines & inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhew, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, ten carts of warre armed with sythes that passed by, and threescore of the chiefest friends and Captaines of the two Kings that were led prisoners through the citie. And there were also drawne after them, an hundred and ten gallies al armed in the prores with strong spurres of copper, and a statue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, sixe foot high, with a rich target set with precious stones. Besides all that, there were twenty cupbords as full of siluer plate as could be, and thirty cupbords full also of golden vessell, armour and coine of gold, caried vpon mens shoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beds, and sixe and fiftie other mules that carried siluer bullion, and a hundred and seuen other mules that caried siluer coine, amounting to the summe of two hundred threescore and ten thousand Sestertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of account caried also, wherein were particularly written the summes of money which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre against pirats on the sea, and vnto the treasurers & high treasurers, to put into the sparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwards in an article by it selfe, that he had giuen nine hundred and fiftie Drachmaes to euery souldier by the polle. After the shew of this triumph was ended, he made a generall feast, in the which he feasted all the city and villages therabouts, which the ROMAINES call Vicos. And afterwards forsook his wife Clodia for her vnchast and wanton life, and maried Seruilia, Catoes sister: howbeit he wan nothing by the exchange; for he sped as euill with the second as he did with the first. For, sauing that she was not slandered with the incest of her owne brethren, otherwise she was as dishoneste and vnchaste as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers sake, but at the length grew wearie of her, & put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filld the Senate with a maruellous hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withstand Pompeys tyrannie, and to vphold and maintaine the authority of the nobility and Senate against the people, for that by his noble deeds he had atchieued so great fame and reputation) he suddenly gaue ouer al dealings in the affaires of the common wealth: either because he saw it so best, being a hard thing now to keepe it from ruine: or else (as other said) for that he felt himselfe sufficiently furnished with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to liue quietly al at his ease, after so great paines, trauels and troubles, the end whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And surely some were of his mind, and liked this great change of his maruellous well, because he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill successe and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMBRES, & after his valiant acts in warres which had won him great honor, yet would he not so leaue off, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnsatiable mind, and ambitious desire to rule and beare sway, (being withall a very old man) went and sorted himselfe amongst yong men desirous of gouernment, who brought him not onely to commit many outrages, but made himselfe also to suffer greater cruelties. It is thought also that Cicero had ended his aged course more happily, if after he had quenched Catilines conspiracie, he had then taken his ease. And so had Scipio in like case, if when he had ioyned NVMANTIA vnto CARTHAGE, he would then haue quieted himselfe. And therefore, some say, that there is a certaine reuolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wise mā should meddle any more with the affaires of the commonwealth: no more then a man whose youth and strength is gone and decayed, is any more fit to iust, wrastle, or enter into such exercises of the body. But contrarily, Crassus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, because he gaue himself so much to pleasure and pastime: as if to liue pleasantly and delicately did not worse become his age, then to command an army, or to gouerne the affaires of a commonweale. And for my part, reading Lucullus life, me thinks that I reade an ancient Comedie, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you find notable exploits, done by him in wars, and great good gouernment also in peace: but in the end they all turned into feasts & banquets, and lacking litle of maskes & mummeries, dancing with torches, and all other such delighs fit for yong men. For I bring within the compasse and reckening of his fineneſſe and pleasures, his sumptuous buildings, his stately walks and galleries, his hot-houses and stoues, his tables and pictures, his statues also, and the great workmanship and curiosity he had besides of all other arts by him gotten together out of all parts, to his infinite charge: abusing therein the world of goods and treasure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwise. Insomuch, that notwithstanding excesse and superfluity hath euer since increased vntill this present time, yet they reken the gardens Lucullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors haue. And therfore Tubero the Stoicke Philosopher, hauing seene these stately workes which Lucullus had caused to be made neare vnto NAPLES, by the sea side (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vaults) and great ditches cast by force, to make the sea passe and run through his houses, to keepe fish therein; and lodgings also that he built in the sea it selfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gowneman, as if he would haue said, Xerxes the ROMAINE. For euen so did Xerxes in old time cause the mountaine Atho to be cut in sunder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his ships through. He had also many other pleasant places within the territories of ROME neare vnto THVSCVLVM, where there were great large halles set vpon tarrasses to see round about far off in the day time. And Pompey going thither sometime to see him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruellous faire sommer house, but not to be dwelt in in the winter season. Lucullus laughing, answered him: Do ye thinke me to haue lesse wit and reason then Storkes or Cranes, that I cannot shift houses according to the season? And another time there was a Prætor of ROME, that making playes to shew the people pastime, sent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set foorth his players: Lucullus made him answer, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demanding of him how many he should neede; the other answered, that a hundred would serue his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therfore the Poet Horace writing this story, addeth to a notable exclamation against superfluity, saying: that men think that a poore house where there is no more riches then necessary, and where there is not more then appeareth in sight, and that the master knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinary seruice at his boord, not onely in that his beds whereon he fed, were couered with rich carpets of purple, and himselfe serued in gold and siluer vessell set with precious stones; and that there was dancing, musicke, playes, and other such like pastimes ordinary: but also for that he was continually serued with all sorts of fine dainty dishes, with works of pastry, banquetting dishes, and fruit curiously wrought and prepared, which onely made him to be wondred at of men of simple vnderstanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey maruellously esteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Phisitian had willed him to eate of a Thrush. For when his seruants told him, they were hard to come by in sommer, but at Lucullus house, where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wise they should aske any of him, but said vnto his Phisitian: What, if Lucullus were not giuen to pleasure, could not Pompey liue? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend & kinsman both, & yet he so much misliked his maner of liuing & ordinary expence, that one day a yong man making a long and tedious oration in open Senate (out of time, & to no purpose) touching meane diet, sobriety, and temperance of life; Cato could no longer abide him, but rose vp, and said vnto him: What, wilt thou not leaue babling to vs al day; thou that art rich as Crassus, that liuest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: neuertheless it is certaine, by the noble sayings they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not onely delight to liue so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feasted certain GRECIANS many daies together in his house, that were come out of GREECE to ROME: and that they being men brought vp with the sobriety and simplicity of GREECE, after they had bene feasted there diuers times, were ashamed, and refused to go thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made thē this great cheare for their owne sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: My Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that; indeede I must needes graunt that there is somewhat more then ordinary to welcome you withall; but I tell you truly, the most part is for Lucullus sake. Another time when he supped all alone, and his men had laid but one boord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward, to know why he was so serued: the steward answered him: My lord, because I saw you send for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What said he againe, knewest not thou that Lucullus should sup to night with himselfe? In fine, Lucullus fare was so well knowne through ROME, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble housekeeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place seeing him at leysure: for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey (though there was some iarre betweene them for matters of warres) did not let for all that to

to come vnto him, and to ſpeake gently one to another. And Cicero after he had ſaluted him, aſked him if he would be contented they ſhould come and ſee him. Oh, ſaid he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, ſaid Cicero, Pompey and I will come and ſuppe with you to night, with condition that you prouide no more then your ordinarie: Lucullus told them againe, they ſhould then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor ſuffer him to ſpeake with his men, for feare he ſhould command them to prouide ſomewhat more then for himſelfe. Neuertheleſſe, at his deſire they ſuffered him onely in their preſence alowd to tell one of his men, that he would ſup that night in Apollo: (for ſo was one of the moſt ſtately and ſumptuous halles of his houſe called) and with that word onely he finely deceiued them both, and they neuer found him. For euery hall had his certaine ſumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery ſupper they made in them, and the ordinarie furniture and ſeruice for the ſame. So that when his ſeruants had their watch-word but in what hall he would ſup, they knew ſtraight what charge he would be at for his ſupper, & what orders ſhould be obſerued therein. Now Lucullus maner was to ſpend when he made any feaſt in the hall of Apollo, fiftie thouſand pence, and that ſelfe day the ſupper was prepared according to that value: inſomuch as Pompey maruelled how it could be poſſible that a ſupper of ſo exceeding great charge could be ſo ſuddenly prepared. In ſuch things therefore did Lucullus lauiſhly and riotouſly ſpend his goods, like ſpoiles indeed gotten of ſlaues and barbarous people. But that eſpecially which he beſtowed vpon books, was a very commendable and honeſt expence. For he had gathered together a great number of notable hiſtories, the vſe whereof was more honour vnto him, then the hauing of them. For his librarie was euer open to all comers, & they ſuffered the Grecians to come into his goodly tarraſſes & faire walkes, or other pleaſant places thereabouts conuenient to ſit and reaſon together, and neuer ſhut doore againſt them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes ſpent the whole day in conference together, as in the houſe of the Muſes; being very glad when other matters were diſpatched, they had ſo much leiſure as but to go thither. And Lucullus ſelfe would alſo manie times be amongſt them, in thoſe taraſſes and pleaſant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to diſpatch them that had any buſineſſe with him, and granted the thing they requeſted of him. To conclude, his houſe was a common receipt for all them that came from Greece to Rome. He loued all manner of Philoſophie, & refuſed no ſect of the ſame. But from his youth vpward, he euer loued and eſteemed beſt the Academicke ſect, not that which they call the new Academicke (although it flouriſhed at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made ſuch eſtimatiō of) but the old Academicke, which the Philoſopher Antiochus of the city of Ascalon did defend & maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rhetoritian and well ſpoken, whom Lucullus ſought to winne by all meanes, to make him his friend, and to haue him in houſe with him: becauſe he might inuey againſt Philoes hearers and followers, whoſe ſcholer Cicero among the reſt was, that wrote a notable booke againſt this old Academicke ſect. And in the ſame he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Academickes: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend ſomething, and called that Catalepſin: but Cicero defended the contrarie. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearſed before) very good friends, and had both one ſelfe deſire for gouernement in the commonwealth. For Lucullus did not ſo withdraw himſelfe from matters of ſtate, that he would no more meddle at all, nor heare ſpeake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition and contention, as a thing of no ſmall danger, and breeding great reproch and diſhonour to Marcus Craſſus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And theſe two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raiſed vp to withſtand Pompeyes greatneſſe, being afraid of him, after that Lucullus had refuſed the chiefe place of authority. But otherwiſe, Lucullus would be in the market place at courts and common councels, to pleaſure his friends when they requeſted him: and would goe to the Senate alſo, when there was occaſion to breake any new practiſe, or to ouerthrow Pompeys ambitious policie. For he ouerthrew all the orders and conſtitutions that Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kings Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the helpe of Cato hindered a diſtribution of money which Pompey had written for to Rome, to be beſtowed amongſt his ſouldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in friendſhip (or to ſpeake more plainely, in conſpiracie (with Craſſus and Cæſar, by whoſe helpe and aſſiſtance, he filled Rome with armes and ſouldiers: and made the people by force to paſſe and confirme what he would haue done, after he had violently expulsed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place. Whereat the noble men were much offended, and misliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus and Cato, Pompeyes followers suborned a *BRVTIAN, and said he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the said BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine: but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, saying that he had hired him to kill Pompey. But no man beleeued him: for they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was procured by themselues falsely to accuse Lucullus, and Pompeys other aduersaries. And this was proued more plainely within few daies after, when they threw the body of this BRVTIAN dead in the middest of the streete, out of the prison: who they said died of himselfe with sickenesse. Howbeit the markes being plainly seene of the halter wherwith they had strangled him, and the stripes appearing also which they had giuen him, did plainely shew that they themselues did it, whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they slew in this manner. This was the cause why Lucullus did more then before absent himselfe from meeting in publicke causes: but after, when he saw that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes also to conuey Cato far inough off, vnder pretenced colour to send him with charge into the Ile of CYPRVS: then he gaue vp altogether. Some write that a litle before his death, he was not perfit in his wits, decaying through age by litle and litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos saith, that it was not for age nor sickenesse that his wits did alter, but through poyson which one of his slaues had giuen him, whom he had made free, called Callisthenes: who gaue it him, not of any euill intent, but because his master should loue him the more, supposing that this poyson had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits so much with this poyson, that Lucullus while he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouersee his goods. Notwithstanding this, when he was dead, he was as much bewailed and lamented of all the people, as if he had died in his best credite, and greatest prosperity. For all the people ran to honor his funerals, and his body was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people would in any case haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But because no man thought of it before, and also for that things necessarie were not easily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus besought the people they would be content his funerals might be at a towne of his owne, neare vnto the city of THVSCVLVM, where his tombe was prepared, and he himselfe liued not long time after.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

NOthing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happie, then to die when he did, before he ſaw the change and alteration of the common-weale, which the fatall deſtinies plagued the ROMAINES withall, with ſedition and ciuill warres: and that he died in his countrey yet enioying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that (aboue all other things) he was likeſt vnto Cimon: who died whileſt the GRECIANS were in good loue and peace with other, and not in broile of diſcord and ciuill warres. Indeed Cimon died in his campe, being Generall of his countrey, at the ſiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS; not withdrawne to his home, as one wearied, liuing idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feaſts and banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: but as Plato ſaid, (when he wiſely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiſeth perpetuall drunkenneſſe in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And truly it is a great comfort and contentation of minde, for an old man feebled with age, and compelled by weakneſſe, to withdraw himſelfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernment in peace, as in warres: and quietly to paſſe his time in ſtudie, where delight is ioyned with honeſt contemplations. But to finiſh his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleaſure, as vnto their onely end, and moreouer, to grow old by pleaſure and vanity, ſolemnizing Venus feaſt all the reſt of his life, after he had made ſuch warres, and commanded ſuch armies: that me thinkes a thing vnworthie of an honeſt ACADEMICKE, and altogether vnmeete for one profeſſing old Xenocrates doctrine, but ſit rather for a man giuen ouer altogether to Epicurus diſcipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be conſidered of in theſe two men, that the ones youth was altogether vicious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrarie, honeſt and vertuous. But he is the better that changeth for the better: and that nature is alwaies more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time ſheweth ſtill the contrarie. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one ſelfe meane: but they did not both alike vſe their riches. For it were to no purpoſe to compare the buildings of the wall that ſtandeth South within the caſtell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither, with the fine built chambers, and high raiſed turrets to gaze afarre, and enuironed about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the ſpoyles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table alſo of moderate fare and diet, but yet open to euery man, comparable to Lucullus boord, which was ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and ſhewed the greatneſſe of his Lord. For Cimons boord fed many mouthes dayly with a ſmall charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feede a few, with ſuperfluous dainties. Vnleſſe they will ſay, that time caused this difference betweene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leisure to haue withdrawne himselfe to quiet in age from gouernement and armes, he also would not haue led a more sumptuous and dissolute life, giuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banquets, and playes, and was also giuen to women, as we haue told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate successe of things doe bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises, that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus died abroad in the warres, whilest he commanded armies, there had not bene that liuing man, how curious soeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faults, that could haue detected him of any reprochfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land. And like as in games of prise and exercises of body which are shewed in GREECE, they that in one selfe day winne the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a strange custome, not conquerours onely, but victours also, to honour them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon in like case hauing in one selfe day crowned GREECE with two notable markes of triumph, for two battels he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by land, deserueth to haue some place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus receiued the authority to command, of his countrey and commonwealth: but Cimon gaue his countrey both authority and ability to command. Lucullus found his countrey a commanding people to all their friends and confederates: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his countrey marching vnder anothers ensigne, and through his valiantnesse did so behaue himselfe, that he made his city goe before her confederates, and triumph ouer her enemies: compelling the PERSIANS by force to giue them the rule by sea, and perswading the LACEDÆMONIANS willingly to giue place vnto them by land. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make himselfe to be beloued of his souldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, and Cimon esteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates themselues. For Lucullus was forsaken of his owne men: and Cimon was followed by very strangers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his countrey, forsaken of those he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe, commanding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his countrey three notable things, and hard for them to haue compassed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, giuen them authority and rule ouer their confederates, and ioyned friendship with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vndertooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA: but neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the sudden being Generall, and when his affaires prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be said also, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his countrey for the space often yeares, because that in ten yeares space (as Plato saith) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truly, it seldome times happeneth, that the graue wits of noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people: because they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awrie, do grieue them as much, as surgeons do their patients when they bind vp their sores with bands to cure them. For though by that binding they restore and bring to their naturall places againe the broken bones and members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus went a great deale farther with his army, then euer Cimon did. For he was the first ROMAINE captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, & the riuer of Tigris with an army. He tooke and burnt almost in the sight of both the kings, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE and NICIBIS. Towards the North, he went as farre as the riuer of Phasis: towards the East, into MEDIA and Southward, euen to the red sea, and vnto the Realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the ROMAINE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowne all the power of these two mighty kings, he tooke from them all, but their persons onely: who fled and hid themselues like wild beastes, in infinite deserts and vnpassable forrests. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt

Cimons two victories obtained in one day.

Great difference betwixt Cimon and Lucullus.

Graue Magistrates resembled by similitude vnto good surgeons.

betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRECIANS, and ouerthrew the greateſt part of their army in ÆGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding himſelfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battels: durſt neuer once onely ſhew his army vnto Pompey, out of the ſtrength of his campe, but fled into the Realme of BOSPHORVS, where he died. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himſelfe on his knees, vnarmed and without weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diademe off from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering him for the victories he had wonne, but for thoſe which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reaſon whereof he ſcaped good cheape, and thought himſelfe happie, when Pompey gaue him onely the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthy Captaine, and ſtouteſt champion, that leaueth his enemy in weake eſtate for him that followeth, and ſhall fight afterwards with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of PERSIA ouer harried, the pride and fierceneſſe of the PERSIANS layed aground, by many great battels they had loſt before vnto Themiſtocles, king Pauſanias, and Leotychides, who had ouerthrowne them: and going now againe to fight afreſh with them, it was an eaſie thing to ouercome the bodies of thoſe, whoſe hearts were already vanquiſhed. Where Lucullus to the contrary, aſſailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene ouercome, but bare a maruellous loftie mind with him, for the many great battels and conqueſts he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no compariſon betweene thoſe that Cimon ouerthrew, and thoſe that were ranged in battell againſt Lucullus. So that all things weighed and conſidered, it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthieſt man: for that it ſeemeth, that the gods did fauour both the one and the other, telling the one what he ſhould doe, and the other what he ſhould not doe. And thus it appeareth by teſtimony of the gods, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlaſting glory.

THE LIFE OF Nicias.

The praise of Thucydides.

I Haue reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Crassus, and the euents that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that befell the other in SICILE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to reade my writings, not to thinke me in entermedling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond himselfe, both for variety and liuelinesse of narration, as also in choice and excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the historiographer had. Who, hoping by the grauitie and life of his words and reports, to darken the glory of Thucydides, and make Philistus (in comparison of himselfe) appeare ignorant, and without any grace of historicall narration: hath in his history of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battels by sea and by land, and the report of those speeches and narrations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neare them whom he contends to passe, as doth the footeman to the LYDIAN coach, as saith Pindarus: and besides sheweth himselfe fond and of small iudgement, or as Diphilus saith:

Timæus follies.

A lubber laden with Sicilian grease.

And in diuers places he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he saith, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whose name was deriued of this word Nice, signifying victory) dissuaded their attempts against SICILE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to say, the images of Mercury) it was foreshewed that they should receive great ouerthrowes by the Generall of the SYRACVSANS, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did fauour the SYRACVSANS, by reason of the goddesse Proserpina (protector and defendor of the city of SYRACVSA) to requite her for that she gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, because they tooke the ÆGESTÆANS parts (who came of the TROIANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promise and faith with him, whose citie himselfe had ouerthrowne in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus shewes as much wit and iudgement, in deliuering vs such toyes in an history, as he doth in correcting the style of Philistus, or in condemning and railing on Plato and Aristotle. But in my fancie, this ambition and contention to write or to speake more clearely then others, sheweth alwaies a base enuious mind, like a scholler full of schoole points.

Timæus reproueth Plato and Aristotle.

But

But when it striueth with things that for their excellencie are past imitation, then is it extreme folly and madnesse. Since therefore I may not passe ouer nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philistus haue already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the varietie of his successes and fortune did couer: I must lightly touch them, and report so much as is necessary and conuenient, lest men condemne me for sloath and negligence. And in the rest I haue endeauoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and knowne, which I haue collected as well out of sundry mens workes and ancient records, as out of many old antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will serue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be sayd that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous citizens of Athens, very honest men, and which fauoured the communaltie with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the sonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the sonne of Milesius, and Theramines the sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account: for he is flouted as a forreiner borne in the Ile of Ceos, and challenged besides for inconstant and irresolute in matters of state and gouernment: and inclining sometimes to one faction, sometimes to another: he was called Cothurnus, a kind of buskin indifferently seruing for both legges, and in old time was vsed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in fauour of the nobility against Pericles, who alwaies tooke part with the inferiour sort. Nicias that was the yonger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioyned captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himself alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobility raised him to great authority, to be as a strong bulwarke for them, against Cleons insolencie and boldnesse: and withall he had the loue of the people to aduance and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did so flatter and dandle them, like an old man, still feeding their humor with gaine: but yet they themselues whom he thus flattered, knowing his extreme couetousnes, impudency and boldnesse, preferred Nicias before him, because his grauity was not seuere nor odious, but mingled with a kind of modesty, that he seemed to feare the presence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and esteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearfull and mistrustfull nature & disposition, in wars he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauored him alike in all his iourneys & exploits that he took in hand where he was captaine. Now being much afraid of accusers, this timorous maner of his proceeding in the citie, was found to be popular, whereby he wan him the goodwill of the people: and by meanes thereof rose dayly more and more, because the people commonly feare those that hate them, and aduance them that feare them. For the greatest honor nobility can do to the communaltie, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole state and cõmonwealth of Athens, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to win their fauour and goodwils: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth inough, sought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Cleon would entertaine the Athenians with pleasant toyes and deuices and could feed the peoples humour that way: Nicias finding himselfe no fit man to worke by such encounter, crept into the peoples fauour with liberalitie, with charges of common playes, and with such like sumptuousnesse, exceeding in cost and pleasant sports, not onely all those that had bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his consecrating vnto the gods, as the image of Pallas in the castel of Athens, the gilt being worne off: and the chappell which is vnder the festiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe price in Bacchus dances, & neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, there goeth a report, that at certaine playes, whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth vpon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: and being a goodly tall young man, without any haire on his face, the Athenians tooke such pleasure to see him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithall Nicias stood vp, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, that openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young slaue a free man. Men write also of certaine sumptuous and deuout acts he did in the Ile of Delos, where the dancers and singers which the cities of Greece sent thither to sing rimes and verses in the honour of Apollo, were wont before to arriue disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to see them, who made them sing straight without any order, and landing in haſte out of their ſhips, they left their apparell, and put on ſuch veſtments as they ſhould weare in proceſſion, and their garlands of flowers on their heads, all at one preſent time. But Nicias being commanded to go thither to preſent the ſingers of ATHENS, landed firſt in the Ile of RENIA, hard adioyning to the Ile of DELOS, with his ſingers, his beaſts for ſacrifice, and with all the reſt of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had cauſed to be made at ATHENS, vpon meaſure taken of the channell, betwixt the one and the other Ile, ſet out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with noſegayes and garlands of triumph, and with excellent wrought tapiſtrie, which in the night he ſet vp vpon the channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by breake of the day cauſed his ſingers to paſſe ouer vpon it, ſinging all the way as they went in his proceſſion ſo nobly ſet forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the ſacrifice, the feaſt, and games that were to be played were finiſhed, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought lands beſides that coſt him ten thouſand Drachmaes, which he conſecrated alſo vnto the god Patron of the Ile: and ordained, that the profits of the ſame ſhould be yearely beſtowed vpon the DELIANS, vpon an open ſacrifice and feaſt, in the which they ſhould pray to their god, for the health and proſperity of Nicias: and ſo cauſed it to be written and grauen vpon a pillar he left in DELOS, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offering, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by winds, it fell vpon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremonie and act of his, there was a maruellous pompe, and great ſhew of popular ambition: neuertheleſſe, he that ſhall conſider of his life and actions, may eaſily perſwade himſelfe that aboue all, he did it of very pure zeale and deuotion, and ſecondly, to giue pleaſure and paſtime to the people. For by Thucydides report of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly giuen to religion. We find written in one of the dialogues of Paſiphoon, that Nicias did ſacrifice dayly to the gods, and kept a ſoothſayer continually in his houſe, giuing out abroad, that it was to counſell with him what ſhould happen about the affaires of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquire of his owne buſineſſe, and ſpecially of his mines of ſiluer. For he had many great mines about LAVRION ſide, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great danger, and he was driuen continually to keepe a maruellous number of ſlaues at worke there. The moſt part of Nicias riches was in readie money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him, whom he gaue mony vnto: for he gaue as well vnto the wicked people that might do miſchiefe, as vnto them that deſerued reward, and were worthy of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was alſo a reuenew to the good: and hereof the comicall Poets do deliuer vs ancient teſtimonie. For Teleclides ſpeaking of a certaine informer, ſaid thus:

Nicias ſuperſtitious

Nicias mines of ſiluer.

Nicias for fear [illegible] to the wicked.

Caricles did refuſe to giue one Mina, for to ſtay
The bruiting of his ſecret birth, conueyed cloſe away:
But Nice, the ſonne of Nicerate, did willingly beſtow
A brace of Minas double told. And though I well do know
The cauſe of his ſo doing, yet I will not him bewray:
For why? the man is my good friend, and wiſe, I dare well ſay.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedie intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine ſimple man vpon the ſtage, doth aske him:

The informer:

How long is it ago ſince thou didſt ſpeake with Nicias?

The plaine man:

I ſaw him ſtanding euen right now vpon the market place.

The informer:

This man affirmes he ſaw him there. And wherefore ſhould he ſay
He ſaw him, but of ſome intent his lewdneſſe to bewray?
Now ſirs, ye ſee how Nicias here is taken in the trip,
For all his walking cloſe in clouds, to giue the priuie ſlip.

The Author:

O fooliſh folke, ſuppoſe ye that ſo good a man as he
In any fault or ſhamefull fact will tardie taken be?

And

And Cleon threatening in the comedie of Aristophanes, intituled the Knights, sayth these words:

The Orators if by the throte I take,
Then sure I am, that Nicias straight will quake.

Phrynicus selfe telleth vs also glaunsingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frayed, when he sayd, speaking of another man:

A good stout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward, like to Nicias.

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to giue any litle occasion to the Orators to accuse him, kept himselfe so warily, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with any man in the citie, nor yet put forth himselfe in companie to talke, or passe the time amongst them, but altogether auoided such sports and pleasures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counsell-house, but still busied himselfe in dispatching causes, from morning till night, and was euer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of state in hand, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no accesse vnto him, but kept close in his house: and some of his friends did euer answer them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, saying, that he was busie then about affaires of the commonwealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, and had himselfe taught him both learning and musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnesse and grauity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they find certaine Poeticall words at this day: who being captaine of a certaine number of men that were sent to dwell in Italie, did build there the citie of Thvries. Hieron I say did serue his turne, and holpe him secretly to enquire what he would vnderstand of the Sooth sayers, and gaue out these words among the people: that Nicias led too miserable and painfull a life, for the ouergreat care he took to serue the commonwealth: insomuch, as though he were in his hot-house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his mind ran still of some matters about the commonwealth, and to serue the state did neglect his owne priuate affaires: so that he scant began to sleepe and take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growne crabbed and vncourteous, euen to such as before had bene his familiar friends: so that, sayd he, he loseth them together with his goods, and all for seruice of the commonwealth; where others grow rich, and win friends, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make merry among them, and sport with the matters of state which they had in their hands. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truly say that which Agamemnon spake of himselfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Ephigenie in Avlide.

Nicias life.

In outward shew of stately pompe, all others I exceed,
And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very deed.

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in some things did serue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, & wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking their authoritie from them: as for proofe, the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon Rhamnvsian, and moreouer by that they did vnto Paches (that tooke the Ile of Lesbos) who being brought before the Iudges in open councell to giue vp an account of his charge, drew out his sword, and slue himselfe in presence of them all. Nicias, I say remembring these examples, sought euer to flie from those offices which were either too great or too small; and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniecture, prospered maruellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisdome, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himselfe to lessen his glory, and that onely to auoid enuie: as the euent of things falling out euen in his time do sufficiently witnesse vnto vs. For the citie of Athens hauing sustained many great losses and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a partie, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the Athenians were ouercome in Thracia by the Chalcidonians, howbeit it was vnder the leading of Calliades and Xenophon, who were their Captaines. Another time, the losse they had in Ætolia vnder the charge of Demosthenes. Moreouer, at Delivm, a citie of

Boeotia, where they loſt a thouſand men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being General there. And as touching the plague, the greateſt number laid the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reaſon of warres kept the men that came out of the countrey, within the wals of the citie of Athens: and ſo by changing of aire, and their wonted manner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all theſe great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burthened: but contrariwiſe he being Captaine, tooke the Ile of Cythera, which the Lacedæmonians inhabited, being an excellent place for ſituation to moleſt and deſtroy the countrey of Laconia. He wan diuers cities that had rebelled in Thracia, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of Athens. At his firſt coming, hauing ſhut in the Megarians within their wals, hee tooke the Ile of Minoa: and at his departure thence, ſhortly after wan the hauen of Nisea alſo. Furthermore, landing in the countrey of the Corinthians, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and ſlew a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chanced to forget to bury two of his men that were ſlaine, whoſe bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the reſt: howbeit, ſo ſoone as he heard of it, he cauſed all his fleet to ſtay, and ſent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away thoſe two bodies. Now, though by law of armes, they that ſent to aske leaue to take away their dead to bury them, did thereby loſe the honour of their victory, and were barred to ſet vp any marke or token of triumph, becauſe it ſeemed by the ſuite, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petitioners that made requeſt for them, which otherwiſe needed not to haue made demaund of them: Nicias notwithſtanding was contented rather to forſake the honour of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his countrimen in the field without buriall. So, after he had deſtroyed all the coaſt of Laconia, and had ouercome certaine Lacedæmonians that came againſt him in battel, he took the citie of Thyrea, which the Æginetes kept at that time, whom he brought priſoners vnto Athens. And when the Peloponnesians had prepared great armies both by ſea and by land to beſiege the fort of Pyle, the which Demoſthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being giuen by ſea, it chanced there remained foure hundred naturall citizens of Sparta within the Ile of Spacteria. Now the Athenians thought it a noble exploit of them (as indeed it was) to take thoſe foure hundred aliue: howbeit the ſiege was very ſore, becauſe they lacked water euen in the middeſt of ſommer, and were forced to fetch a maruellous compaſſe to bring victuals to their campe; which when winter ſhould be once come, would be very dangerous, and almoſt an impoſſible thing to do. Whereupon they then became ſory, and repented them much that they had ſent away the Ambaſſadors of the Lacedæmonians which came to them to treat of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) ſuffered them to depart in that ſort without reſolution taken: who was againſt them altogether onely to do Nicias deſpite, being his enemie, and did earneſtly ſollicite the matter the Lacedæmonians requeſted. This was the cauſe why Cleon perſwaded the Athenians, to refuſe their offer of peace. But when the people ſaw that this ſiege drew out in length, and that their campe ſuffered grieuous wants and neceſſities, then they fell out with Cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, ſaying, that through his feare he would let the beſieged Spartans eſcape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they ſhould not haue holden out ſo long. Thereupon the Athenians ſayd aloud to Cleon: And why doeſt not thou go thither then to take them? Moreouer Nicias ſelfe alſo riſing vp, openly gaue him his authority to take this Pyle, and bad him leauie as many ſouldiers as he would to go thither, and not to bragge with ſuch impudent words where was no danger, but to doe ſome notable ſeruice to the commonwealth. Cleon at the firſt ſhrunke backe, being amazed withall, little thinking they would haue taken him ſo ſuddenly at his word: but in the end, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias alſo was importunate with him, ambition ſo enflamed him, that he not only tooke the charge vpon him, but in a brauery ſayd, that within twentie dayes after his departure he would either put all the Spartans to the ſword, or bring them priſoners vnto Athens. The Athenians hearing Cleon ſay ſo, had more luſt to laugh a good, then to beleeue that he ſpake: for it was their manner euer to laugh at his anger and folly. For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being ſolemnly aſſembled in counſell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon wold ſay, and hauing taried long for him, at the length he came with a garland on his head, and prayed the aſſembly to diſmiſſe the court till the next morning: for (quoth he) I ſhall not be at leyſure to day, becauſe I haue ſacrificed, and do feaſt alſo certaine ſtrangers my friends that are come to ſee me. So the people burſt out in a laughing laughing, and brake vp the assembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauoured him at that time, and he handled himselfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, sauing such as were slaine: & hauing made them yeeld, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproach. For it appeared not onely a casting away of his shield, but worse then that, a voluntarie forsaking of his prouince vpon a base timorous mind, giuing his enemie occasion thereby to do some noble exploit, depriuing himselfe of his honourable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedie of birds, saying:

Cleons victory of the Lacedæmonians.

It is no time to sleepe and linger still,
As Nicias doth, without good cause or skill.

Also in another place of his comedie of plowmen, he saith:

I faine would follow husbandrie. Who lets thee? Marry you.
A thousand Drachmas I will giue to be discharged now
Of office in the common weale. Content so shall we haue
Two thousand Drachmas iust, with those which Nicias lately gaue.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the common wealth, suffering Cleon in that sort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that victorie, Cleon grew to so haughtie a mind and pride of himselfe, that he was not to be dealt withal: whereupon fell out the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the citie of ATHENS, which most grieued Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things tooke away the modestie and reuerence vsed before in publicke orations to the people: he of all other was the first that cried out in his orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, and flung vp and downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiousnesse, and contempt of honestie, the which all the Orators and counsellors fell into, that dealt in matters of state and commonwealth, and was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practise in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill, but as they say of the land of ÆGYPT, that for the fatnesse and lustinesse of the soile:

The immoderate libertie of Cleon.

Cleons lewd and light gestures in his orations.

It bringeth forth most wholesome herbes, and also noisome weeds:

Euen so Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause & beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was rid of Cleon, he could not yet bring the city of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnesse. For when the common wealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreame furie of ambition. And thus it beganne. The onely peace-breakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GREECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas: for warre cloked the wickednesse of the one, and aduanced the valiantnesse of the other, giuing to either occasion to do great mischiefe, and also opportunitie to worke many noble exploits. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by AMPHIPOLIS, Nicias straight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so hotly giuen to warres, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet, deuised what meanes he might vse to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GREECE also from broile and miserie of warre, that thenceforth they might altogether enioy a peaceable and happy life. The rich men, the old men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to peace: and talking priuately also with diuers others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of warre, Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they sought it, the SPARTANS beleeued him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very soft and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their prisoners of SPARTA (who had bene taken at the fort of Pyle) were gently intreated, and had made their miserable captiuitie more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betweene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one another againe, and beginning to taste the sweetnesse and pleasures of peace, and the safety of free accesse one to see anothers friends that were strangers, began then to wish that they might still continue in peace and amitie together, without effusion of bloud of either partie; and tooke great delight in their dances, to heare them sing such songs:

Alcibiades diuers wit.

Cleon and Brasidas, the two peace breakers generally of all Greece.

Nicias reconciliath the Spartans with the Athenians.

And let my speare be ouergrowne, with dustie spiders webs.

They did alſo with great ioy and gladneſſe remember him which ſayd, that in peace no ſound of trumpet, but the crowing of a cocke doth wake them that be aſleepe: and on the other ſide, they curſed and tooke on with them that ſaid it was predeſtined, the warre ſhould continue thriſe nine yeres. And ſo, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuerſal peace throughout all Greece. Now moſt men thought, that ſurely all their ſorrows and miſeries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, ſaying, that he was a man beloued of the gods, who for his deuotion towards them, had this ſpeciall gift giuen him, that the greateſt bleſſing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confeſſe a troth, euery man was certainly perſwaded, that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light cauſes perſwaded the Grecians to run headlong into moſt grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other ſide had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurts the one had receiued of the other in former warres. And euen to this preſent day that peace is called Nicium, as who would ſay, Nicias peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either ſide they ſhould alike deliuer vp the cities & lands, which each had taken from other in time of wars, together with the priſoners alſo: and that they ſhould firſt make reſtitution, whoſe lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophraſtus report) for readie money ſecretly bought the lot, that the Lacedæmonians might be the firſt that ſhould make reſtitution. And when the Corinthians and Boeotians that diſliked of this peace, ſought by the complaints they made, to renew the warre againe, Nicias then perſwaded both the Athenians, and Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould adde for ſtrength vnto their countrey, the alliance and peace offenſiue and defenſiue made betweene them, for a more ſure knot of friendſhip, whereby they might be the better aſſured the one of the other, and alſo the more dreadfull to their enemies that ſhould rebell againſt them. Theſe things went cleane againſt Alcibiades mind: who beſides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemie alſo vnto the Lacedæmonians, for that they ſought to Nicias, & made none account of him, but deſpiſed him. Here was the occaſion that cauſed Alcibiades to prooue from the beginning what he could do to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet ſhortly after, Alcibiades perceiuing that the Athenians liked not ſo well of the Lacedæmonians as they did before, and that they thought themſelues iniured by them, becauſe they had lately made league with the Boeotians without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of Panactvm & Amphipolis according to the conditions articled betweene them: began then to enlarge and aggrauate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with euery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambaſſadors from the city of Argos to come to Athens, and ſo handled ỹ matter, that the Athenians made league offenſiue and defenſiue with them. While theſe matters were thus in hand, there came to Athens alſo Ambaſſadors from Lacedæmon, with full power & authority to ſet all things at ſtay, and to compound all controuerſies: who hauing firſt ſpoken with the Senate, propounding things vnto them both very honeſt and reaſonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affraid that they letting the people vnderſtand ſo much, ſhould thereby bring them to yeeld to what they deſired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambaſſadours by this deuice. He promiſed vpon his oath to help them in that they went about, ſo far forth as they would not confeſſe themſelues to haue abſolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleeue it was the onely way to bring their matters to paſſe. The Ambaſſadours giuing credite to his words, relied vpon him, and ſo forſooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people, being ſet in counſell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accord all matters, yea, or no. Whereunto they make him anſwere with a loud voyce, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrary both to their expectation, and his owne oath and promiſe made vnto them, began to call the counſell to witneſſe, whether they did not in open Senate ſay the contrary, and ſo aduiſed the people not to truſt nor giue credit vnto ſuch men, as were openly taken with ſo manifeſt a lie, and that in one ſelf matter would one while ſay one thing, another while another. It boots not to aske whether the Ambaſſadours were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himſelfe wiſt not what to ſay to the matter, the ſuddenneſſe of the cauſe did ſo confuſe and grieue him, being a thing he leaſt looked for. Now the people they were ſo moued beſides, that they became indifferent whether to haue ſent for the Ambaſſadours of Argos preſently to haue made league with them, or not: but there fell out an earth-quake vpon this matter, that greatly ſerued Nicias turne and brake vp the aſſembly.

The people meeting againe in counſell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doe or ſay, could ſcant withhold them from making league with the ARGIVES: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the LACEDÆMONIANS, promiſing he would make all well againe. Therupon, Nicias going to SPARTA, was receiued and honoured there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the reſt, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercome by thoſe that fauoured the BOEOTIANS, returned againe to ATHENS as he departed thence: where he was not only ill welcomed home, and worſe eſteemed, but was alſo in danger of his perſon, through the fury of the people, that at his requeſt and counſell had deliuered ſuch men priſoners, and ſo great a number of them. For indeed, the priſoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the fort of Pyle, were all of the chiefeſt houſes of SPARTA, and their kinſmen and friends were the nobleſt men of the citie. Notwithſtanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, ſauing that they choſe Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the ELIANS, and MANTINEANS (which had reuolted from the LACEDÆMONIANS) and with the ARGIVES alſo: and ſent pirates to the fort of Pyle, to ſpoyle the countrey of LACONIA. Vpon theſe occaſions the ATHENIANS fell againe into wars. Now when the quarrell and controuerſie was greateſt betweene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Oſtraciſmon (tō wit, the baniſhment for a time) came in, by the which the people baniſhed for ten yeares any ſuch of their citizens as they thought either of too great authoritie, or that was moſt enuied for his wealth and ſubſtance. Alcibiades and Nicias, were then not a little perplexed, conſidering their preſent danger, being ſure that the one of them two ſhould not faile but be baniſhed by this next baniſhment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, and were afraid of his valiantneſſe: as we haue more amply declared in the deſcription of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied: beſides they miſliked his ſtrange manner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuerſant with the people then he was, and counted him too ſtately: moreouer they hated him alſo becauſe in many matters he had ſpoken directly againſt the thing the people deſired, and had enforced them againſt their wils to agree to that which was profitable for themſelues. In fine, to ſpeake more plainly, there fell out great ſtrife betweene the yong men that would haue warres, & the old men that coueted peace, ſome deſirous to baniſh Nicias, & ſome others Alcibiades: but

Where diſcord reignes in realme or towne,
The wicked win the chiefe renowne.

And ſo it fell out then. For the ATHENIANS being diuided in two factions, gaue authoritie to certaine of the moſt impudent & inſolent perſons that were in all the citie: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the town of PERITHVS, a man of no hauior nor value, why he ſhould be bold: but yet one that grew to ſome credit and power, diſhonouring his countrey by the honour they gaue him. How Hyperbolus thinking himſelfe free at that time from any danger of baniſhment, (hauing rather deſerued the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were baniſhed, he ſhould match him well inough that remained behind: ſhewed openly that he was glad of their diſcord & variance, and buſily ſtirred vp the people againſt thē both. Nicias & Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practiſes, hauing ſecretly talked together, ioyned both their factions in one: wherby they brought it ſo to paſſe, that neither of thē were baniſhed, but Hyperbolus ſelfe for ten years. Which matter for the preſent time made the people very mery, though afterwards it grieued them much, ſeeing their ordinance of the Oſtraciſmon blemiſhed by the vnworthines of the perſon: which puniſhment was an honor vnto him. For this baniſhment was thought a meet puniſhment for Thucydides, Ariſtides, and ſuch like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honour, and too manifeſt an occaſion of glorie to be giuen to him, that for his wickedneſſe had the ſelfe ſame puniſhment, which was to be inflicted vpon the chiefeſt eſtates for their greatneſſe. And the comicall Poet Plato himſelf ſaith in a place:

Hyperbolus

Nicias and Alcibiades ioyned tribes againſt Hyperbolus. Hyperbolus baniſhed for ten yeares.

Although his lewd behauiour deſeru'd as much and more,
Yet was not that the puniſhment he ſhould haue had therefore,
The Oſtracie deuiſed was for men of noble fame,
And not for varlets, whoſe lewd life deſerued open ſhame.

After this Hiperbolus, there was neuer man baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon. For himſelfe was the laſt, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, & neareſt kinſeman to the tyrant was the firſt. Sure, fortune is a very vncertaine thing, and without conceit of reaſon. For had Nicias frankly put himſelf to the hazard of this baniſhment againſt Alcibiades, one of theſe two things muſt needs haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victorie, his aduersarie being banished: or being conuict by his banishment, to haue scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the fame he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercome. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus writeth, how Hyperbolus not Nicias was banished through the dissention that fell betwixt Phæax and Alcibiades: albeit most writers agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadours of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being come to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA, Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft and ambition. For he, before they were called to counsell, had already through false surmizes filled the peoples heads with a vaine hope and perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, and the old men also in artificers shops, and in their compassed chaires, or halfe circles where they sate talking together, were euery one occupied about drawing the platforme of SICILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN sea, and reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that SICILE should be the end of their warres, but rather the store house and armorie for all their munition and martiall prouision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, euen to Hercules pillars. Now all their minds being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he found very few men of qualitie to stand by him. For the rich, fearing lest the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though indeed not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leaue still to counsell them to the contrary. But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of SICILE, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next session of the counsell holden in the citie, Nicias rose vp again, to see if he could turne the people from this iourney with all the protestations he could possibly make; burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and priuate commodities, he brought the common wealth into so farre and dangerous a warre. But all his words preuailed not. Himselfe before all others was thought the meetest man for this charge, partly, because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he wold handle their matters with greater safety, when his timorous foresight should be ioyned with Alcibiades valiantnesse, and with Lamachus softnesse, which indeed most confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demostratus one of the Oratours that most procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterprise stepped foorth, and said: It were good that Nicias left off and set aside all these excuses and deuices, and preferred a decree, that the people should throughly authorize the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswaded the people to passe & authorise it. Yet it is said that the Priests obiected many things to hinder the iourney. But Alcibiades also hauing suborned certaine Soothsayers alledged in like case some ancient Oracles that said the ATHENIANS should haue great honour from SICILE: and further had enticed certaine pilgrimes, who said they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence: That the Athenians should take all the Syracusans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, lest it should seeme they intermedled to prognosticate euill for affections sake, seeing that the signes themselues, which were most plaine and notorious, could not remoue them from the enterprise of this iourney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes and images of Mercurie, which in one night were all to be mangled, sauing one image onely called the Hermes of Andocides, which was giuen and consecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was set vp directly ouer against a citizens house called Andocides. Furthermore, the chance that happened by the altar of the twelue gods: where a man leaping suddenly vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his genitories with a stone. And in a temple also in the citie of DELPHES, where was a little image of Minerua of gold, set vpon a palme tree of copper, which the city of ATHENS had giuen of the spoiles won of the MEDES. Vpon that palm tree sate certaine crowes many daies together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the fruit of it, which was all of gold, vntil they made the same to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS said, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACVSANS had subdued) had finely fained this deuice. There was a prophecie also that commanded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nuns to ATHENS, that was in the citie of CLAZOMENES. So they sent for this Nun called Hesychia, which is, rest: and it seemeth it it was that which the goddes by this prophesie did counsell them vnto, that for that time they should be quiet. Meton the Astronomer hauing charge in the army leauied for the war of SICILE, being afraide of this prophesie, or otherwise misliking the celestiall signes and seruice of the iourney, fained himselfe mad, and set his house on fire. Others say he counterfeited not madnes, but did one night indeed set his house on fire, and that the next morning looking rufully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitiful state, to sue to the people, that in consideration of his great misfortune happned him, they would discharge his sonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gally at his own cost, and ready to make saile. Moreouer, the familiar spirit of wise Socrates that did vse to tel him before what should happen, told him then, that this iorney would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumor became cõmon. And this also troubled a number of them, for the vnlucky daies on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very daies on the which the women celebrating the feast and yeareday of Adonis deathand there were also in diuers parts of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that such as did put any confidence in those signes, said they misliked it much, and that they were afraid lest the same signified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was set out with such pompe and brauery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this warre in open counsell, whilest they were deliberating vpon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of so honourable a charge to make him change his mind: therein surely he shewed himselfe an honest man, wise and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remoue the people from the enterprise of this war, neither yet by sute nor intreaty get himself discharged from being a captaine therof, but that they would in any case make him one of the heads of the army: then was it out of time to be fearfull, and still giuing backe, turning his head so oft like a child to looke vpon his gally behind him, and euer to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of his iourney. For indeed this was enough to discourage his companions, and to marre all at the first setting out: where, to say truly, he should suddenly haue set vpon his enemies, and haue gone to it with a lusty courage, to haue assayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first coming to go straight to SYRACVSA, and to giue them battel as neare the wals as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other side was of opinion, first of all to go about to win the cities that were in league with the SYRACVSANS, and after that they had made them rebel, then to go against the SYRACVSANS themselues: Nicias to the contrary spake in counsell, and thought it better to go on faire and softly, descrying the coasts of SICILE round about, to view their gallies and preparation, and so to returne straight to ATHENS againe, leauing onely a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning maruellously cooled the courage of the soldiers, and quite discouraged them. Shortly after also the ATHENIANS hauing sent for Alcibiades to answer to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining captaine with Lamachus (the other captaine in sight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenant generall of all the army) still vsed delaies, running vp and downe, and spending time so long in consultation, till the souldiers were left without both hope and courage: and the feare the enemie had of them at their first coming to see so great an armie, was now in manner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the armie, before he was sent for from ATHENS, they went with threescore gallies to SYRACVSA, of the which they placed fiftie in battell ray out of the hauen, and sent the other ten into the hauen to discouer: which approaching neare the citie, caused an Herald to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their lands and possessions, and tooke a ship of the enemies, in the which among other things they found tables, wherein were written the names of all the inhabitants of SYRACVSA, according to their tribes and houses. These tables were kept far from the city, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had sent for them to know the number of men of seruice, and of age to beare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the Generals of the army: the soothsayers seeing this long rolle of names, at the first misliked it, fearing lest the prophesie had ben fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACVSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophesie came to passe in another exploit, when Callippus ATHENIAN hauing slaine Dion, wonne all the citie of SYRACVSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the sway, and commanded the whole armie. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stout man, an honest man, and very valiant of his hands, and one that would not spare himselfe in time of need: neuertheless he was so poore and miserable, that euen when he was in state of a Generall, and gaue vp an account of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much for a gowne, and so much for a paire of pantophles. Where Nicias authoritie and reputation contrariwise was of another maner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in councell with his companions in the councell house at ATHENS about the dispatch of certaine causes he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present among them and bade him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him againe: Indeed I confesse I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom euery man regardeth best. So hauing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine and man of warre then himselfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge, by deferring of time still, and houering about SICILE as far from his enemies as he could: he first gaue the enemies time and leisure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to besiege HYBLA, being but a pelting little towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into so great a contempt with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him. At last, he retired to CATANA with his army, without any other exploit done, sauing that he tooke HYCCARA, a baggage village of the barbarous people, and where it is said Lais the curtisan was borne, and that being then a yong girle, she was sold among other prisoners, and afterwards caried into PELOPONNESVS. And in fine, the sommer being far spent, Nicias was informed that the SYRACVSANS had taken such courage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge vpon them first: and that their horsemen were approched already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into SICILE to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to restore the LEONTINES to their lands againe. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to go to SYRACVSA, and because he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hazard: he sent one of CATANA before to SYRACVSA, to tell them (as if he had bene a spie) that if they would suddenly come and set vpon the campe of the ATHENIANS and take all their carriage, he wisheth them to come with all their power to CATANA at a day certaine which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (said he) for the most part are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which fauouring the SYRACVSANS, haue determined so soone as they heare of their comming, to keepe the gates of the citie, and at the same time also to set the ATHENIANS ships on fire: and how there were also a great number in the citie of this confederacy, that did but look euery houre for their coming. And this was the noblest stratageme of warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this deuice he made the SYRACVSANS come into the field with all their power, so that they left their citie without guard: and he himselfe departing in the meane time from CATANA with all his fleete, wonne the hauen of SYRACVSA at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and might without let or difficulty set vpon them with that wherein he most trusted. The SYRACVSANS returning straight from CATANA, and offering him battel hard by the wals of SYRACVSA, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the SYRACVSANS slaine at this battel, because their horsemen did hinder the chase: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges vpon the riuer, gaue Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For comforting and encouraging the SYRACVSANS, he told them Nicias deserued to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from ATHENS to SYRACVSA, to fight. This notwithstanding, he made the SYRACVSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose out three only, to whom the people were sworne, that they wold suffer them to haue full power and authority to command and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS campe, which they would gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iewels and offerings of gold and siluer, giuen vnto the temple aforetime. But Nicias of purpose still draue off time, and delayed so long, till the SYRACVSANS at last sent a good garrison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with himselfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoile the temple, his countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and himselfe besides should beare all the blame of sacriledge. So, hauing obtained victory without profit, (which ran straight through SICILE) within few days after he returned vnto the city of NAXOS, where he lay all the winter, consuming a wonderful masse of victuals with so great an army, for the doing of things of small moment, vpon certaine SICILIANS that yeelded to him. The SYRACVSANS in the meane time being in heart againe and couragious, returned to CATANA, where they spoiled and ouerran all the country, and burnt the camp of the ATHENIANS. Wherefore euery man blamed Nicias much, because through his long delay and protracting of time to make all things sure, he let slip sundry occasions of notable exploits, wherein good seruice might haue bene done. Yet when he would do a thing indeed, he did it so thoroughly as no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to so good a passe: and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all speed, though he was both slow to determine and a coward to enterprise. Now when he remoued his army to returne to SYRACVSA, he brought it so orderly, and also with such speed and safety, that he was come by sea to THAPSVS, had landed and taken the fort of Epipolis, before the SYRACVSANS had any intelligence of it, or could possibly help it. For the choise men of the SYRACVSANS being set out against him, hoping to haue stopped his passage, he ouerthrew them, tooke three hundred prisoners, and made their horsemen flie, which before were thought inuincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS most afraid, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this: that in a very short space he had almost enuironed SYRACVSA with a wall, which was as much in compasse about, as the wals of ATHENS, and worse to performe, by reason of the woody country, and for the sea also that beateth vpon the wals, besides that there were diuers marishes hard by it: & yet (sick as he was of the stone) he had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, vnto his sickenesse. For mine owne part I wonder maruellously both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiantnesse and dexteritie of the souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Euripides after their ouerthrow and vtter ruine, made a funerall Epitaph in verse, and said thus:

Nicias besiegeth Syracusa.

Nicias well at the siege of Syracusa.

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracuse to flight,
So long as with indifferencie the gods did vse their might.

But we find it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not onely eight times, but many times more ouerthrowne by them: a time at length there was indeed, that both the gods and fortune fought against them, euen when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power. Now Nicias in his owne person was euer in the greatest and most weightie affaires, striuing with his sicke body. Howbeit one day when his disease grew sore vpon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a wall frō the city, vnto the wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purposed to haue shut them in, to keepe that they should not compasse it round. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these skirmishes, they many times ouer rashly followed the chase of their enemies that fled: as it chanced one day that Lamachus went so farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horsemen of the citie, before whom Callicrates marched foremost, a valiant man of his hands, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was first hurt: but he gaue Callicrates also such a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the stronger side, tooke vp his body, & caried it away with thēm: but they spurred out for life to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without any guard or succor at all: neuertheless Nicias rose with speed out of his bed, and perceiuing the danger he was in, commanded certaine of his friends to set the wood on fire which they had brought within the trenches of the camp, to make certaine deuices for batterie, and the engines of timber also that were already made. That deuice onely stayed the SYRACVSANS, saued Nicias, and the strength of their camp, together with all the siluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS perceiuing afarre off, betwixt them and the strength of their campe, such a great flame as rose vp in the aire, vpon the sight of it turned taile straight, and made towards their citie. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left sole Captaine of the armie without any companion, in great hope notwithstanding to do some good: diuerse cities of SICILE yeelded vnto him, ships fraught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many submitted themselues, for the good successe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS also sent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their city any longer against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, comming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderstanding by the way how the city of SYRACVSA was shut in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: held on his voyage notwithstanding, not with any hope to defend SICILE (supposing the ATHENIANS had wonne the whole countrey) but with intent neuertheless to help the cities of ITALY, if he could possibly. For it was a common rumour abroad, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wisdome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias himselfe now contrary to his wonted wisdome and foresight, trusting altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, but specially beleeuing the reports that were told him of SYRACVSA, and the newes that were brought him thence by some of themselues which came secretly vnto him, perswading himselfe that within few dayes he should haue SYRACVSA by composition, tooke no care to withstand Gylippus comming thither, neither sent any man to keep him from landing in SICILE. By which negligence Gylippus landed in a passenger, without Nicias knowledge: so small reckoning they made of him, and so much they did fondly despise him. Gylippus being thus landed farre from SYRACVSA, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the SYRACVSANS themselues knew of his landing, or looked for his coming: insomuch as they had already appointed the assembly of a councell to determine the articles and capitulations of peace, which they should conclude vpon with Nicias. Moreouer, there were some that perswaded they should do well to make haste to conclude the peace, before the inclosure of Nicias wall was altogether finished, which then lacked not much to performe, hauing all the stuffe for the purpose brought euen ready to the place. But as these things were euen thus a doing, arriued one Gongylus at SYRACVSA, that came from CORINTH with a galley. At whose landing, the people vpon the peere flocking about him, to heare what newes: he told them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other gallies after to their aid. The SYRACVSANS would hardly beleeue him, vntill there came another messenger also sent from Gylippus selfe of purpose, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the field. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS being maruellously reuiued went all straight and armed themselues. And Gylippus was no sooner come into SYRACVSA, but he presently put his men in battel ray, to set vpon the ATHENIANS. Nicias for his part had likewise also set the ATHENIANS in order of batell, and ready to fight. When both the armies were now approached neare to each other, Gylippus threw downe his weapons, and sent a herald vnto Nicias to promise them life and baggage to depart safely out of SICILE. But Nicias would make the herald none answer to that message. Howbeit there were certaine of his souldiers that in mockerie asked the herald, if for the coming of a poore cape and wand of LACEDÆMON, the SYRACVSANS thought themselues strengthened so much, that they should despise the ATHENIANS, which not long before kept three hundred LACEDÆMONIANS prisoners in irons, farre stronger and more haire on their heads then Gylippus had, and had also sent them home to their citizens at LACEDÆMON. And Timæus writeth also, that the SICILIANS themselues, made no reckoning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, because they saw his extreme couetousnesse and miserie: and then, for that he came so meanely apparelled, with a threed-bare cape, and a long bush of haire, which made them scorn him. Yet in another place he saith, that so soon as Gylippus arriued in SICILE, many came to him out of euery quarter with very good will like birds wondering at an Owle. This second report seemeth truer then the first: for they swarmed about him, because in this cape & wand they saw the tokens of the maiesty of the city and seigniory of SPARTA. Thucydides also saith, that it was Gylippus only that did all there. And much like doth Philistus self a SYRACVSAN confesse, who was present then in person, and saw all things that were done. Notwithstanding at the first battel ỹ ATHENIANS had the vpper hand, & slue a number of the SYRACVSANS, among the which Gongylus the CORINTHIAN was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wise Captaine. For with the selfe same weapons, with the same men, with the same horses, and in the same places, changing onely the order of his battell, he ouerthrew the ATHENIANS: and (fighting with them still) hauing driuen them euen into their campe, he set the SYRACVSANS a worke to build vp a wall ouerthwart, (with the very selfe same stones and stuffe, which the ATHENIANS had brought and laid there for the finishing of their inclosure) to cut off the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it ioyned not together. So, all that the ATHENIANS had done before vntill that present, was vtterly to no purpose. Things standing in these termes, the SYRACVSANS being being couragious againe, beganne to arme gallies; and running vp and downe the fields with their horsemen and slaues, tooke many prisoners. Gylippus on the other side, went in person to and fro through the cities of SICILE, perswading & exhorting the inhabitants in such sort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias seeing things thus fall out, fell to his old trade againe; and considering the change of his state and former good lucke, his heart beginning to faint, wrote straight to the ATHENIANS to send another armie into SICILE, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any case to giue him leaue to returne, and to discharge him of his office, for cause of his sickneſſe. The ATHENIANS were indifferent before hee wrote, to send aide thither: howbeit the enuie the nobilitie bare vnto Nicias good fortune, did euer cause some delay that they sent not vntil then, and then they determined to send with speed. So Demosthenes was named to be sent away immediatly after winter, with a great nauie. In the middest of winter Eurymedon went to Nicias, and caried him both money and newes, that the people had chosen some of them for his companions in the charge, which were already in seruice with him, to wit, Euthydemus and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane time being suddenly assailed by his enemies both by sea & land; though at the first he had fewer gallies in number then they, yet he budged diuers of theirs, and sunke them. But by land againe, he could not aide his men in time, because Gylippus at the first onset had taken a fort of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay the store & tackle for many gallies, and a great masse of readie mony, which was wholy lost. Besides, in the same conflict also were many men slaine, and many taken prisoners. Yet further, the greatest matter of weight was, that therby he tooke from Nicias the great commoditie he had to bring his victuals safely by sea to his campe. For while the ATHENIANS kept this fort, they might at their pleasure bring victuals without danger to their campe, being couered with the same: but then they had lost it, when it was hard for them so to do, because they were euer driuen to fight with ŷ enemies that lay at anker before the fort. Furthermore, the SYRACVSANS did not thinke that their armie by sea was ouerthrowne, because their enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed the ATHENIANS disorderedly: and therefore were desirous once againe to venture, in better sort and order then before. But Nicias by no meanes would be brought to fight againe: saying, that it were a madnesse, looking for such a great nauie and a new supply as Demosthenes was comming withall, rashly to fight with a fewer number of ships then they, and but poorly furnished. But contrarily, Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines (Nicias and Demosthenes that was then coming) desired to preuent Demosthenes, in performing some notable seruice before his arriual, and thereby also to excell Nicias doings. Howbeit the cloke they had to couer their ambition withal was, the honor and reputation of the citie of ATHENS, the which (said they) were shamed & dishonored for euer, if they now should shew thẽselues afraid of the SYRACVSANS, who prouoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his will to battel, in the which the ATHENIANS were slaine and ouercome, by the good counsell of a CORINTHIAN pylot called Ariston. For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides writeth) was clearely ouerthrowne, and they lost a great number of their men. Wherupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, considering on the one side that he had taken maruellous paines, whilst he was sole Captaine of the whole army: and on the other side for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had giuen him companions. But as Nicias was in this great despaire, they descried Demosthenes vpon a peere of the hauen, with his fleet brauly set out and furnished, to terrifie the enemies. For he had threescore and thirteen gallies, and in them he brought 5 thousand footmen well armed and appointed, & of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with slings, about 3 thousand; and the gallies trimmed and set forth with goodly armors, numbers of ensignes, and with a world of trumpets, howboies, and such marine musick, and all set out in this triumphant shew, to feare the enemies the more. Now though the SYRACVSANS themselues againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiuing they stroue against the streame, and consumed themselues to no purpose, when by that they saw there was no likelihood to be deliuered from their troubles. And Nicias also reioyced, that so great aide was come, but his ioy held not long: for so soone as he began to talke with Demosthenes of the state of things, he found him bent forthwith to set vpon the SYRACVSANS, and to hazard all with speed, that they might quickly take SYRACVSA, and so dispatch away home againe. Nicias thought this more hast then good speed, and feared much this foole-hardinesse. Whereupon he prayed him to attempt nothing rashly nor desperately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the warre against the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would soone be forsaken of their confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of victuals, that they would then quickly seek to him for peace, as they had done aforetime. For there were many within SYRACVSA that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but straighted a little more with want of victuals, they would yeeld straight. Nicias deliuering these perswasions some what darkly, and keeping somewhat also from vtterance, because he would not speake them openly, made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlinesse, and that he returned againe to his former delaies to keepe all in securitie, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his armie, for that he had not at his first comming set vpon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the courage of his souldiers was cold and done, & himselfe also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Menander, stucke to Demosthenes opinion: whereunto Nicias was also forced against his wil to yeeld. So Demosthenes the self same night taking the footmen, went to assault the fort of Epipolis: where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he slue many of them, and made the rest flie that offered resistance. But not content with this victory, he went farther, till he fell vpon the BOEOTIANS. They gathering themselues together, were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, basing their pikes with such fury and loud cries, that they caused the former to retire, and made all the rest of the assailants affraid and amazed. For the formost flying backe, came full vpon their companions; who taking them for their enemies, & their flight for a charge, resisted them with all their force, and so mistaking one another, both were wounded and slaine; and the hurt they meant vnto their enemies, did vnfortunatly light vpon their own fellowes. For this multitude meeting thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, and what for that they could not discerne one another in the night, the which was neither so dark that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleare, as they might certainly iudge by sight what they were that met them: (for then the Moone declined apace, & the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to and fro) the feare they had of the enemie, made them mistrust their friends. All these troubles and disaduantages had the ATHENIANS, and beside the Moone on their backs, which causing the shadow to fal forward, did hide their number, and glistering of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the Moone that shone vpon them, increased their fe re, and made them seeme a greater number and better appointed then they were indeed. At last, the enemies giuing a lustie charge vpon them on euery side, after they once began to giue backe and turne taile, some were slaine by their enemies, others by their owne companie, and others also brake their neckes falling from the rocks. The rest that were dispersed abroad in the fields, were the next morning euery man of them put to the sword by the horsemen. So the account made, two thousand ATHENIANS were slaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors back againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was maruellously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnesse. But he excusing himselfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoise saile homewards. For, said he, we must look for no new aid from ATHENS, neither are we strong enough with this army to ouercome our enemies: and though we were, yet must we of necessity auoid the place we are in, because (as it is reported) it is alwaies vnwholsome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the autumne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly see by exprience. For many of their people were already sicke, and all of them in maner had no mind to tary. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, because he feared not the SYRACVSANS, but rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations & condemnatiõ. And therfore in open counsell he told them, that as yet he saw no such danger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather die of his enemies hands, then be put to death by his owne countrimen. Being therein of a contrary mind to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that, said to his citizens: I had rather suffer death by you, then to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for remouing their campe to some other place, they should haue leisure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in counsell, Demosthenes hauing had ill lucke at his first comming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that that Nicias ſtucke not ſo hard againſt their departure, but that he relied vpon the truſt and confidence he had of ſome within the citie: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new ſupply come vnto the SYRACVSANS, & that they ſaw the plague increaſed more and more in their campe: then Nicias ſelfe thought it beſt to depart thence, and gaue notice to the ſouldiers to prepare themſelues to ſhip away. Notwithſtanding, when they had put all things in readineſſe for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemie, or ſuſpition thereof: the Moone began to eclipſe in the night, and ſuddenly to loſe her light, to the great feare of Nicias and diuers others, who through ignorance and ſuperſtition quaked at ſuch ſights. For, touching the eclipſe & darkneſſe of the Sunne, which is euer at any coniunction of the Moone, euery common perſon then knew the cauſe to be the darkneſſe of the body of the Moone betwixt the Sunne and our ſight. But the eclipſe of the Moone it ſelfe, to know what doth darken it in that ſort, and how being at the full it doth ſuddainely loſe her light, and change into ſo many kinds of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therfore they thought it very ſtrange, perſwading themſelues that it was a ſigne of ſome great miſchiefes the gods did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the firſt that euer determined and deliuered any thing for certaine and aſſured, concerning the light and darkneſſe of the Moone, his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquitie, nor was generally knowne but only to a few, who durſt not talke of it, but with feare, euen to them they truſted beſt. And the reaſon was, for that the people could not at that time abide them that profeſſed the knowledge of naturall Philoſophie, and inquired of the cauſes of things: for them they called then Μετεωρολέσχης as much to ſay, as curious inquirers and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reaſon, done in heauen and in the aire. Becauſe the people thought they aſcribed that which was done by the gods only, vnto certaine naturall and neceſſary cauſes that worke their effects not by prouidence nor will, but by force & neceſſarie conſequences. For theſe cauſes was Protagoras baniſhed frō ATHENS, & Anaxagoras put in priſon: from whence Pericles had much ado to procure his deliuerie. And Socrates alſo, though he did not meddle with that part of Philoſophie, was notwithſtanding put to death for the ſuſpition therof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as alſo for that he ſubmitted the neceſſitie of naturall cauſes vnto the controlment and diſpoſition of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and ſupreame cauſe: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of ſuch diſputations, and gaue open paſſage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall ſciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes ſcholers and friends, an eclipſe of the Moone chancing euen at the very ſame time that he was weying vp his ankers to ſaile from ZAZYNTHE, to make warre with the tyrant Dyoniſius: being nothing afraid nor troubled therewithall, made ſaile notwithſtanding, and when he came to SYRACVSA, draue out the tyrant, But then it fell out vnfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilful Soothſayer: for the party which he was wont to vſe for that purpoſe, and which tooke away much of his ſuperſtition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this ſigne of the eclipſe of the Moone (Philochorus ſaith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very good: for ſaid he, things that men do in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemie vnto them. But this notwithſtanding, their cuſtome was not to keepe thēſelues cloſe aboue three daies in ſuch eclipſes of the Moone and Sun, as Autoclides ſelfe preſcribeth in a booke he made of ſuch matters: where Nicias bare them then in hand, that they ſhould tarie the whole and full reuolution of the courſe of the Moone, as though he had not ſeene her ſtraight cleare againe, after ſhee had once paſſed the ſhadow & darkneſſe of the earth. But all other things laid aſide and forgotten, Nicias diſpoſed himſelfe to ſacrifice vnto the gods: vntil ſuch time as the enemies came again as well to beſiege their forts, and all their campe by land, as alſo to occupie the whole hauen by ſea. For they had not onely put men aboord into their gallies able to weare armour, but moreouer young boyes into fiſher boats and other light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and ſhamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble houſe, called Heraclides, whoſe boate being forwarder then his companions, was in danger of taking by a gallie of the ATHENIANS, that rowed againſt him: Pollichus his vncle being afraid of it, lanched forward with ten gallies of SYRACVSA for his reſcue, of the which himſelfe was Captaine. The other gallyes doubting alſo leſt Pollichus ſhould take hurt, came on likewiſe amaine: ſo that there fell out a great battell by ſea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and ſlue Eurymedon the Captaine, and many other. This made the ſouldiers of ỹ ATHENIANS ſo afraid, that they began to cry out, it was no longer tarrying, there and that there was none other way but to depart thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had won that battell they had ſtraight ſhut vp the hauens mouth. Nicias could not conſent to ſuch a retire: for, ſaid he, it would be too great a ſhame for them to leaue their gallies and other ſhips to the enemie, conſidering the number not to be much leſſe then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and ten gallies with the beſt and valianteſt of their footmen, and darters, that were in the armie, becauſe the other galleyes had ſpent their owers. And for the reſt of the armie, Nicias forſaking their great campe and walles (which reacheth as far as the temple of Hercules) did ſet them in battell ray vpon the peere of the hauen. Inſomuch as the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted ſacrifices vnto Hercules, did then ſend their Prieſts and Captaines thither to do them. The ſouldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Prieſts and Soothſayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoubtedly the ſignes of the ſacrifices did promiſe them a noble victorie, ſo that they gaue no charge, but onely ſtood vpon their defence: for ſo did Hercules euer ouercome, defending when he was aſſailed. With this good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was ſuch a hote and cruell battell by ſea, as had not beene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that ſtood on the ſhore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, ſeeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themſelues by the order they kept in their fight, & by the rankes of their ſhips, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great ſhips together, fighting with the heauy againſt the enemies that were light and ſwift, which came on on euery ſide of them, hurling ſtones at them, which were made ſharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS only caſting their darts, and vſing their bowes and ſlings, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe, could not lightly aime to hit with the head. That manner of fight Ariſto a CORINTHIAN (an excellent ſhip-maſter) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who was himſelfe ſlaine valiantly fighting, when they were conquerors. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driuen to fight, having ſuſtained a maruellous ſlaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to flie by ſea being alſo clearely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardly ſaue themſelues by land: were then ſo diſcouraged, as they made no longer reſiſtance, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their ſhips before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forſake their diſeaſed & ſore wounded companions, then to bury them that were already ſlaine. When they conſidered all theſe things, they thought their own ſtate more miſerable then theirs, which were to end their liues with much more cruelty, then was their miſerie preſent. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the SYRACVSANS through all the city diſpoſed themſelues to ſacrifice to the gods, and to be merry, as well for the ioy of their victory, as alſo for Hercules feaſt: thought it bootleſſe to perſwade them, and much leſſe to compell them to take armes vpon a ſudden, to ſet vpon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuiſing with himſelfe how to deceiue Nicias, ſent ſome of his friends vnto him with inſtructions, to tell him that they came from ſuch as were wont to ſend him ſecret intelligence of all things during this war: and willed him to take heed not to depart that night, leſt he fel into the ambuſhes which the SYRACVSANS had laid for him, hauing ſent before to take al the ſtraights and paſſages, by the which he ſhould paſſe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and ſubtiltie, ſtaied there that night, as though he had bene afraid to fall within the danger of his enemies ambuſh. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoiſſed ſaile, got the ſtraights of Nicias paſſage, ſtopped the riuers mouths, and brake vp the bridges: and then caſt their horſmen in a ſquadron in the next plaine fields adioyning, ſo that the ATHENIANS had no way left to eſcape and paſſe by them without fighting. At laſt notwithſtanding, hauing ſtayed all that day and the next night following, they put themſelues in iourney, and departed with great cries and lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall country, and not out of their enemies land, as well for the great diſtreſſe and neceſſity wherin they were (lacking all things needfull to ſuſtaine life,) as alſo for the extreame ſorrow they felt, to leaue their ſore wounded companions and diſeaſed kinſemen and friends behind them, that could not for their weakneſſe follow the campe, but ſpecially for that they looked for ſome worſe matter to fall to themſelues, then that which they ſaw preſent before their eies to be happened vnto their fellowes. But of all the moſt pitifull ſightes to behold in that campe, there was none more lamentable Nicias deceiued by Hermocrates.

The miſerable ſtate of the Athenians departing from Syracuſa.

lamentable nor miſerable,then the perſon of Nicias ſelf:who being tormented with this diſeaſe. and waxen very leane and pale,was alſo vnworthily brought to extreame want of natural ſuſtenance,euen when he had moſt neede of comfort, being very ſickely. Yet notwithſtanding his weakneſſe and infirmitie, he tooke great paines, and ſuffered many things which the ſoundeſt bodies do labour much to ouercome and ſuffer: making it appeare euidently to euery man, that he did not abide all that paines for any reſpect of himſelfe,or deſire that he had to ſaue his own life,ſo much as for their ſakes,in that he yeelded not vnto preſent deſpaire. For where the ſoldiers for very feare and ſorrow burſt out into teares and bitter wailing, Nicias ſelfe ſhewed,that if by chance he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather vpon remembrance of the ſhame and diſhonour that came into his minde, to ſee the vnfortunate ſucceſſe of his voyage, in ſteed of the honour and victorie they hoped to haue brought home, then for any other reſpect. But if to ſee Nicias in this miſerie,did moue the lookers on to pity: yet did this much more increaſe their compaſſion, when they remembred Nicias words in his orations continually to the people, to breake this iourney, and to diſſwade them from the enterpriſe of this warre. For thē they plainely iudged him not to haue deſerued theſe troubles. Yet furthermore, this cauſed the ſouldiers vtterly to diſpaire of helpe from the gods,when they conſidered with themſelues,that ſo deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honour and ſeruice of the gods) had no better ſucceſſe,then the moſt vile and wicked perſons in all the whole armie. All this notwithſtanding, Nicias ſtrained himſelfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull words,and his kind vſing of euery man: to let them know that he fainted not vnder his burthen, nor yet did yeeld to this misfortune and extreame calamitie. And thus trauelling eight daies iourney out-right together, notwithſtanding that he was by the way continually ſet vpon,wearied and hurt:yet he euer maintained his bands,& led them whole in company,vntill that Demoſthenes with all his bands of ſoldiers was taken priſoner,in a certain village called POLYZELIOS:where remaining behind,he was enuironed by his enemies in fight, and ſeeing himſelfe ſo compaſſed in, drew out his ſword, and with his owne hands thruſt himſelfe thorow,but died not of it,becauſe his enemies came ſtraight about him, and tooke hold of him. The SYRACVSANS thereupon went with ſpeed to Nicias, and told him of Demoſthenes caſe. He giuing no credit to them, ſent preſently certaine of his horſemen thither to vnderſtand the truth:who brought him word that Demoſthenes and all his men were taken priſoners. Then he beſought Gylippus to treat of peace,to ſuffer the poore remaine of the ATHENIANS to depart out of SICILLE with ſafety, and to take ſuch hoſtages for the ſure paiment of all ſuch ſummes of money the SYRACVSANS had diſburſed by meanes of this warre, as ſhould like himſelfe: which he promiſed he would cauſe the ATHENIANS to performe and ſatisfie vnto them. Howbeit the SYRACVSANS would in no wiſe hearken to peace,but cruelly threatening and reuiling them that made motion hereof,in rage gaue a new onſet vpon him, more fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then vtterly without any kind of victuals, did notwithſtanding hold out that night, and marched all the next day following(though the enemies darts ſtill flew about their eares)vntill he came to the riuer of Aſinarus, into the which the SYRACVSANS did forcibly driue them. Some others of them alſo dying for thirſt, entred the riuer of themſelues,thinking to drink. But there of all others was the moſt cruel ſlaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntill ſuch time as Nicias falling down flat at Gyllippus feete, ſaid thus vnto him: Since the gods haue giuen thee (Gylippus) victorie, ſhew mercy, not to me that by theſe miſeries haue won immortal honor and fame,but vnto theſe poore vanquiſhed ATHENIANS: calling to thy remembrance,that the fortunes of warre are common,and how that the ATHENIANS haue vſed you LACEDÆMONIANS courteouſly, as often as fortune fauoured them againſt you. Gylippus beholding Nicias,& perſwaded by his words, took cōpaſſion of him (for he knew he was a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS at the laſt peace concluded betwixt them,& furthermore thought it great honour to him,if he could cary away the two Captains or Generals of his enemies priſoners)ſhewed him mercy,gaue him words of comfort,and moreouer commaunded beſides that they ſhould take all the reſidue priſoners. But his commandement was not knowen in time to all: inſomuch as there were many moe ſlaine then taken, although ſome priuate ſoldiers ſaued diuers notwithſtanding by ſtealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought al the priſoners that were openly taken into a troupe together,firſt vnarmed them,then taking their weapons from them,hung them vp vpon the goodlieſt young trees that ſtood vpon

the riuers side, in token of triumph. And so putting on triumphing garlands vpon their heads: and hauing trimmed their owne horses in triumphant manner, and also shorne all the horses of their enemies: in this triumphing sort they made their entrie into the city of SYRACVSA, hauing gloriously ended the most notable warre that euer was amongst the GREEKES one against another, and attained also the noblest victorie that could be atchieued, & that only by force of arms and valiancie. So at their returne, a councell and assembly was holden at SYRACVSA, by the citizens and their confederates: in the which Eurycles one of the Oratours (a practiser in publike causes) first made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy-day, without any maner of work, or labour, but only to do sacrifice to the gods; and that the feast should be called, Asinarus feast, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was giuen. This victorie was had the sixe and twentieth day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the prisoners, that the confederates of the ATHENIANS and their slaues should be openly sould by the drumme: and that the natural ATHENIANS which were freemen, and their confederates of the country of SICILE, should be clapped in irons and layd in prison, the Captaines onely excepted, whom they should put to death. The SYRACVSANS, confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perswade them, that to be mercifull in victorie, wold be more honor vnto them, then the victory it selfe: they thrust him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made suite that for the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, he might cary them aliue with him to SPARTA, he was not only shamefully denied, but most vilely abused; so lusty were they grown vpon this victorie, besides also that in the time of the war they were offended with him, & could not endure his straight seuere LACONIAN gouernement. Timæus saith moreouer, that they accused him of couetousnesse and theft, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandrides his father was conuict for extortion, and banished ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe hauing stolne thirtie talents out of a thousand which Lysander sent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eauings of his house, being bewrayed, was compelled with shame to flie his countrey, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. So Timæus writeth, that Nicias & Demosthenes were not stoned to death by ỹ SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides & Philistus report, but that they killed themselues, vpon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the assembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men, whom the keepers of the prison let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the iayle doore, for euery man to behold. I haue heard there is a target at this present to be seen in a temple at SYRACVSA, which is said to be Nicias target, couered al ouer with gold and purple silke, passing finely wrought together. As for the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, the most of them died of sickenesse, and of ill handling in the prison: where they had no more allowed them to liue withal but two dishfuls of barley for their bread, and one of water for each man a day. Indeed many of them were conuayed away, and sold for slaues: and many also that scaped vnknowne as slaues were also sold for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a horse, who notwithstanding besides their bondage, endured also this paine. But such, their humble patience and modesty did greatly profit them: for either shortly after they were made freemen, or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated and beloued of their masters. Some of them were saued also for Eurypides sake. For the SICILIANS liked the verses of this Poet better then they did any other GRECIANS verses of the midst GREECE. For if they heard any rimes or songs like vnto his, they wold haue them by heart, & one wold present them to another with great ioy. And therfore it is reported, that diuers escaping his bondage, & returning againto ATHENS, went very louingly to salute Eurypides, & to thank him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from slauery, only by teaching thē those verses which they remembred of his works. Others told him also, how that after the battel, they scaping by flight, and wandering vp and downe the fields, met with some that gaue them meate and drinke to sing his verses. And this is not to be marueled at, weighing ỹ report made of a ship of the city of CAVNVS, that on a time being chased in thither by pirats, thinking to saue thēselues within their ports, could not at the first be receiued, but had repulse: howbeit being demanded whether they could sing any of Eurypides songs, and answering that they could, were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The news of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleeued at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the hauen of PIRÆA, went and sate him down (as the maner is) in a Barbers shop, and thinking it had bin cōmonly known there, began to talke of it.

The end of Nicias life.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Craſſus.

Marcus Craſſus kinred, and youth.

Marcus Craſſus was the ſonne of a Cenſor, who had alſo receiued the honour of triumph: but himſelfe was brought vp in a little houſe with two other of his brethren, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept houſe together. Whereupon it came to paſſe, that he was a man of ſuch ſober and temperate diet, that one of his brethren being deceaſed, he maried his wife, by whom he had children. For women, he liued as continent a life, as any ROMAINE of his time: notwithſtanding, afterwards being of riper yeares, he was accuſed by Plotinus to haue defloured one of the Veſtall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cauſe of that ſuſpition grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleaſant garden hard by the ſuburbes of the citie, wherewith Craſſus was maruellouſly in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: & vpon this onely occaſion was often ſeene in ſpeech with her, which made the people ſuſpect him. But for as much as it ſeemed to the Iudges that his couetouſneſſe was the cauſe that made him follow her, he was cleared of the inceſt ſuſpected, but he neuer left following of the Nun, till he had got the garden of her. The ROMAINES ſay there was but that only vice of couetouſneſſe in Craſſus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, ſince it grew ſo great, as the note of that only did hide and couer all his other vices. Now to ſet out his extreme couetous deſire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifeſt reaſons.

Craſſus Couetouſneſſe.

The first, his manner and meanes he vsed to get: and the second, the greatnesse of his wealth.

Crassus riches. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then three hundred talants. And during the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, he offered the tenths of all his goods wholly vnto Hercules, kept open house for all the people of Rome, and gaue also to euery citizen of the same as much corne as would keepe him three moneths: and yet when he went from Rome to make warre with the Parthians, himselfe being desirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the summe of seuen thousand one hundred talants. But if

How Crassus came by his goods. I may with licence vse euill speech, writing a troath: I say he got the most part of his wealth by fire and bloud, raising his greatest reuenew of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had taken the citie of Rome, he made portsale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gaue most, terming them his booty, onely for that he would the nobilitie and greatest men of power in the citie should be partakers with him of this iniquitie: and in this open sale Crassus neuer left taking of gifts, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassus perceiuing that the greatest decay commonly of the buildings in Rome came by fire, and falling downe of houses, through the ouermuch weight by number of stories built one vpon another: bought bondmen that were masons, carpenters, and these deuisors and builders, and of these he had to the number of fiue hundred. Afterwards, when the fire tooke any house, he would buy the house while it was a burning, and the next houses adioyning to it, which the owners sold for litle, being then in danger as they were, and a burning: so that by processe of time, the most part of the houses in Rome came to be his. But notwithstanding that he had so many slaues to his workmen, he neuer built any house from the ground, sauing his owne house wherein he dwelt:

Crassus saying of builders. saying, that such as delighted to build, vndid themselues without the helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mines of siluer, many ploughs, and a number of hinds and ploughmen to follow the same: yet all that cõmodity was nothing, in respect of the profit his slaues and bondmen brought him daily in. As readers, scriueners, goldsmiths, bankers, receiuers, stewards of houshold, caruers, and other such officers at the table, taking paines himselfe to help them whẽ they were learners, and to instruct them what they should doe: and to be short, he thought the

Crassus care about seruants. greatest care a good housholder ought to haue, was to see his slaues or seruants wel taught being the most liuely cattell and best instruments of a mans house. And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake: that all things must be done by seruants, and his seruants must be ruled by him. For we see that the art and skill to be a good husband, when it consisteth

What belongeth to good husbandry & in whom it consists. in gouernment of things without life or sense, is but a base thing, only tending to gaine: but when it dependeth vpon good order and gouernement of men, me thinks then it is to know how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his iudgement was good in the other, so was it

Crassus iudgement who was a rich man. very bad in this: that he thought no man rich and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole armie with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to say) is not made with any certaintie of expence: and therefore there must no sufficiencie of riches be limited for the maintenance of the same. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion:

Archidamus saying of warre. who hauing allowed euery Romaine fourteen acres land (called with them, Iugera) vnderstanding that some were not pleased, but wold haue more, made them this answer: The gods forbid any Romaine should thinke that land little, which indeed is inough to suffice for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was courteous to strangers, for his house was open to them all, and he lent his friends money without interest: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he roundly demaund his money of them. So, his courtesie to lend many times without interest, did more trouble them, than if he had takẽ very great vsury. Indeed whẽ he bade any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinary, without all excesse: but his

Crassus fare at his board. fine and cleanly seruice, and the good entertainement hee gaue euery man that came to him, pleased him better, than if he had bene more plentifull of diet and dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefely studied eloquence, and that sort specially that best wold serue his turne to speake in open presence: so that he became the best spoken man in Rome of all his time, and by

Crassus eloquence. his great industry & diligent indeauour excelled all them that euen by nature were most apt vnto it. For some say, he had neuer so small nor little a cause in hand, but he alwaies came prepared hauing studied his cause before for pleading: and oftentimes also when Pompey Cæsar, and Cicero refused to rise and speake to matters, Crassus would defend euery cause, if he were requested. And therefore was he generally beloued & well thought of, because he shewed himself painful,

and willing to helpe euery man. Likewiſe was his gentlenes maruellouſly eſteemed, becauſe he ſaluted euery body curteouſly, and made much of all men: for whomſoeuer he met in the ſtreets that ſpake to him as he paſſed and ſaluted him, were he neuer ſo meane, he wold ſpeake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is ſayd alſo he was very well ſtudied in ſtories, and indifferently ſeene in Philoſophy, ſpecially in Ariſtotles workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by vſing of Craſſus company: for it were hard to ſay, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Craſſus, or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his friends he would euer haue Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but ſo ſoone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to ſee that he making profeſſion of Philoſophy as he did, the poore man being in great pouerty, did not place pouerty in things indifferent. But hereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and coming on directly towards Rome, euery man ſuſpected ſtraight their comming was for no good to the commonwealth, but as appeareth plainly, for the death and deſtruction of the nobleſt men of Rome. For it ſo fell out indeed, that they ſlue all the chiefe men they found in the citie, among whom Craſſus father and his brother were of the number, and himſelfe being at that time but yong, eſcaped the preſent danger only by flight. Furthermore, Craſſus hearing that they laied waite to take him, and that the tyrants ſought him in euery place, tooke three of his friends in his company and ten ſeruants only, and fled into Spaine with all poſſible ſpeed, where he had been with his father before, & had got ſome friends when he was Prætor, and ruled the country. Neuertheleſſe, ſeeing euery body afraid, and miſtruſting Marius cruelty, as if he had bin at their doores, he durſt not bewray himſelf to any man, but went into the fields, and hid him in a great caue being within the land of one Vibius Piciacus by the ſea ſide, from whence he ſent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what goodwil he bare him, but ſpecially for that his victuals began to faile him. Vibius hearing that Craſſus was ſafe, and had eſcaped, became very glad of it: and vnderſtanding how many perſons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not himſelfe to ſee him, but called one of his ſlaues (who was his receiuer and occupied that ground for him (and bringing him neere the place where Craſſus was, cõmanded him euery night to prouide meat for ſupper, to bring it ready dreſſed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no words of it, neither be inquiſitiue for whõ it was; for if he did he ſhould die for it, and otherwiſe, for keeping the thing ſecret as he commanded, he promiſed to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the ſea ſide, and is cloſed in round about with two rockes that meet together, which receiue a ſoft coole wind into them. When ye are entred into ỹ caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollowneſſe therof are many other caues of great receipt one within another, & beſides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a wel of paſſing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall rifts of the rocks alſo receiuing the light without, where they meet together, do ſend it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruellous light, & hath no dampe aire, but very pure and drie, by reaſon of the thickneſſe of the rocke, which ſendeth all the moiſtneſſe and vapour into that ſpringing well. Craſſus keeping cloſe in this caue, Vibius receiuer brought victuals thither daily to releeue him and his company, but ſaw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderſtand what they were: and yet they ſaw him plainely, obſeruing the houre and time of his coming when he brought the ſame. He prouided them no more then would euen neceſſarily ſerue their turne, and yet plenty ſufficient to make good cheere withal: for Vibius was bent to entertain Craſſus as honourably as he could poſſible, in ſo much as he conſidered he was a young man, and therefore reaſon would he ſhould offer him ſome occaſion to take ſuch pleaſure and delight as his youth required. For to releeue his neceſſity onely, he thought that rather a part of feare, than any ſhew of loue towards him. One day he tooke two faire young damſels, and brought them with him to the ſea ſide: and when he came to the caue, ſhewed them where they ſhould get vp, and bad them not be afraid. Craſſus at the firſt, when he ſaw the young wenches, was afraid he had beene betrayed: yet he aſked them what they were, and whom they ſought. They being inſtructed by Vibius what they ſhould ſay, anſwered, that they ſought their maiſter that was hidden there. Then Craſſus knew this was Vibius mirth to ſhew him courteſie: ſo he receiued them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderſtand by them what he lacked. Feneſtella writeth, that he ſaw one of them when ſhe was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight moneths) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made himselfe to be knowne, there repaired a great number of souldiers vnto him, of whom he only chose two thousand fiue hundred, and with them passed by many cities, and sacked one called MALACA, as diuerse do write; but he flatly denied it, and stoutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwards hauing gotten ships together, went into AFRICKE, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great armie together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honoured him as much as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwards arriuing in ITALY, intending to imploy all the yong nobilitie he had in his companie, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and sent Crassus into the countrey of the MARSIANS, to leauie men of warre there. Crassus desiring certaine bands of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to passe by his enemies: Sylla answered him angerly againe: I giue thee thy father, thy brother, thy friends and kinsemen to aide thee, whom they most wickedly haue slaine and murthered, and whose deaths I pursue with hote reuenge of maine army, vpon those bloudy murtherers that haue slaine them. Crassus being netled with these words, departed thence presently, and stoutly passing through his enemies, leauied a good number of souldiers: and was euer after ready at Syllaes commandement in all his warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention betwixt him and Pompey. For Pompey being yonger than Crassus, and borne of a wicked father in ROME, whom the people more hated then euer they did man: came yet to great honour by his valiancy, and by the notable acts he did in the wars at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, which he seldome did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equals: as to rise vp when he came towards him, to put off his cap, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieuetenant generall. And this galled Crassus to the heart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of war at that time, & also because these two vices that were bred in him, misery and couetousnesse, drowned all his vertue and well doing, For at the sacke of the city of TVDER, which he tooke, he priuily got the most part of the spoyle to himselfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last battell of this ciuill warre (which was the greatest and most dangerous of all other) euen before ROME it selfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulsed and ouerthrowne: but Crassus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his victory, and demaunded victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging, the confiscate goods of the outlawes appointed to be slaine, for little or nothing. And it is said also, that he made one an outlaw in the countrey of the BRVTIANS, without Syllaes priuitie or commandement, only to haue his goods. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vse him in any open seruice. Surely this is a strange thing, that Crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, and could creep into any mans fauor, was yet himselfe easie to be won through flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is said of him that he had this property: that though himself was as extreamly couetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly misliked them that had his own humor of auarice. Pompeyes honour that he attained vnto daily, by bearing great charge and rule in the warres, did greatly trouble Crassus: both because he obtained the honour of triumph before he came to be Senator, and also for that the ROMAINS commonly called him, Pompeius Magnus, to say, Pompey the great. Crassus being in place on a time when one sayd that saw Pompey comming, See, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, sayd he scornefully? howbeit despairing that he could not obtaine to match him in the warres, he gaue himselfe vnto the affaires of the city: and by his paines and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that sued for any office, or demanded any thing else of the people, he attained in the end to the like estimation and authoritie that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For Pompeyes fame and power was greater in ROME, when himself was absent: and contrariwise when he was there present, Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maiesty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be seen often of the people, but kept from repairing to open places, and would speake but in few mens causes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauour and credite whole for himselfe, when he stood in need to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to many, because he kept continually in the market

market place, and was easie to be repaired vnto by any man that required his helpe, daily following those exercises, indeauouring himselfe to pleasure euery man: so that by this easie accesse and familiaritie, for fauour and goodwill, he grew to exceed the grauitie and maiesty of Pompey. But as for the worthinesse of their persons, their eloquence of speech, and their good grace and countenance: in all those (it is said) Pompey and Crassus were both alike. And this enuie and emulation neuer caried Crassus away, with any open malice or ill will. For though he was sory to see Pompey and Cæsar honoured aboue him: yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cæsar when he was taken by pirates in Asia (as he was once) and being kept prisoner cried out aloud: O Crassus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou shalt heare I am in prison! This notwithstanding, they were afterwards good friends, as it appeareth: for Cæsar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prætor into Spaine, & not being able to satisfie his creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to stay and arrest his cariage: Crassus, in that time of need forsooke him not, but became his suretie for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talents. In fine, all Rome being diuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cæsar and Crassus (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his fidelitie was greater then his authoritie: and his vertue more wondred at then practised) in so much as the graueſt and wiſeſt men tooke part with Pompey. The liueliest youthes, and likeliest to runne into desperate attempts, they followed Cæsars hope. Crassus keeping the middest of the streame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes changed his minde and purpose. For in matters of gouernement in the commonweale, he neither shewed himselfe a constant friend, nor a dangerous enemie: but for gaine, was easily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they saw him praise and reprooue, defend and condemne, the same lawes, and the same men. His estimation grew more, through the peoples feare of him, then for any good wil they bare him. As appeareth by the answer that one Sicinius (a very busie headed man, and one that troubled euery gouernor of the commonweale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not busie with Crassus among the rest: and how it happened that he so scaped his hands? O, said he, he caried hay on his horne. The manner was then at Rome, if any man had a curst bullocke that would strike with his horne, to wind hay about his head, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commotion of fencers, which some call Spartacus warre, their wasting and destroying of Italie came vpon this occasion. In the citie of Capva, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fencers at vnrebated foiles, whom the Romaines call Gladiatores, whereof the most part were Gavles and Thracians. These men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had commited, but onely for the wickednesse of their maister that had brought them and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the sharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to steale away: but their conspiracie being bewrayed, threescore and eighteene of them entred into a cooks house, and with the spits and kitchin-knives, which there they got, went quite out of the citie. By the way they fortuned to meete with carts loden with fencers weapons, that were brought from Capva, going to some other city: those they also took by force, and arming themselues therewith, got them then to a strong place of situation. Where amongst themselues they chose three Captaines, and one Spartacus a Thracian borne (and of those countrey men that go wandering vp and downe with their heards of beasts, neuer staying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not only valiant, but strong made withall, and endued with more wisedome and honestie, than is commonly found in men of his state and condition: and for ciuilitie & good vnderstanding a man more like to the Grecians then any of his countrymen cõmonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came first to Rome to be sold for a slaue, there was found as he slept, a snake wound about his face. His wife seeing it, being his own countriwoman, and a wise woman besides, possest with Bacchus spirit of diuination: said plainly that it did signifie, that one day he should be of great power, much dread, and haue very good successe. This same woman propheteſſe was then with him, and followed him likewise when he fled. Now first they ouerthrew certaine soldiers that came out of Capva against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their armor and weapons, made them glad to take the fencers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnsemly. After that, the Romains sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in their fort, situate vpon a hill that had a very steepe and narrow ascent vnto it, and kept the passage vp to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was nothing but high rockes hanging ouer, and vpon them great ſtore of wild vines. Of them the bondmen cut the ſtrongeſt ſtrips, and made thereof ladders, like to theſe ſhip ladders of ropes, of ſuch a length and ſo ſtrong, that they reached from the top of the hill euen to the very bottome: vpon thoſe they all came ſafely downe, ſauing one that tarried aboue to throw downe their armour after them, who afterwards by the ſame ladder ſauing himſelfe laſt of all. The Romains miſtruſting no ſuch matter, theſe bondmen compaſſed the hill round, aſſailed them behind, and put them in ſuch a feare with the ſudden onſet, as they fled vpon it euery man, and ſo was their campe taken. Therevpon diuers heardmen and ſhepheards that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the Romains that fled, being ſtrong and hardy men: of which ſome they armed, and others they vſed as ſcouts and ſpials to diſcouer. Vpon this ouerthrow was ſent another Captaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, againſt theſe bondmen: who firſt ouercame Furius, the Lieuetenant of Varinus in battell, and two thouſand of his men: and after that againe they ſlue one Coſsinius, and ouerthrew a great armie of his, being ioyned with Publius Varinus, as his fellow and counſellor. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Coſsinius was bathing himſelfe at a place called the ſalt pits, had allmoſt taken him tardie, hauing much ado by flight to ſaue himſelfe: notwithſtanding, Spartacus wan all his carriage at that time, and hauing him hard in chaſe, took his whole campe with great ſlaughter of his men, among whom Coſsinius ſelfe was ſlaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in ſundry battels and encounters ouercome the Prætor himſelfe, Publius Varinus, and at the length taken his ſergeants from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horſe whereon he rode himſelf: was growne then to ſuch a power, as he was dreaded of euery man. Yet all this notwithſtanding, Spartacus wiſely conſidering his owne force, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the Romains, marched with his army towards the Alpes, taking it their beſt way after they had paſſed them ouer, euery man to repaire home to his owne countrey, ſome into Gavle, the reſt into Thracia. But his ſouldiers truſting to their multitude, & perſwading thẽſelues to do great things, would not obey him therein, but went againe to ſpoile and ouer run all Italy. The Senate of Rome being in great perplexitie, not onely for the ſhame and diſhonour that their men ſhould be ouercome in that ſort by ſlaues and rebels, but alſo for the feare and danger all Italy ſtood in beſides: ſent both the Conſuls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Conſuls, ſetting ſuddenly vpon a band of the Germaines, which in a brauery & contempt as it were, diſperſed themſelues from their campe, put them to the ſword euery man. Lentulus, his colleague and fellow Conſull on the other ſide, compaſſed in Spartacus round with a great army: but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the army, gaue thẽ battell, ouerthrew them, and took all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on ſtill with his army towards the Alpes, Caſsius the Prætor and gouernor of Gavle about the Po, came againſt him with an army of ten thouſand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Caſsius hauing loſt a great number of his men, with great difficulty ſaued himſelf by flying. The Senate hearing of Caſſius ouerthrow, were maruellouſly offended with the Conſuls, and ſent commandement vnto them, to leaue off the warre: and thereupon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcus Craſſus, who was accompanied in his iourney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houſes, both for that he was maruellouſly eſteemed, and alſo for the good will they bare him. Now went Craſſus from Rome, and camped in Romania, tarying Spartacus coming, who was marching thitherward. He ſent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetch a compaſſe about to intrap the enemie behind: ſtraightly commanding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no caſe to offer him skirmiſh nor battell. But Mummius notwithſtanding this ſtraight commandement, ſeeing ſome hope giuen him to doe good, ſet vpon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrow, ſlue numbers of his men, and moe had ſlaine, ſauing that certaine of them ſaued themſelues by flight, hauing onely loſt their armour and weapons. Hereupon Craſſus was grieuouſly offended with Mummius, and receiuing his ſouldiers that fled, gaue them other armor and weapons: but yet vpon ſureties, that they ſhould keepe them better thencefoorth, then they had before done. Now Craſſus of the fiue hundred that were in the firſt rankes, and that firſt fled, them he deuided into fiftie times ten, and out of euery one of thoſe he put one of them to death, as the lot fell out: renewing againe the ancient diſcipline of the Romaines to puniſh cowardly ſouldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vſe. For it is a kind of death that bringeth open ſhame withall: and becauſe it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the reſidue afraid afraid to see the terrour of this punishment, Crassus hauing done execution in this sort vpon his men; led his armie against Spartacus, who still drew backe, vntill he came to the sea side through the countrey of the LVCANIANS, where he found in the straight of the far of MESSINA, certaine pirates ships of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And hauing put two thousand men into SICILE, he then reuiued the warre there of the slaues, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked small prouocation to begin it againe. But these pirates hauing promised Spartacus to passe him ouer thither, and also taken gifts of him, deceiued him, and brake their promise. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the sea side, went and camped within a little Ile of the RHEGIANS. Crassus comming thither to seeke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he should doe, determined with a wall to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this little Iland, both to keepe his men occupied frō idlenesse, and his enemies also from victuall. This was a maruellous hard and long peece of worke, notwithstanding Crassus finished it beyond all mens expectation in a very short time, and brought a trench from one side of the sea to the other ouerthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteene foote broade, and so many in height; and vpon the top of this trench built a high wall, of a maruellous strength, whereof Spartacus at the first made light account, and laughed at it. But when pillage began to faile him, and trauelling all about the Ile for victuals, perceiuing himselfe to be shut in with this wal, and that there was no kind of victuals to be had within all the compasse of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boysterous night, the wind being very great, when it snowed exceedingly, set his men on worke, and filled vp a peece of the trench (being a small breadth) with earth, stones and boughes of trees, whereupon he passed ouer the third part of his armie. Crassus at the first then became afraid, lest Spartacus would haue taken his way directly toward ROME: but he was soone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling against Spartacus, went and camped of themselues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by report hath this variable propertie, that at certaine times it changeth and becommeth very sweete, and at some other times againe so salt and brackish as no man can drinke it, Crassus going to set vpon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very farre, because Spartacus came presently to the rescue with his armie, who stayed the chase. Crassus had written letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, and Pompey out of SPAINE, wherof he then repented him, and made all the possible speed he could to end this warre before either of them came thither; knowing, that which of them so euer came to his helpe, to him would the people giue the honour of ending this warre, and not to himselfe. Wherefore he first determined to assaile them that had reuolted from Spartacus, and camped by themselues, who were led by Cains Canictus, and another called Castus. So Crassus sent sixe thousand footmen before to take a hill, commaunding them to lie as close as they could, that their enemies might not discouer them; and so they did, and couered their morians and head-peeces as well as might be, from being seene. Neuertheless they were discouered by two women doing sacrifice for the safety of their armie, and thereupon were all in great hazard of casting away, had not Crassus beene, who came in time to their aid, and gaue the enemies the cruellest battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were slaine of the slaues at that battell twelue thousand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the rest slaine in the place of their rankes, valiantly fighting where they were set in battel ray. Spartacus after this ouerthrow, drew towards the mountaines of PETELY, whither Quintus one of Crassus Liuetenants, and Scrofa his treasurer followed him, still skirmishing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned suddenly vpon them, made the ROMAINES flie that still harried his men in that sort, and hurt Scrofa Crassus treasurer so sore, that he hardly escaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMAINES by this ouerthrow, fell out in the end to the vtter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to such a stoutnesse and pride of themselues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines; but by the way as they went, they compassed them in with their weapons, and told them, that they should goe backe againe with them, whether they would or not, and be brought through LVCANIA against the ROMAINES. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had receiued newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuers were suters for him at ROME to be sent in this iourney, saying, that the last victorie of this warre was due to him, and that he would dispatch it at a battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day cast a trench; which the bondmen seeking to preuent, came with great furie, and set vpon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hot skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side, so that Spartacus in the end perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had set them in order, and that they brought him his horse he was wont to ride on, he drew out his sword, and before them all slue the horse dead in the place, saying: If it be my fortune to win the field, I know I shall haue horse enow to serue my turne; and if I chance to be ouercome, then shall I need no more horses. After that, he flue in among the Romaines, thinking to attaine to fight with Crassus, but he could not come neere him; yet he slue with his owne hands two Romaine Centurions that resisted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forsooke him and fled, so as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies; who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Crassus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had shewed himselfe a noble and valiant Captaine, venturing his person in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honour of ending this warre: for the slaues that scaped from this last battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeys hands, who made an end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus, had ouercome the slaues in battell, but that he himselfe had pulled vp that warre euen by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into Rome, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conquest of Spaine, Crassus also sued not for the great triumph, neither thought he the small Ouation triumph on foote, which they granted him, any honour vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this small triumph, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it differeth from the great triumph, see Marcellus life, where we haue at large discourssed therof. Now Pompey being called to be Consull; Crassus, though he stood in good hope to be chosen Consull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer desirous to make Crassus beholding to him: whereupon he dealt friendly for him, and spake openly in the assembly of the citie, that he would no lesse thanke the people to appoint Crassus his companion and fellow Consull with him, then for making himselfe Consull. But notwithstanding they were both Consuls together in office, their friendship held not, but were euer at iarre, and the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship without any memorable act done sauing that Crassus made a great sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feast for the people of Rome of a thousand tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to find him three moneths. But in the end of their Consulship, at a common councell holden, there was a knight of Rome called Ouatius Aurelius (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the state, and kept most in the countrey) who getting vp to the pulpit for orations, told the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame. Iupiter (saith he) appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus and Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the words, but the people commanded them to be friends. Pompey sate still, and said neuer a word to it. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, and turning him to the people, told them aloud: My Lords of Rome, I doe nothing vnworthy of my selfe, to seeke Pompeys friendship and fauour first, since you your selues haue called him the Great, before he had any haire vpon his face, and that ye gaue him the honor of triumph before he was Senator. And this is all that Crassus did of any account in his Counsulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any act done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goods, although Lutatius Catulus was his colleague and fellow Censor, as gentle a person as any of that time that liued in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entrie into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent act to bring Ægypt to pay tribute to the Romaines Catulus did stoutly withstand him: wherby dissention falling out between them, they both did willingly resigne their office. In that great conspiracie of Catiline, which in maner ouerthrew the whole state and common wealth of Rome, Crassus was had in some iealousie and mistrust, because there was one of the confederates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credite vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassus and Cæsar, as confederates with Catiline: howbeit this oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made also, when his office and authoritie of Consull ceased, he sayd: that Crassus came one night to him, and shewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainely confirming the conspiracie then in examination. For which cause Crassus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meanes of his sonne. For Publius Crassus much fauoring eloquence, and being giuen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in such sort, that vpon his banishment he put on changed garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youths to do the like also, and in fine, perswaded his father to become his friend. Crassus and Cæsar confederates with Catiline. Crassus Ciceros enemie.

Cæsar now returning to ROME from the prouince he had in gouernement, intended to sue for the Consulship: and perceiuing that Pompey and Crassus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with himselfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his suite, he should but procure the other his enemie: and minding therefore to attaine his desire with the fauour of them both, sought first the meanes to make them friends, and perswaded with them, that by their controuersie the one seeking the others vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus and Cato, of the greater authoritie, who of themselues were of no power, if they two ioyned in friendship together: for making both their friends and factions one, they might rule the state and common wealth euen as they would. Cæsar hauing by his perswasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made themselues vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the destruction of the people and Senate of ROME. For he made them not only greater than they were before, the one by the others meanes: but himselfe also of great power through them. For when they began to fauour Cæsar, he was straight chosen Consull without any deniall: and so behaued himselfe in the Consulship, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then sent him to gouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may say, euen themselues to put him into the castle that should keepe all the citie in subiection: imagining that they two should make spoile and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a gouernment. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error, was nothing else, but his extreame ambition. But as for Crassus, besides his old vice of couetousnesse rooted in him, he added to that a new auarice and desire of triumphs and victories, which Cæsars fame for prowesse and noble acts in wars did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwise his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferiour: which furie tooke such hold as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the commonwealth to great miserie. Thus Cæsar being come out of his prouince of GAVLE vnto LVCA, diuers ROMAINES went thither to see him, and among other Pompey and Crassus. They hauing talked with him in secret, agreed among them to deuise to haue the whole power of ROME in their hands: so that Cæsar should keepe his armie together: and Crassus and Pompey should take other prouinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus should againe sue the second time to be Consuls, and that Cæsars friends at ROME should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of chusing the Consuls. Thereupon Pompey and Crassus returned to ROME to that end, but not without suspition of their practise: for there ranne a rumour in the citie, that their meeting of Cæsar in LVCA, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he meant to make suite to be Consull. Pompey answered them: Peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the same question: he answered, he would sue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeys answers were thought very proud and haughty. Howbeit Crassus answered more modestly, that if he saw it necessarie for the commonwealth, he would sue to be Consull: if not, that he would not stand for it. Vpon these words, some were so bold to make suite for the Consulship, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left off their suite for feare of them, Domitius only excepted: whom Cato so prayed and intreated, as his kinsman and friend, that he made him to seeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and how that it was not the Consulship Crassus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyrannie: and that they sued not for the office, but to get such prouinces and armies into their hands as they desired, vnder colour and countenance of the Consulship. Cato ringing these words into their eares, and beleeuing it certainely to be true as he said, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men ioyned with them: because they wondered what the matter meant, that these two noble men should sue the ſecond time to be Conſuls, and why they made ſuite to be ioyned together, and not to haue any other with them, conſidering there were ſo many other worthie men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey feareing he ſhould be preuented of his purpoſe, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongſt other, when the day came to chuſe the Conſuls, Domitius going early in the morning before day, accompanied with his friends to the place where the election ſhould be: his man that caried his torch before him was ſlaine by ſome whom Pompey had laid in waite, and many of the company hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus diſperſed them, he beſet a houſe round about whither they fled for ſuccour, and incloſed them there, vntill they were both choſen Conſuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations and draue Cato out of the market place, and ſlue ſome of them that reſiſted and would not flie. They alſo then prolonged Cæſars gouernement of the GAVLES for fiue yeares more, and procured for themſelues by decree of the people, the countries of SYRIA and SPAINE. Againe, when they drew lots together, SYRIA fell to Craſſus, and SPAINE to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one ſide were loth Pompey ſhould go farre from ROME: and himſelfe alſo louing his wife well, was glad he had occaſion to be ſo neare her, that he might remain the moſt part of his time at ROME. But Craſſus of all other reioyced moſt at his hap, that he ſhould goe into SYRIA: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happieſt turne that euer came to him; for he would euer be talking of the iourney, were he in neuer ſo great or ſtrange company. Furthermore being among his friends and familiars, he would giue out ſuch fond boaſts of it, as no yong man could haue made greater vaunts: which was cleane contrarie to his yeares & nature, hauing liued all his life time as modeſtly, and with as ſmal oſtentation as any man liuing. But then forgetting himſelfe too much, had ſuch fond conceipts in his head, as he not onely hoped after the conqueſt of SYRIA, and of the PARTHIANS, but flattered himſelfe, that the world ſhold ſee all that Lucullus had done againſt king Tigranes, and Pompey againſt king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would ſay) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean ſea towards the Eaſt, though in the decree paſſed by the people, there was no mention made of any wars againſt the PARTHIANS. Now euery man ſaw Craſſus ambition and greedy deſire of honour: in ſo much as Cæſar ſelfe wrote vnto Craſſus out of GAVLE, commending his noble intent and forwardneſſe, and wiſhed him to goe through therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent againſt Craſſus to withſtand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederates with him to further his purpoſe, who much miſliked that any man of a bragery and luſtineſſe ſhould make warre with any nation or people that had no way offended the ROMAINS, but were their friends & confederats) Craſſus fearing this conſpiracy, prayed Pompey to aſſiſt and accompany him out of the city, becauſe he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then. For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpoſe to let Craſſus of his departure, and to cry out vpon him: yet when they ſaw Pompey goe before him, with a pleaſant ſmiling countenane, they quieted themſelues, and made a lane for them, ſuffering them to paſſe on, and ſaid nothing. This notwithſtanding, Atteius The Tribune ſtepped before them, and commanded Craſſus he ſhould not depart the city, with great proteſtations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Craſſus ſtill held on his way notwithſtanding, he commanded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, and to arreſt him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not ſuffer the officers to do it. So the ſergeant diſmiſſed Craſſus. Then Atteius running towards the gates of the citie, got a chafindiſh with coales, and ſet it in the middeſt of the ſtreet. When Craſſus came againſt it, he caſt in certain perfumes, and made ſprinklings ouer it, pronouncing horrible curſes, and calling vpon terrible and ſtrange names of gods. The ROMAINES ſay, that thoſe maner of curſes are very ancient, but yet very ſecret, and of ſo great force, as he that is once curſed with that curſe can neuer eſcape it, nor he that vſeth it doth neuer proſper after it. And therefore few men doe vſe it, and neuer but vpon vrgent occaſion. But then they much reproued Atteius, for vſing theſe dreadfull ceremonies and extreme curſes, which were much hurtfull to the commonwealth, although he for countries ſake had thus curſed Craſſus. Craſſus ſetting forward notwithſtanding, ſailed on, and arriued at BRVNDVSIVM, when winter ſtormes had not left the ſeas, and he had loſt many of his ſhips: howbeit he landed his armie, and marched through the countrie of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man, and yet building a new city: and to taunt him pretily, ſaid vnto him:

Pompey made himſelfe and Craſſus Conſuls by force.

What

What, O King, begin you to build now in the afternoone? To whom the king of the GALATIANS againe ſmileing made anſwer: And truly Sir Captaine, you go not very early (me thinks) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Craſſus was threeſcore and vpward, and yet his face made him ſeeme elder then he was. But to our ſtorie againe. Craſſus being come into the countrey, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he eaſily built a bridge vpon the riuer of Euphrates, and paſſed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So entring into MESOPOTAMIA, he receiued many cities that of good will yeelded themſelues vnto him. Howbeit there was one citie named ZENODOTIA, whereof Appolonius was tyrant, where Craſſus loſt a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke it by force, ſacked their goods, and ſold the priſoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this city ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the ſame Craſſus ſuffered his men to call him Imperator, to ſay, ſoueraigne Captaine: which turned to his ſhame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a baſe minde as one that had ſmall hope to attaine to great things, making ſuch reckoning of ſo ſmall a trifle. Thus when he had beſtowed ſeuen thouſand of his footmen in garriſon in thoſe cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thouſand horſemen, he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his ſonne Publius Craſſus to him out of GAVLE from Iulius Cæſar, who had giuen him ſuch honors, as Generals of ROME did vſe to giue ſuch valiant ſouldiers for reward of their good ſeruice: and brought vnto his father a thouſand men of armes, all choiſe men This me thinkes was the greateſt fault Craſſus committed in all his enterpriſe of that warre. For when he ſhould preſently haue gone on ſtill, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, and gaue them leaſure to prepare to encounter his force when he ſhould come againſt them. Againe, they found great fault with him for ſpending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, ſeeming rather to leade a merchants life, than a chiefetaines. For he neuer ſaw his armie, nor trained them out to any martiall exerciſe, but fell to counting the reuenew of the cities, and was many dayes buſily occupied weyghing of the gold and ſiluer in the temple of the goddeſſe Hierapolis. And worſe then that: he ſent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furniſh him with a certain number of men of warre, and then he would diſcharge them for a ſumme of money. All theſe things made him to be both ill ſpoken of, and deſpiſed of euery bodie. The firſt token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddeſſe Hierapolis, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be Venus, other ſay Iuno and others, that ſhe is the mother and chiefe cauſe that giueth beginning of moiſture to euerie thing that commeth foorth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cauſe alſo of euerie good thing. For as Craſſus the father, and ſonne both, were coming out of the temple, Craſſus the yonger fell firſt on his face, and the father afterwards vpon his ſonne. Likewiſe as he was gathering his gariſons together, calling them out of the cities into the field, there came Ambaſſadours vnto him from Arſaces king of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their meſſage in few words, and told him, that if this armie he brought came from the ROMAINES to make warre with their maiſter, then that he would haue no peace nor friendſhip with them, but would make mortall warres againſt them. Further, if it were (as he had heard ſay) that Craſſus againſt the peoples minds of ROME, for his owne couetous deſire, and peculiar profite was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their countrey: then in that reſpect Arſaces would deale more fauourably, in conſideration of Craſſus yeares, and was contented alſo to ſuffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in priſon, then in garriſon within his cities. Thereto Craſſus couragiouſly anſwered, that he would make them anſwer in the citie of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagiſes, one of the eldeſt Ambaſſadours fell a laughing, and ſhewing Craſſus the palme of his hand, told him thus: Haire will ſooner grow in the palme of my hand, Craſſus, then you will come to SELEVCIA. In this ſort the Ambaſſadours tooke their leaue of Craſſus, and returned to their king Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane ſpace, certaine of Craſſus ſouldiers whom he had left in garriſon in the cities of MESOPOTAMIA, hauing ſcaped maruellous dangerouſly and with great difficultie, brought him newes of importance, hauing themſelues ſeene the wonderfull great campe of the enemies, and their maner of fight in the aſſaults they made to the cities where they lay in garriſon. And, as it falleth out commonly among men eſcaped from any danger, making things more fearefull and dangerous then they be indeed, they reported that it was vnpoſſible by flying to ſaue themſelues, if they did follow in chaſe: neither to ouertake them alſo if they fled. And further, that they had ſuch kind of arrowes as would flie ſwifter then a mans eye could diſcerne them, and would pierce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who ſhot them. Beſides, for the horſemens weapons they vſed, that they were ſuch, as no armour could poſſibly hold out: and their armours on the other ſide made of ſuch a temper and mettall, as no force of any thing could pierce them through, The Romaines hearing theſe newes, fell from their former ſtoutneſſe and courage, being borne in hand before, that the Parthians differed nothing at all from the Armenians and Cappadocians, whō Lucullus had ouercome and ſpoiled ſo oft, that he was wearie withal: and they had already made account, that their greateſt paines in this warre, was but the tediouſneſſe of the iourney they had to make, and the trouble they ſhould haue to follow thoſe men that would not abide them. But then contrary to expectation, they looked to come to ſtroakes, & to be luſtily fought withal. Herupon, diuerſe Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Caßius the treaſurer was one) aduiſed Craßus to ſtay, and to deliberate in councel to know whether he were beſt to go on, or to remaine where he was. The ſoothſayers themſelues did partly let Craſſus vnderſtand, that the gods ſhewed no good tokens in all their ſacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Craſſus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only liſtned to them that counſelled him to make haſte. Yet Craſſus chiefeſt comfort and incouragement, was of Artabazes king of Armenia, who came to his camp with ſix thouſand horſe, which were but only the kings cornet and gard. Againe, he promiſed him other ten thouſand horſemen all armed and barbed, and thirtie thouſand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counſelled Craſſus to enter the Parthians countrey vpon Armeniaes ſide: becauſe his campe ſhold not onely haue plenty of victuals, which he would ſend him out of his countrey, but for that he ſhould alſo march in more ſafety, hauing a countrey full of mountaines and woods before him, very ill for horſemen, which was the only ſtrength and force of the Parthians. Craſſus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, and all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iourney through Mesopotamia, where he had left many good ſouldiers of the Romaines. And thus departed the king of Armenia from him. But now as Craſſus was paſſing his armie vpon the bridge he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, there fel out ſudden ſtrange and terrible crackes of thunder, with fearefull flaſhes of lightning full in the ſouldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke cloud came a wonderfull ſtorme and tempeſt of wind vpon the bridge, that the maruellous force thereof ouerthrew a great part of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Beſides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twiſe ſtricken with two great thunder-claps. One of his great horſe in like caſe, being brauely furniſhed and ſet out, tooke the bit in his teeth, leapt into the riuer with the rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and neuer ſeene after. They ſay alſo, that the firſt Eagle and enſigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it ſelfe, without any hands layd vpon it. Further it fortuned that as they were diſtributing the victuals vnto the ſouldiers, after they had all paſſed ouer the bridge, the firſt thing that was giuen them, was ſalt and water lintels, which the Romaines take for a token of death and mourning, becauſe they vſe it at the funerals of the dead. After all this, when Craſſus was exhorting his ſouldiers, a word ſcaped his mouth that troubled the armie maruellouſly. For he told them, that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer the riuer Euphrates, of purpoſe, becauſe there ſhould not a man of them returne backe again. Where indeed when he had ſeene that they took this word in ill part, he ſhould haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, ſeeing his men ſo amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was ſo willfull. In the end he made ordinarie ſacrifice for the purging of his armie: and when the Soothſayer gaue him the intrailes of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, they fell out of his hands. Craſſus perceiuing that the ſtanders by were troubled withall fell a laughing, and told them. You ſee what age is: yet ſhall you not ſee my ſword fall out of my hand. So hauing ended his ſacrifice, he began to march forward into the countrey by the riuers ſide, with ſeuen legions of footmen, and little lacke of foure thouſand horſe, and in manner as many ſhot and ſlings lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his ſcoutes that had viewed the country, and told him there was not an enemie to be ſeene in the field, howbeit that they had found the tracke of a maruellous number of horſe, which ſeemed as if they were returned backe. Then Craßus firſt of all began to hope well: and his ſouldiers alſo they fell to deſpiſe the Parthians, thinking certainely that they would not come to battell with them.

Yet

Yet Cassius his treasurer euer perswaded him the contrarie, and thought it better for him to refresh his army a little in one of the cities where he had his garrison, vntill such time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or else that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riuer side, which lay fit for him to victuall himselfe easily by boats that wold alwaies follow his campe & should be sure besides that the enemies could not enuiron him behind, so that hauing no way to set vpon them but before, they should haue none aduantage of them. Crassus going about then to consult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtill fellow, which was the greatest mischiefe and euill that fortune could send to Crassus at that present time, to bring him to vtter ruine and destruction. For there were some of Crassus soldiers that had serued Pompey before in that country, who knew him very wel, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleasures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMAINS. But Ariamnes had been laboured at that time by the king of PARTHIAES Captaines, and was won by them to deceiue Crassus, and to entice him all he could, to draw him from the riuer and the wooddy country, and to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compasse him in with their horsmen, for they meant nothing lesse then to fight with the ROMAINES at the swords point. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes comming to Crassus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Crassus armie, reprouing him that he came to slowly forward, tracting time in that sort as he did, preparing himselfe as though he had neede of armour and weapon, and not of feet and hands swift & ready against the enemies: who for the chiefest of thē) had of long time occupied thēselues to flie with their best moueables, towards the desarts of SCYTHIA & HYRCANIA. Therfore if you determine (said he) to fight, it were good you made hast to meet them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For now you haue but Surena and Syllaces, two of his Lieutenants against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you, that you follow him not: & for the king himself, be bold he meaneth not to trouble you, But he lyed in all. For king Hyrodes had diuided his army in two parts at the first, wherof himself tooke the one, and went to spoile the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surena against the ROMAINES, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdaine to come to battell with him, being one of the chiefest noblemē of ROME, and to thinke it more honourable to make war with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpose to auoide the greater danger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with safety see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turne the ROMAINES backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the second person of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputation, valour and experience in wars, the chiefest of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena when he did but remoue into the countrey onely with his household, had a thousand camels to cary his sumpters, and 200 coaches of Curtisans, a thousand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many mo besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine and court made aboue 10000 horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancestors, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the royall crowne or diadem vpon the kings head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrodes that then reigned, to his crowne, who had been before driuen out of his realme: and had won him the great citie of SELEVCIA, himselfe being the first man that scaled the wals, and ouerthrew them with his owne hands that resisted him. And though he was vnder thirty yeares of age, yet they counted him a wise man, as well for his counsel as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus: who through his rashnesse and folly at the first, & afterwards for very feare & timorousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policie or deceit. Now this barbarous captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Crassus to beleeue all that he said, and drawne him by perswasion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plain country, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sands where their feet sunke deep, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could discern by eye, so that not only extreame thirst, and miserable way maruelously amazed the ROMAINS, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that aboue all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For neither farre nor neere any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, grasse, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endleſſe ſea of deſert ſands on euery ſide round about their campe. Then began they to ſuſpect that they were betrayed. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his countrey with a great warre king Hyrodes made vpon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promiſe come to aide him, yet that he wiſhed him to draw towards ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together, they might the better fight with king Hyrodes; if not, that he would alwaies keepe the wooddy countrie, marching in thoſe vallies and places where his horſemen might be ſafe, and about the mountaines: Craſſus was ſo wilfull, as he would write no anſwer to it, but angerly told the meſſenger, that he had no leaſure then to hearken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwards he would be reuenged wel enough of Artabazes treaſon. Caſſius his treaſurer was much offended with Craſſus for his anſwer: howbeit perceiuing he could doe no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in ill part, he ſaid vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithſtanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARMENIANS aſide, he rebuked him roundly, and ſayd: O thou wretch, what curſed deuill hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly haſt thou bewitched and charmed Craſſus: that thou haſt made him bring his army into this endleſſe deſert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captain of theeues, then for a Generall and Conſull of the ROMAINES? Ariamnes being craftie and ſubtill, ſpeaking gently vnto Caſſius, did comfort him, and prayed him to haue patience; and going and coming by the bands, ſeeming to helpe the ſouldiers, he told them merily: O my fellowes, I beleeue you thinke to march through the countrey of NAPLES, and looke to meet with your pleaſant ſprings, goodly groues of wood, your naturall baths, and the good Innes round about to refreſh you, and do not remember that you paſſe through the deſerts of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMAINES a while: but afterwards he diſlodged betimes, before he was openly knowne for a traytour, and yet not without Craſſus priuity, whom he bare in hand, that he would goe ſet ſome broile and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Craſſus the very ſame day came out of his tent not in his coate armour of ſcarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMAINE Generals) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring himſelfe, he ſtraight changed it againe. It is ſaid moreouer, that the enſigne-bearers when they ſhould march away, had much ado to plucke their enſignes out of the ground, they ſtucke ſo faſt, But Craſſus ſcoffing at the matter, haſtened them the more to march forward, compelling the footmen to go as faſt as the horſemen, till a few of their skouts came in, whom they had ſent to diſcouer: who brought newes how the enemies had ſlaine their fellowes, and what ado they had themſelues to ſcape with life, and that they were a maruellous great armie, and wel appointed to giue them battell. This newes made all the campe afraid, but Craſſus ſelf more then the reſt, ſo as he began to ſet his men in battell ray, being for haſt in manner beſides himſelfe. At the firſt following Caſſius mind, he ſet his ranks wide, caſting his ſouldiers into a ſquare battell, a good way aſunder one from another, becauſe he would take in as much of the plaine as he could, to keepe the enemies from compaſſing them in, and ſo diuided the horſmen into the wings. Yet afterwards he changed his mind againe, and ſtraighted the battell of his footmen, faſhioning it like a bricke, more long then broad, making a front and ſhewing their faces euery way. For there were twelue cohorts or enſignes imbattelled on either ſide, and by euery cohort a company of horſe, becauſe there ſhould be no place left without aide of horſemen, and that all his battell ſhould be alike defended. Then he gaue Caſſius the leading of one wing, his ſonne Publius Craſſus the other, and himſelfe led the battell in the middeſt. In this order they marched forward, till he came to a little brooke called Baliſſus, where there was no great ſtore of water, but yet happily lighted on for the ſoldiers, for the great thirſt and extreame heate they had abidden all that painfull way, where they had met with no water before. There the moſt part of Craſſus Captaines thought beſt to campe all night, that they might in the meane time find meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Craſſus yeelding to his ſons and his horſemens perſwaſion, who intreated him to march on with his armie, and to ſet vpon the enemies preſently: commanded, that ſuch as would eate, ſhould eate ſtanding, keeping their rankes. Yet on the ſudaine, before this commandement could runne through the whole armie, he commaunded them againe to march, not faire and ſoftly, as when they go to giue battell, but with ſpeed, till they ſpied the enemies, who ſeemed not to the ROMAINS at the firſt to be ſo great a number, neither ſo brauely armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpoſe pose hid them, with certaine troupes he sent before: and to hide their bright armour, he had cast cloakes and beasts skins ouer them, but when both the armies approached neare the one to the other, and that the signe to giue charge was lift vp in the aire: first they filled the field with a dreadful noise to heare. For the PARTHIANS do not encourage their men to fight with ỹ sound of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboies, but with great kettle drums hollow within, and about them they hang litle bels and copper rings, and with them they all make a noise euery where together; and it is like a dead sound, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wild beast, and a feareful noise as if it thundred, knowing that hearing is one of the senses that sooneſt moueth the heart and spirit of any man, and maketh him sooneſt beside himselfe. The ROMAINES being put in feare with this dead sound, the PARTHIANS straight threw the cloaths and couerings from them that hid their armor, & then shewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempred steele, that glared like fire, & their horses barbed with steele & copper. And Surena also, Generall of the PARTHIANS, who was a goodly personage, and as valiant as any other in all his host, though his beauty somewhat effeminate, in iudgement shewed small likelihood of any such courage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the fashion of the MEDES, contrarie to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their haire grow after ỹ fashion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the first thought to haue set vpon the ROMAINES with their pikes, to see if they could breake their first ranks. But when they drew neare, & saw the depth of the ROMAINS battel standing close together, firmly keeping their ranks, thē they gaue backe, making as though they fled, and dispersed themselues. But the ROMAINES maruelled when they found it contrarie, and that it was but a deuice to enuiron them on euery side. Whereupon Crassus commanded his shot and light armed men to assaile thē, the which they did: but they went not far, they were so beaten in with arrowes and driuen to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both feared and troubled the ROMAINES, when they saw the vehemencie and great force of the enemies shot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it neuer so hard or soft. The PARTHIANS thus still drawing backe, shot all together on euery side, not aforehand, but at aduenture: for the battel of the ROMAINES stood so neare together, as if they would, they could not misse the killing of some. These bowmen drew a great strength & had big, strong bowes, which sent the arrows frō them with a wonderfull force. The ROMANS by meanes of these bows were in hard state. For if they kept their ranks, they were grieuously wounded: again, if they left thē, and sought to run vpon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand with them, they saw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme themselues. For as fast as the ROMAINES came vpon them, so fast did the PARTHIANS flie from them, and yet in flying continued still their shooting: which no nation but the SCYTHIANS could better do then they, being a matter indeed most greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they best do saue themselues, and fighting still, they thereby shun the shame of that their flying. The ROMAINES still defended themselues, and held it out so long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leaue fighting when they had spent their arrowes, or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderstood that there were a great number of camels loden with quiuers ful of arrows, where the first that had bestowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Crassus seeing no end of their shot, began to faint, and sent to Publius his son, willing him in any case to charge vpon the enemies, and to giue an onset, before they were compassed in on euery side. For it was on Publius side, that one of the wings of the enemies battell was neareſt vnto them, and where they rode vp and down to compasse them behind. Wherupon Crassus sonne taking thirteene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thousand were of the men of armes whom Iulius Cæsar sent) and fiue hundred shot, with eight ensignes of footmen hauing targets, most neare to the place where himselfe then was: he put them out in breadth, that wheeling about they might giue a charge vpon them that rode vp and downe. But they seeing him coming, turned straight their horse and fled, either because they met in a marish, or else of purpose to beguile this young Crassus, inticing him thereby as far from his father as they could. Publius Crassus seeing them flie, cryed out, These men will not abide vs; & so spurred on for life after thē: so did Censorinus & Megabacchus with him (the one a Senator of ROME a very eloquent man, the other a stout couragious valiant man of war) both of them Crassus well approued friends, and in maner of his own yeres. Now the horsemen of the ROMAINES being trained out thus to the chaſe, their footmen alſo would not abide behind, nor ſhew themſelues to haue leſſe hope, ioy and courage, then their horſemen had. For they thought all had beene won, and that there was no more to doe, but to follow the chaſe: till they were gone far from the armie, and then they found the deceipt. For the horſemen that fled before them, ſuddenly turned againe, and a number of others beſides came and ſet vpon them. Whervpon they ſtayed, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were ſo few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they ſet out againſt them their men at armes with their barbed horſe, & made their light horſemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping vp and downe the plaine, whirled vp the ſand hils from the bottome with their horſe feet, which raiſed ſuch a wonderfull duſt, that the ROMAINES could ſcarce ſee or ſpeake one to another. For they being ſhut vp into a little roome, and ſtanding cloſe one to another, were ſore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguiſh and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting themſelues vpon the ſand, they brake their arrowes ſticking in them. Againe, ſtriuing by force to plucke out the forked arrow heads that had pierced farre into their bodies through their veines and ſinewes, thereby they opened their wounds wider, and ſo caſt themſelues away. Many of them died thus miſerably martyred: and ſuch as died not, were not able to defend themſelues. Then when Publius Craſſus prayed and beſought them to charge the men at armes with the barbed horſe, they ſhewed him their hands faſt nailed to the targets with arrows, and their feet likewiſe ſhot through and nailed to the ground: ſo as they could neither flie nor yet defend themſelues. Thereupon himſelfe encouraging his horſemen, went and gaue charge, and did valiantly ſet vpon the enemies, but it was with too great diſaduantage, both for offence, and alſo for defence. For himſelfe and his men with weake and light ſtaues, brake vpon them that were armed with curaces of ſteele, or ſtiffe leather iackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrary maner with mighty ſtrong pikes gaue charge vpon theſe GAVLES, which were either vnarmed, or elſe but lightly armed. Yet thoſe were they in whom Craſſus moſt truſted, hauing done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they receiued the PARTHIANS pikes in their hands, and tooke them about the middles, and threw them off their horſe, where they lay on the ground, and could not ſtirre for the weight of their harneſſe: and there were diuerſe of them alſo that lighting from their horſe, lay vnder their enemies horſe bellies, and thruſt their ſwords into them. Their horſe flinging and bounding in the aire for very paine threw their maſters vnder feete, and their enemies one vpon another, and in the end fell dead among them. Moreouer, extreame heate and thirſt did maruellouſly comber the GAVLES, who were vſed to abide neither of both: and the moſt part of their horſe were ſlaine, charging with all their power vpon the men at armes of the PARTHIANS, and ſo ranne themſelues in vpon the points of their pikes. At the length, they were driuen to retire towards their footmen, & Publius Craſſus among them, who was very ill by reaſon of the wounds he had receiued. And ſeeing a ſand hill by chance not farre from them, they went thither, and ſetting their horſe in the middeſt of it, compaſſed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defend themſelues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the country being plain, they in the foremoſt rankes did ſomewhat couer them behind, but they that were behind, ſtanding higher then they that ſtood foremoſt (by reaſon of the nature of the hil that was higheſt in the middeſt (could by no meanes ſaue themſelues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miſeries and misfortune, that muſt needs die without reuenge, or declaration of their valiancie. At that preſent time there were two GRECIANS about Publius Craſſus, Hieronymus, and Nichomachus, who dwelt in thoſe quarters, in the citie of CARRES: they both counſelled Publius Craſſus to ſteale away with them, and to flie to a citie called ISCHNES, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMAINES part. But Publius anſwered them, that there was no death ſo cruel as could make him forſake them that died for his ſake. When he had ſo ſaid, wiſhing them to ſaue themſelues, he embraced them, and tooke his leaue of them: and being very ſore hurt with the ſhot of an arrow through one of his hands, commanded one of his gentlemen to thruſt him through with a ſword, and ſo turned his ſide to him for the purpoſe. It is reported Cenſorinus did the like. But Megabacchus ſlue himſelfe with his owne hands, and ſo did the moſt part of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for thoſe that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got vp the ſand hill, and fighting with them, thruſt them through with their ſpeares and pikes, and tooke but fiue hundred priſoners. After that, they ſtroke off Publius Craſſus

The death of Publius Craſſus

Craſſus head, and thereupon returned ſtraight to ſet vpon his father Craſſus, who was then in this ſtate. Craſſus the father, after he had willed his ſon to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purſued the chaſe: and perceiuing alſo that they that remained in their great battell, did not preaſſe vpō him ſo neare as they did before, becauſe that a great number of them were gone after the other for reſcue: he then began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men cloſe, retired with them the beſt he could by a hils ſide, looking euer that his ſonne would not be long before that he returned from the chaſe. But Publius ſeeing himſelfe in danger, had ſent diuers meſſengers to his father, to aduertiſe him of his diſtreſſe, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and ſlue by the way; and the laſt meſſengers he ſent, ſcaping very hardly, brought Craſſus newes, that his ſonne was but caſt way, if he did not preſently aid him, and that with a great power. Theſe newes were grieuous to Craſſus in two reſpects: firſt for the feare he had, ſeeing himſelfe in danger to loſe all: and ſecondly, for the vehement deſire he had to go to his ſons helpe. Thus he ſaw in reaſon all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power to the reſcue of his ſonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his ſons ouerthrow, with a more dreadfull noiſe and cry of victorie, then euer before: and thereupon their deadly ſounding drummes filled the aire with their wonderfull noiſe. The ROMAINES then looked ſtraight for a hot alarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Craſſus head vpon the point of a launce, comming neere to the ROMAINES, ſhewed them his head, and asked them in deriſion, if they knew what houſe he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (ſaid they) that ſo noble and valiant a yong man, ſhould be the ſon of ſo cowardly a father, as Craſſus. The ſight of Publius Craſſus head killed the ROMAINES hearts more then any other danger they had been in at any time in all the battell. For it did not ſet their hearts on fire as it ſhould haue done, with anger, and deſire of reuenge: but far otherwiſe, made them quake for feare & ſtroke them ſtark dead to behold it. Yet Craſſus ſelfe ſhewed greater courage in this misfortune, then he before had done in all the warre beſide. For riding by euery band he cried out aloud: The griefe and ſorrow of this loſſe (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine onely: but the noble ſucceſſe & honor of ROME remaineth ſtill vnuincible, ſo long as you are yet liuing. Now if you pitie my loſſe of ſo noble and valiant a ſon, my good ſouldiers, let me intreat you to turne your ſorrow into furie: make them dearely buy the ioy they haue gotten: be reuenged of their crueltie, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why, aſpiring minds ſometime muſt needs ſuſtaine loſſe. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, but their bloud did pay for it. Our anceſtors in old time loſt a thouſand ſhips, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and Chiefetaines for the conqueſt of SICILIA: yet for all the loſſe of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquiſhed. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatneſſe it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and conſtant ſuffering of trouble and aduerſitie, neuer yeelding or giuing place vnto any danger. Craſſus vſing theſe perſwaſions to encourage his ſouldiers for reſolution, found that all his words wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commanded them to giue the ſhoute of battell, he plainely ſaw their hearts were done, for that their ſhout roſe but faint, and not al alike. The PARTHIANS on the other ſide their ſhout was great, and luſtily they rang it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the PARTHIANS archers on horſeback compaſſing in the ROMAINES vpon the wings, ſhot an infinite number of arrowes at their ſides. But their men at armes giuing charge vpō the front of the ROMAINES battel with their great lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in deſperate manner ran in among them, as men rather deſiring ſo to die, then to be ſlaine with their arrowes, where they could doe the PARTHIANS almoſt no hurt at all. So were they ſoone diſpatcht, with the great lances that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with ſuch a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, ſaying: they would giue Craſſus that nightes reſpit, to lament and bewaile his ſonnes death: vnleſſe that otherwiſe he wiſely looking about him, thought it better for his ſafety to come and offer himſelf to king Arſaces mercy, then to tarry to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMAINES, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The ROMAINES on the other ſide had a maruellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dreſſe their wounded men that died in miſerable pain: but euery man bewailed his hard fortune, when they ſaw not one of them could eſcape, if they tarried till the morning. On the other ſide, to depart in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Because, to carie them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them so behind, their pitifull cries would giue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now though they all thought Crassus the only author of their miserie, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went aside without light, and layd him downe with his head couered; because he would see no man, shewing thereby the common sort an example of vnstable fortune: and the wise men, a good learning to know the fruits of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to command so many thousand men, but thought (as a man would say) himselfe the meanest of all other, and one that possest nothing, because he was accounted inferior vnto two persons onely, Pompey and Cæsar, Notwithstanding, Octauius one of his Chiefetaines, and Cassius the Treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so ouercome with sorrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirit in him, they themselues called the Captaines and Centurions together, and sate in councell for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarying for them. Thus of their owne authoritie at the first they made the armie march away without any found of trumpet or other noise. But immediatly after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting themselues in such sort, that they filled the whole campe with sorrow, and put them out of all order with the great moane and loud lamentation: so as the foremost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and set vpon them. Then turning ofte, and setting themselues in batell ray, one while loading their beasts with the wounded men, another while vnloading them againe, they were left behind, hauing three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the city of Carres. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the wals, and spake in the Latine tongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernor of the towne, that Crassus had fought a great battell with the Parthians, and said no more, neither told he what he was: but rode on stil, til he came to the bridge which Crassus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, serued Crassus turne very well. For Coponius thought by this great hast of his, and the short confused speech he made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight armed his souldiers, and vnderstanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meet him, and brought him and his armie into the citie of Carres. The Parthians knew wel inough of the remouing of the Romaines campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, slue all that were left behind, which were aboue foure thousand men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many stragglers in the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Crassus Lieuetenants, who stayed in the night out of the army with foure whole enfignes, and hauing lost his way, got a hill, where the Parthians besieged him, slue him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himselfe: yet twentie of them onely escaped, who with their swords drawne in their hands, running forwards with their heads, thrust in among the thickest of the Parthians, They wondering at their desperation, opened of themselues, and suffered them to march on towards the city of Carres. In the meane time false newes was brought to Surena, how Crassus with al the chiefest men of his host was fled, and that the great number that were receiued into the citie of Carres were men of all sorts gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie or estimation. Surena thereupon thinking he had lost the honour of his victorie, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the truth, that he might either besiege the citie of Carres, or pursue after Crassus: sent one of his interpreters to the wals of the citie, charging him to call for Crassus or Cassius, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commanded. Word was brought to Crassus, & he accepted parlence. Shortly after also, thither came certaine soldiers of the Arabians from the campe of the Parthians, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by sight, hauing diuers times seen them in their campe before the battel. These Arabians seeing Cassius vpon the wals, told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go safely, as his masters good friends, so that they would surrender Mesopotamia into the king of Parthians hands; and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather then to be enforced vnto it by extreamitie. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassus and Surena should ſhould meet to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made anſwer they would do it; and ſo departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at ſuch aduantage, where he might beſiege them. The next day he brought all his armie before the citie of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS maruellouſly reuiled the ROMAINES, and told them, they muſt deliuer them Craſſus and Caſſius bound hands and feete, if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The ROMAINES were maruellouſly offended that they were thus deceiued, and told Craſſus that it was no boote any longer to look for aide of the ARMENIANS, but preſently to flie: howbeit to keep in ſecret in any wiſe from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Craſſus ſelf had told it to Andromachus the verieſt traitor & villaine in all the city, whom he had choſen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertiſed the enemies in euery point, of their purpoſe and departure. But becauſe the PARTHIANS do neuer vſe to fight in the night, and that it was a hard matter to bring them to it; and againe that Craſſus departed in the night time: Andromachus was afraid leſt the ROMAINS would win ſuch ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not poſſibly ouertake them the next day. Therfore of purpoſe he ſometime brought them one way, other while another way, and at the laſt, brought them into a great bogge or mariſh, ful of deepe holes and ditches, and where they muſt needs makes many turnes, and returnes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, ſome in the armie began to miſtruſt, that Andromachus meant no good, to turne and toſſe them vp and downe in that ſort, and therfore would follow him no more: inſomuch as Caſſius among others, returned towards the citie of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counſelled him to tarie there till the Moone were out of the ſigne of Scorpio, he anſwered them: I feare the ſigne of Sagitarie more. So as ſoone as he could, he tooke his way towards ASSYRIA with fiue hundred horſemen. And other of the army alſo hauing faithful guides, recouered a country of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retired into a ſafe place before the break of day: and they were about fiue hundred men, whom Octauius a noble man had in charge. But the day ſtole vpon Craſſus, hunting vp and down yet in the mariſh, in thoſe ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpoſe brought him, hauing with him 4 enſignes of footmen all with targets, and very few horſmen, and fiue ſergeants that caried the axes and rods before him; with whom, with much ado and great labour he got into the right way when the enemies were almoſt vpon him, and that he was within twelue furlongs of ioyning with Octauius. There in haſt he had gotten a hill, which was not ſo ſteep for horſemen, neither of ſuch ſtrength as the other hils were, called Sinnaces; yet vnder them, & ioyning to them by a long hil that runneth along the plaine, ſo as Octauius plainely ſaw the danger Craſſus was in. Therupon he firſt ran downe the hils with a few of his men that followed him: but after alſo came all the reſt, ſaying they were cowards if they ſhould tarie behind. At their comming they gaue ſuch a hote onſet vpon the PARTHIANS, that they made them giue backe from that hill: and compaſſing Craſſus in the middeſt of them, couering him round with their targets, they ſpake nobly, that neuer arrow of the PARTHIANS, ſhould touch the body of their General, before they were ſlaine one after another, and that they had fought it out to the laſt man in his defence. Herupon Surena perceiuing the PARTHIANS were not ſo couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came vpon them, and that the ROMAINES did once recouer the high mountaines, they could neuer poſſibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Craſſus once more by this deuice. He let certain priſoners go of purpoſe, before whom he made his men giue out this ſpeech that the king of PARTHIA would haue no mortal war with the ROMAINES; but far otherwiſe: he rather deſired their friendſhip, by ſhewing them ſome notable fauour, as to vſe Craſſus very courteouſly, And to giue colour to this bruite, he called his men from fight, and going himſelf in perſon towards Craſſus, with the chiefeſt of the nobilitie of his hoaſt, in quiet maner, his bow vnbent, he held out his right hand, and called Craſſus to talke with him of peace, and ſaid vnto him: Though the ROMAINES had felt the force and power of their king, it was againſt his will, for he could do no leſſe but defend himſelf; howbeit that now he was very willing and deſirous to make them taſt of his mercy and clemencie, and was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go ſafely where they would. Al the ROMAINES beſides Craſſus were glad of Surenaes words. But Craſſus that had been deceiued before by their crafty fetches & deuices, conſidering alſo no cauſe apparant to make them change thus ſuddenly, wold not harken to it, but firſt conſulted with his friends. Howbeit the ſoldiers they cryed out on him to go, and ſel at words with him, saying, that he cared not though they were all slaine, and that himselfe had not the heart only to come downe and talke with the enemies that were vnarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by faire meanes, perswading them to haue a little patience but till night, which was at hand, and then they might safely depart at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines & streight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint hearted, nor to despaire of their safety, seeing they were so neare it. But in the end Crassus perceiuing they fell to mutinie, and beating of their harnesse, did threaten him if he went not: fearing then they wold do him some villanie, went towards the enemie, and comming backe a litle, said only these words: O Octauius, and you Petronius, with al you ROMAINE gentlemen that haue charge in this armie, you all see now how against my wil I am inforced to go to the place I would not, and can witnesse with me, how I am driuen with shame and force; yet I pray you, if your fortunes be to escape this danger, that ye will report wheresoeuer you come, that Crassus was slaine, not deliuered vp by his owne souldiers into the hands of the barbarous people, as I am, but deceiued by the fraud and subtiltie of his enemies. Octauius would not tary behind on the hill, but went downe with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS vnto Crassus were two mongrell GRECIANS, who dismounting from their horse, saluted him, and prayed him to send some of his men before, and Surena would shew them, that both himselfe and his traine came vnarmed towards him. Crassus thereto made him answer, that if he had made any account of his life, he wold not haue put himselfe into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before called the ROSCIANS, to know what number of men, and to what end they met so many togeher. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were staid, and himselfe in the meane time kept on his way a horsebacke, with the noblest men of his armie. Now when Surena came neare to Crassus: Why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? a Consull and Lieutenant generall of ROME on foot, and we on horsebacks? Therwithall he straight commanded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus answered Surena againe: In that they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their countrey, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreed vpon between the king Hyrodes and the ROMAINES; howbeit that they were to goe to the riuer, and there to set downe the articles in writing: for you ROMAINES (said he) do not greatly remember the capitulations you haue agreed vpon. With those words he gaue him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse; You shal not need, saith Surena; for look, the king doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steele saddle richly gilt; vpon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassus immediatly, and following him behind lashed his horse to make him runne the swifter. Octauius seeing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thousand footmen; and after them, all the rest of the ROMAINES also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and to take him from them by force that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last fel to blowes. Then Octauius drew out his sword, and slue one of the barbarous noblemens horsekeepers: and another came behind him and slue Octauius. Petronius had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slue Crassus. Some say notwithstanding that Pomaxathres slue him not, but another; yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fel dead to the ground. But all these reports are rather coniectures, thē any certaintie. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crassus, and other saued themseleues by flying to the hil. The PARTHIANS followed them, and told thē that Crassus had paid the paine he had deserued; and for the rest, that Surena bad them come downe with safetie. Then some of them yeelded to their enimies, and other dispersed themselues when night came, and of them very few escaped with life. Others being followed & pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sword. So as it is thought there were slaine in this ouerthrow about twentie thousand men, and ten thousand taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes the king his maister, into ARMENIA, and gaue out a bruite as farre as the city of SELEVCIA, that he brought Crassus aliue, and that he had prepared a sight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the ROMAIN prisoners, there was one called Caius Pacianus who was very like Crassus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to answer, when any called him Crassus, or Lord captain. Him they put a horseback, and

and had many trumpets before him, and Sergeants vpon Camels backes, that caried axes before him, and bundels of rods, and many purses tied to the bundels of rods, and ROMAINES heads newly cut off tied to the axes: and after him followed all the strumpets and women minstrels of SELEVCIA, who went singing of songs of mockerie and derision of Crassus womanish cowardlinesse. Now for these open shewes, euery one might see them: but besides that sight, Surena hauing called the Senate of SELEVCIA together, layd before them Aristides bookes of ribaldrie, intituled The Milesians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMAINS fardle or trusse called Rustins. This gaue Surena great cause to scorne and despise the behauiour of the ROMAINES, which was so far out of order, that euen in the warres they could not refraine from doing euill, and from the reading of such vile bookes. Then the Senators of SELEVCIA found that Æsope was a wise man, who said, that euery man caried a sack on his necke, and that they put other mens faults at the sackes mouth, and their owne towards the bottome of the sacke: when they considered that Surena had put the booke of the laciuiousnesse of the MILESIANS at the sackes mouth, and a long tale of the PARTHIANS vaine pleasures and delights in the bottome of the sacke, carying such a number of carts loden with naughty packes in his armie, as he did, which seemed an army of ermits and field-mice. For in the voward and foremost rankes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely lances, pikes, bowes, and horse: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, instruments of musicke, dauncing, singing, banqueting, and rioting all night with curtizans. I will not denie but Rustins deserued blame: but yet withall, I say, that the PARTHIANS were shameless to reproue these bookes of the vanities of the MILESIANS, considering that many of their kings, and of the royall bloud of the Arsacides, were borne of the IONIAN and MILESIAN curtizans. Things passing thus in this sort, king Hyrodes had made peace and league with Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who gaue his sister in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes sonne, and made great feasts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verses sung, Hyrodes selfe vnderstanding well the Greeke tong, and Artabazes was so perfect in it, that he himselfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and stories, whereof some are, yet extant at this day. The same night Crassus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Iason a common player of enterludes (borne in the citie of THALLES came before the king, and recited a place of the tragedie of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agaue, who strak off his sons head. And as euery man took great pleasure to heare him, Syllaces coming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the king, deliuered him Crassus head before them al. The PARTHIANS seeing that, fel a clapping of their hands, and made an outcrie for ioy. The gentlemen Vshers by the kings commandement did set Syllaces at the table. Iason casting off his apparell representing Pentheus person, gaue it to another player to put it on him; and counterfeiting the BACCHANTES possest with furie, began to rehearse these verses, with a gesture tune and voice of a man mad and beside himselfe:

Behold, we from the forrest bring a stag now newly slaine,
A worthie bootie and reward, beseeming well our paine.

This maruellously grudged the companie, and specially singing these verses afterwards, where the Chorus both asked and answered himselfe:

Who strake this stag?
None else but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the table with others, rose straight, and went and took the head himselfe, to whom of right it belonged to say those words, and not vnto the player that spake them. King Hyrodes liked this sport maruellously, and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the manner of the countrey in such a case: and to Iason he also gaue a talent. Such was the successe of Crassus enterprise and voyage, much like vnto the end of a tragedie. But afterwards Hyrodes crueltie, and Surenas foule periurie and craft, were in the end iustly reuenged vpon them both according to their deserts. For king Hyrodes enuying Surenaes glorie, put Surena to death. And Hyrodes fell into a disease that became a dropsie, after he had lost his sonne Pacorus, who was slaine in a battel by the ROMAINES. Phraates his second sonne, thinking to set his father forwards gaue him drinke of the iuyce of Aconitum. The dropsie receiued the poyson, and one draue the other out of Hyrodes bodie, and set him on foot againe. Phraates perceiuing his father to amend vpon it, to make short worke, with his owne hands strangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF Craſſus with Nicias:

Nicias and Craſſus riches.

BVt now to proceed to the compariſon: firſt, Nicias goods were more iuſtly gotten, and with leſſe reproach then Craſſus wealth; for otherwiſe a man cannot giue any great praiſe to minerall workes, the which are wrought by lewd and ill diſpoſed barbarous fellowes kept in irons, and toiled to death in vnwholeſome and peſtilent places. But being compared vnto Craſſus buying of confiſcate goods at Syllaes hands, and vngentlemanlie bargaines of houſes on fire, or in danger thereof, ſurely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting: for as openly did Craſſus auow vſury, as tillage. And againe for other faults, wherewith Craſſus many times was burthened, and which he ſtoutly denied: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at Rome, to winne fauour for their ſide: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederates of the Romaines, onely for his priuate profit; and therfore curried fauor with Ladies, and generally ſought to cloke all foule offenders: of all theſe faults was Nicias neuer ſo much as once ſuſpected. For he to the contrarie, was mocked of euery body, becauſe for feare he maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhaps wold not haue becomed Pericles nor Ariſtides, and yet was meete for Nicias, who was borne a timorous natured man, and neuer had courage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunt afterwards to the people, being accuſed that he redeemed detractors with money: I am glad, ſaid he, that hauing dealt thus long in affaires of the ſtate, it is found I haue rather giuen then taken. And now touching expences, Nicias was thought the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and coſt was, in dedicating ſome goodly image to the gods, or in making of publike playes or paſtimes to recreate the people, But all the money he ſpent that way, and all that he was worth beſides, was nothing comparable, and but a ſmall part of that Craſſus beſtowed in an open feaſt he made at Rome, feaſting ſo many thouſands at one time, and did find and maintaine them alſo for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at thoſe men, that denie vice to be an inequalitie and diſagreement of manners, repugnant in it ſelf, ſeeing men may honeſtly ſpend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goods. For Nicias doings in the commonweale he did nothing maliciouſly, cruelly, nor vniuſtly, neither any thing of ſelfe-wil or ſtomacke, but rather deale plainely and ſimply. For he was deceiued by truſting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to ſpeake before the people, but with great feare, Craſſus on the other ſide was reproued for his vnconſtancy and lightneſſe, for that he would eaſily change friends or enemies: and he himſelfe denied not, that he came to be Conſull the ſecond time by plaine force and crueltie, hauing hired two murtherers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the aſſembly the people held for diuiding of the prouinces, many men were hurt, and foure were ſlaine in the market place: and more then that, Craſſus himſelfe (which we haue forgotten to write in his life) gaue one

Nicias and Craſſus acts in the common wealth.

Lucius

Lucius Annalius ſo ſore a blow on the face with his fiſt, for ſpeaking againſt him, that he ſent him going with bloud about his eares. But as Craſſus in thoſe things was very fierce and cruell: ſo Nicias womaniſh behauiour on the other ſide, and faint heart in matters of common wealth, humbling himſelfe to the meaneſt and moſt vile perſons, deſerued great reproach. Where Craſſus in this reſpect ſhewed himſelfe aſſuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of ſmall account, as with Cleon or Hyperbolus, but would giue no place to Cæſars fame and glorie, not yet to Pompeys three triumphs, but ſought to go euen with them in power and authoritie: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeys power, in the dignitie of Cenſor. For Magiſtrates and Gouernours of the commonweale, ſhould make themſelues to be honoured, but not enuied, killing enuie by the greatneſſe of their power. But if it were ſo that Nicias preferred quietneſſe, and the ſafetie of his perſon aboue all things elſe, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the fort of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRACIA: he had libertie and ſcope enough to repoſe himſelfe in the citie of ATHENS, and might haue forborne the dealing in matters, and (as Rhetoricians ſay) haue put a hood of quietneſſe vpon his head very well. For doubtleſſe, concerning his deſire to make peace, it was a godly mind in him, and an act worthy of a noble perſon, to bring that to paſſe he did, appeaſing all warre: wherein Craſſus certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caſpian ſea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIANS. But on the other ſide alſo when one hath to deale with people that can diſcerne when a man ruleth according to equitie and iuſtice, and that he ſeeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he muſt not then for lack of courage ſuffer wicked men to ſtep in his roome, nor giue occaſion to preferre ſuch to authoritie in the commonweale, as are vnworthie for that place and countenance: neither ſhould allow ſuch any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor truſt, as Nicias did: who was the onely occaſion that Cleon, being before but a pratling Orator, was choſen Generall. Neither do I alſo commend Craſſus, for that in the warre againſt Spartacus, he made haſt to giue him battell, more raſhly then ſafely or conſideratly. For his ambition ſpurred him forward, becauſe he was afraid leſt Pompeys coming ſhould take from him the glorie of all that he had done in that war: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honour of the winning of CORINTH. But beſides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compaſſe of reaſon, and can no way be excuſed. For he did not reſigne his honour and office of Generall to Cleon his enemie, when there was hope of good ſucceſſe, or little perill: but fearing the danger of the iourney, he was contented to ſaue one, and tooke no care beſides for the common wealth. Which Themiſtocles ſhewed not, in the time of the warre againſt the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckening beſide his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being choſen Generall of ATHENS, leſt he ſhould haue ouerthrowne the common weale: ſecretly bribed him with money to leaue off his ſuite. And Cato alſo when he ſaw the ſtate of ROME in greateſt danger, ſued to be Tribune of the people for the commonwealths ſake. And Nicias in contrarie maner, reſeruing himſelf to make warre with the citie of MINOA, or with the Ile of CITHERA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occaſion to fight againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke, and he left the ſhips, the armie and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons raſhneſſe and ſmall experience of warre, when the neceſſity of the ſeruice required the wiſeſt and moſt expert captaine. The which he did not, deſpiſing the meanes to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of need to defend his countrey. Wherefore afterwards he was compelled againſt his will to be General, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: becauſe the people thought he was not ſo earneſt to diſſwade the iourney, for that he thought it not meet for the commonwealth, but becauſe through his ſloth and cowardlineſſe he would make his country loſe ſo good an oportunity to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great teſtimony of his honeſty and truſt they had in him: who though he euer hated war, and did flie from the offices of honor and charge in the cõmonwealth, his countrimen notwithſtanding did alwaies chuſe him, as the moſt experienced perſon and meeteſt man of the city. Now Craſſus in contrary maner, deſiring nothing elſe but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another: (for Pompey Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroad in the wars) although he was otherwiſe of great eſtimation and authority. Howbeit it ſeemeth to me, that his friends that loued him beſt, thought him (as the comicall Poet ſaith;

His ambition notwithstanding, and couetous desire of rule, did nothing benefite the ROMAINS. For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the war against his will: but Crassus led the ROMAINES thither against their wils. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the commonwealth was brought into miserie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, thē to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wise man, and a Captaine of great experience, could neuer so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therefore disswaded his countrimen from the iourney: and would giue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking vpon him to make wars with the PARTHIANS, as though it had been an easie matter to ouercome them, found himself deceiued, yet did he aspire to great things. For as Iulius Cæsar had conquered and subdued to the imperiall crowne of ROME, all the countries of the West parts, to say, the GAVLES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLAND: euen so did Crassus desire to go towards the East parts, to conquer all to the great West sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as euer courteously behaued themselues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For when the charge of the wars in the East parts was assigned to Pompey by decree and order of the people, the Senate vterly misliked it, and were against it al they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Cæsar in battell had ouerthrowne and slaine three hundred thousand GERMAINES, Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this mind, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the hands of his enemies whom he had ouercome, for to be punished: therby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, vpon him onely that was the vniust breaker of peace. This notwithstanding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feasts and processions fifteene dayes together, and open sacrifices to the gods with great ioy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victorie. How glad may we thinke would they haue beene, and how many daies would they haue feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SYSE and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and prouinces to the Empire of ROME?

The diuersity betwixt Nicias and Crassus.

If a man will needes doe wrong and iniustice,

As Eurypides saith to them that cannot liue in peace, and be contented with their owne, he must not then sticke at trifles, (as the razing of a castle of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall country, and hiding themselues like birds without nests, in any other birds holes) but must dearely sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne iustice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the Great in his voyage, for the conquests he made in the East, and do dispraise Crassus voyage, do not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euents and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploits: for he ouerthrew his enemies in diuerse battels, and had almost taken the city of SYRACVSA: and sure they cannot iustly blame him for all the misfortunes that chanced in the warre of SICILIA, but partly the plague was cause of it, and partly also the enuie of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Wheras Crassus ranne into so many errors, and committed such foule parts in al his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leysure to do him good: so that I wonder not so much that his folly was ouercome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouercome the good fortune of the ROMAINES. Sithence it so falleth out thē, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen, by art and rule of diuination; and Crassus contrarily disdaining to obserue any thing: sure it falleth out hard in iudgement, which of thē two proceeded with most safety. Yea according to the best approued opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excusable, then of rashnesse and folly to breake any ancient law or custome. For their deaths, Crassus end deserued least reproch. For he against his wil did yeeld himselfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perswaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraud and treason most traiterously deceiued: where Nicias cowardly and dishonourably hoping to saue his life, trusting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

PEraduenture it is not to be maruelled at, if in long proceſſe of time (fortune altering her effects daily) theſe wordly euents fall often out one like another. For whether it be that the variety of things are infinite, fortune hath ſtore of matter apt inough to worke to likeneſſe: or be it that worldly matters be comprehended within determinate number, of neceſſitie one thing muſt fall out like another, ſince they proceed from one cauſe, tyed to the ſame meanes it before did vſe. But becauſe men doe delight to compare ſuch chances together, as they haue ſeene or heard to haue happened ſo like as if they had beene done of purpoſe, the one by example of the other, as that of two men being both named Attis, both of them come of noble houſes, the one in SYRIA, and the other in ARCADIA, both the one and the other were ſlaine with a wild bore. That of two called Actæon, the one was torne in peeces by his dogges, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipioes, the CARTHAGINIANS were firſt ouercome by the one, and afterwards vtterly deſtroyed by the other. That the citie of TROY was firſt taken by Hercules, for the horſes that Laomedon had promiſed him: the ſecond time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great woodden horſe: and the third time by Charidemus, by meanes of a horſe that fell within the gate, and kept the TROIANS that they could not ſhut it in time. And that of two ſweete ſmelling plants, Ios, and SMYRNA, two cities were named, the one ſignifying the Violet, and the other Myrre: it is ſuppoſed that the Poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he died in the other. We may alſo adde to this example, that amongſt the ancient Captaines, the greateſt warriers (and that haue done the nobleſt exploits by wit and warlike ſtratagemes) had but one eye: as Philip, Antigonus, Hannibal, and Sertorius alſo, whom we write of at this preſent. Whom we may truly report to haue beene more chaſt than Philip: more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus: more courteous to his enemies than Hannibal: and for wiſedome and iudgement to giue place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though ſhe ſhewed her ſpite more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men: yet in experience he was equall with Metellus, in prowes and valiancie with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being baniſhed his country, a ſtranger in another realme, and hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithſtanding maintained warres for a time, againſt the power of the ROMAINES. Me thinkes therefore, that of all the

The praiſe of Sertorius

GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none ſo well vnto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant and politicke in wars, both were baniſhed men out of their countrey, both were Captaines ouer ſtrangers, and both of them were traiterouſly and villanouſly ſlaine by them, through whom they had before ouercome their enemies.

The parentage of Sertorius. Now for Sertorius, he came of worſhipfull parents, and was borne in the city of NVRSIA in the country of ý SABINES. His father left him a very child with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he ſingularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they ſay was Rhea. His firſt riſing and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: in ſo much as being a yong man he came to ROME, and wan ſome name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honour and eſtimation he atchieued afterwards by his valiant acts, made him employ all his ſtudie and ambitious care, to armes and warres. The firſt time of his ſouldierfare was, when the CIMBRES and TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty armie: where when the ROMAINS had been ouercome vnder the leading of Cæpio, his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe hurt, he notwithſtanding ſwam ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corſlet and target vpon him, breaking the furie and rage of the riuer with meere ſtrength, ſo able and luſtie a bodie he had to brooke all paines and hardneſſe. The ſecond time that theſe barbarous CIMBRES returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with proud and dreadfull threats, the ROMAINES were then ſo afraid, that they thought him a ſtout man that had but the courage to keepe his rancke, and obey his Captaines. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMAINE army, and then did Sertorius vndertake to go and diſcouer the enemies campe. And for the purpoſe, apparelled himſelfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common words and phraſes of their language, to ſalute one another when they met, and in this ſort went among them: and hauing partly by ſight and report learned that he ſought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him ſuch honourable reward as was due to his deſert. All the time of the warre after, he did ſuch valiant acts and deeds of armes, that his captaine had him in great eſtimation, and committed the chiefeſt matters to his charge. Whereupon the warres being ended with the TEVTONS and CIMBRES, Sertorius was ſent into SPAINE, vnder Didius the Prætor, with charge of a thouſand footmen, with whom he wintred in the citie of CASTVLO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the ſouldiers finding plenty of victuals, fell to gluttony and drunkenneſſe, and committed great inſolencie, being ouercome with wine. Inſomuch as the barbarous people of the city grew to ſuch a miſliking and diſdaine of them, that they ſent one night to their next neighbours the GYRISENIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMAINES lodging, ſlue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noiſe, went immediatly out of the city with a few of his men, and gathering them together alſo that fled on after another to ſaue themſelues, went round about the wals of the citie, and finding the gate open where the GYRISENIANS came in, there entred he alſo: who being more carefull than they had ſhewed themſelues, left the gates and all the parts of the citie well guarded, and then put all to the ſword within that were of age to carie weapon. Now when he had executed this reuenge, he commanded all his ſouldiers to leaue off their owne apparell and weapons, and to take thoſe of the barbarous people whom they had ſlaine, and to follow him to the citie of the GYRISENIANS, from whence they came that had on ſuch a ſudden aſſailed them in the night. The GYRISENIANS ſeeing the garments and weapons of their ſuppoſed men farre off, thinking certainly they had been they, opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their friends and citizens, whom they thought had happily ſped of their purpoſe. Thus were a maruellous number of them ſlaine by the ROMAINES, euen hard at the gates of their citie: and the reſt putting themſelues to Sertorius mercy, he ſold for ſlaues. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAINE, and returning to ROME, was made Quæſtor or treaſurer generall of GAVLE, on this ſide of the mountaines, by the riuer of Po. A happy chance for ROME: for euen at that very preſent time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had commiſſion to preſt ſouldiers, and to make armour. And therein he ſhewed ſuch diligence and expedition for quicke diſpatch of that ſeruice, in reſpect of the long delay and careleſſe regard other young men had of the ſame before: that he wonne the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwards would atchieue great enterpriſes. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine himſelfe, he would not let to venture his perſon as valiantly as any other priuate ſouldier whatſoeuer, but did maruellous actes with his owne hands, euen in greateſt perils and

and conflicts: in ſo much as at the length he loſt one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing aſhamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, ſaid he, do not alwaies carie the markes about them of their valiant ſeruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carcanets, iauelins, and crownes, giuen them by their Captaines for teſtimonie of their valiancy: how be it that he alwaies caried the markes about him (whereſoeuer he went) of his ſeruice, ſo that ſuch as ſaw the blemiſh of his eye, did therewithall witneſſe his valiantneſſe and courage. The people alſo did honour him as became them. For when he came into the Threater, they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praiſes, which the ROMAINES did ſcantly vſe vnto their oldeſt Captaines, and which were moſt honoured for their great and noble ſeruice. Neuertheleſſe, when he ſued to be Tribune, he was reiected by Syllaes practiſe, who hindred him: whereupon grew as it ſeemed, that grudge and malice which he euer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercome by Sylla, and that Sylla was gone out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Conſuls, Octauius tooke part with Sylla, and Cinna the other Conſull (which ſought change and alteration) was gathering men together to ſet vp Marius faction, that was in manner vnderfoote: Sertorius tooke his part, becauſe he ſaw that Octauius was but a ſlow and lither man, and did not beſides truſt any of Marius friends. So was there a cruell conflict betweene them, euen in the market place within the citie ſelfe, where Octauius had the vpper hand: and Cinna and Sertorius ſcaped by flying, hauing loſt few leſſe then ten thouſand men in this onely ouerthrow. Neuertheleſſe, afterwards through practiſe and pollice, they got thoſe ſouldiers together againe that were diſperſed here and there through ITALIE, ſo as in ſhort time they made their power equall with Octauius force. Marius alſo being aduertiſed of the ſame, tooke the ſea incontinently, and returned into ITALY out of AFRICKE, and came to Cinna to ſerue as a priuate ſoldier, vnder his Captaine and Conſull. Now they all liked well, that Marius ſhould be receiued, ſaving Sertorius, who was againſt him all he could: fearing that either his credit and eſtimation ſhould diminiſh, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine, then himſelf, to ſerue him; or elſe that Marius crueltie and ſeueritie (who pardoned none offence) would marre altogether, hauing no ſtay in his anger, but bent vtterly to all kind of crueltie to his enemies, if Cinna fortuned to haue the victorie. And thereunto he added this further: that now they had the victory in manner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would rob them of all the honour of ending this warre, and being alſo in authority, he was neither to be truſted nor commanded. Whereunto Cinna anſwered thus: that he thought the words he had alledged to be true, howbeit that he was aſhamed; and beſides, could not ſee with honeſtie how he might refuſe Marius, or ſend him backe, ſithence he had purpoſely ſent for him, to commit part of the charge of theſe warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied: Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne good will vnſent for, and therefore (as for the beſt in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduice not to receiue him: but ſithence it is ſo that you ſent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counſell whether you ſhould now receiue him, or not. And therefore you muſt needs accept his ſeruice that is come vpon your word: for, the bond of your promiſe paſt you, doth now cut off all counſell or other reſolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole armie into three parts, and then began to charge vpon their enemies of all hands, ſo as they obtained victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible crueltie in this victorie, as could poſſibly be ſhewed: in ſo much as the ROMAINES thought all the miſeries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in reſpect of the great calamities they fell into afterwards. Now Sertorius on the other ſide neuer cauſed man to be ſlaine for any priuate malice, or quarrell he had with any perſon, neither did he hurt any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marius inſolencie and cruel murthers. and whē he had good opportunity to ſpeake with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the beſt he could, and made him more mild and tractable through his perſwaſion. In fine, Sertorius ſeeing Marius guarded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other ſouldiers in this warre, whom he vſed as executioners of his ſlaughter and butcherie, alwaies attending about his perſon as a guard, and ſuffering them alſo to make themſelues rich, partly with that he gaue them, or commanded them to ſpoile, and partly alſo with that they violently tooke without his commandement of their owne maiſters, killing them when they had done, rauiſhing their miſtreſſes, and defiling their children: he could no longer abide ſuch wickednesse and villanie, but made them all to be slaine in their campe where they lay together, being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his sonne (against his counsell, and contrarie to the lawes of ROME) had by force made himselfe Consull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had been ouercome by Sylla) were come out of GRECE to ROME-wards, partly through the cowardlinesse of their Captaines, and partly also because they were betrayed and sold of their owne men: and further, considering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those affaires, which waxed worse and worse, by means of the authority of such as had least wit and vnderstanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilst vnderhand he wanne his soldiers from him, notwithstanding, that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly despairing of ROMES prosperity and welfare, departed from ROME to go towards SPAINE, thinking that if he could get the first possession and gouernemnt of that realme, it wold at the lest be a refuge and receipt for al those of their tribe that should chance to be banished out of their country. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and passing through a country of mountaines, the barbarous people inhabiting the same, demanded tribute of him, for licence to passe through their territories. Therat the soldiers of his company were maruellously offended, saying: that it were too much shame and dishonour for a Proconsull of ROME, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithstanding, Sertorius passed not for the shame they said it would be to him, but answered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should not reckon of, that aspireth to haughtie enterprises: and so pleased the barbarous people with money. And thus he made such speed, as he quickly recouered SPAINE, which he found greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armour. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had been hardly dealt withall before, through the insolency, pride, and couetousnesse of the ROMAINE gouernours, whom they ordinarily sent from ROME and that therfore they hated all manner of gouernment: first of all sought to win the good wils of all the whole countrimen one and other. Of the noblemen, by being familiar and conuersant with them: and of the common people, by easing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most loue of al men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of souldiers, and receiuing of any garrison within their cities, compelling his souldiers to set vp their tents, and to make their cabins without the suburbs, of great cities to winter there, and causing also his owne pauillion to be first set vp, and lay in it himselfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauour: for he armed all the ROMAINE citizens of age to carie weapon that dwelt in SPAIN, and made them make al sorts of engines for battery, and a number of gallies besides, so that he had all the cities at commandement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius, vnderstood that Sylla kept ROME, and that the most part of the tribe of Marius and Carbo was vtterly ouerthrown, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a great armie against him: he sent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with sixe thousand men well armed. Immediatly after Caius Annius also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to distresse Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was driuen to stay at the foot of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune one Calphurnius surnamed Lanarius, traiterously slue Salinator: whereupon his souldiers forthwith forsook the top of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had easie passage with his armie which was very great, and ouerthrew them that resisted his farther coming on into the country. Sertorius finding himselfe not strong inough to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men vnto the city of new CARTHAGE, and there took sea: from thence he coasted ouer into AFRICKE, and fell with the coast of the MAVRVSIANS, where his soldiers landed immediatly for fresh water, dispersing themselues without keeping any order. Therupon the barbarous people gaue charge vpon them, and slue numbers of them: insomuch as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his course towards SPAINE, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuē to take certaine pirates boats of the SICILIANS, & to saile towards the Ile of PITYVSA, where he landed in despite of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither himself with a good number of ships, and fiue thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by sea, though he had

but ſmall barkes, purpoſely made for ſwift ſailing, and of no ſtrength for fight. But now the Weſt wind riſing very big, did ſwel the ſea in ſuch ſort, that it caſt the moſt part of Sertorius ſhips (being weake and very light) vpon rockes in the ſea, and himſelfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the ſea by ſtorme, was driuen to ride ten dayes together at anker, working ſtill for life againſt the danger of the ſurging waues and boiſterous winds, which continueth rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed again he weighed anker, and ran into certaine deſolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoyſing ſaile from thence, he paſſed the ſtraight of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hand, landed vpon the coaſt of SPAINE, lying toward the great Weſterne ſea, a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Bætis, the which falling into the ſea Atlanticum, gaue name in old time to that part of SPAINE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine ſailers met with him that were newly arriued from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the ancients called the fortunate Ilands. Theſe two Ilands are not farre one from another, being but a litle arme of the ſea betweene them, and are from the coaſt of AFRICKE only ten thouſand furlongs. They haue raine there very ſeldome, howbeit a gentle wind commonly that bloweth in a litle ſiluer dew, which moiſtneth the earth ſo finely, that it maketh it fertile and luſtie, not only to bring forth all that is ſet or ſowen vpon it, but of it ſelfe without mans hand it beareth ſo good fruit, as ſufficiently maintaineth ỹ inhabitants dwelling vpon it, liuing idly, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleaſant continually, and neuer hurteth the body, the climate and ſeaſons of the yeare are ſo temperate, and the aire neuer extreame: becauſe the winds that blow vpon that land from the other ſide of the coaſt oppoſite to it, as the North and Eaſterly wind comming from the maine, what with their long comming, and then by diſperſing themſelues into a wonderfull large aire and great ſea, their ſtrength is in manner ſpent and gone before their comming thither. And for the winds that blow from the ſea (as the South and Weſterly) they ſometime bring litle ſhowers with them, which commonly do but moiſt the ground a litle, and make the earth bring forth all things very trimly: inſomuch as the very barbarous people themſelues do faithfully beleeue, that there are the Elyſian fields, the aboade of bleſſed creatures, which Homer hath ſo much ſpoken of. Sertorius hearing report of theſe Ilands (vpon a certaine deſire now to liue quietly out of tyrannie and warres) had ſtraight a maruellous minde to go dwell there. But when the pirates of SICILIA (who were no men of peace, but giuen altogether to ſpoile and pillage) heard that, they by and by forſook Sertorius, & went into AFRICKE, to reſtore Aſcalius the ſon of Iphtha to his realme of MAVRITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre againſt Aſcalius, and all to the end that his ſouldiers ſeeing matter of new hope and meanes to be imployed, ſhould not ſo leaue him, as being forced to be diſcharged of very neceſſitie. The MAVRVSIANS being verie glad of his arriuall, he preſently went on with his enterpriſe, ouercame Aſcalius in battell, and beſieged the citie wherinto vpon the ouerthrow of his armie he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertiſed thereof, ſent Paccanius thither with an army to aide Aſcalius. Sertorius gaue him battel, ſlue him in the field, and wan the reſt of his army, which yeelded vnto him: then took he the citie of TINGIS, whereinto Aſcalius was fled with his brethren. The LYBIANS write that Antæus is buried there. But Sertorius giuing no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that countrey, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the tombe they ſhewed, made it to be broken open round: and finding there the body of a man (as they ſay) of threeſcore cubits long, he maruelled at it, and ſo finiſhing his ſacrifice to honour the memory thereof, cauſed the tombe to be well cloſed vp againe. By this act he did greatly increaſe the honour of Antæus memory, which the city did vnto him, and therby confirmed the countrimens report of Antæus. For the TINGIANS do report, that after Antæus death, his wife Tinga lay with Hercules, and had a goodly ſon by him called Sophax, who was king of that country, and there built this citie, giuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is ſaid alſo that this Sophax had a ſonne called Diodorus, who conquered the moſt part of AFRICKE with an army of the GRECIANS, OLBIANIANS & MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabite thoſe parts. We were willing to imbrace the occaſion offred vs to ſpeake of this matter as we went, for ỹ honor of Iuba, the nobleſt hiſtoriographer that euer came of royall bloud: for it is thought his anceſtors were lineally deſcended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as conqueror now, hauing the whole country in ſubiection, did in no wiſe hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put truſt in him, but reſtored them their goods, cities, and gouernement againe, contenting himſelfe with that they offered him of their good wils. But then ſtanding doubtfull what way to determine, the LVSITANIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to intreat him to be their Chiefetaine: for they ſtood in great need of a worthie perſonage, and a man expert in warres to defend them againſt the furie of the ROMAINES: and therefore they only truſted him, hearing of his honorable behauiour, by them that were conuerſant with him. Whoſe qualities as we find writtẽ, were theſe. He was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a reſolute man without feare in moſt danger, ſo was he moſt temperate in greateſt proſperitie. In valiantneſſe inferiour to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in euery imminent danger. For where any preſent exploit was to be done, any ſtrong place of aduantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to paſſe ouer any riuer, or ſcape any inſtant danger, where it ſtood vpon ſpeedy execution, and to ſhew ſome ſtratageme or policy in time and place to ſupplant the enemie: in thoſe matters he paſſingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good ſeruice, and mercifull in puniſhing of offenders: but this notwithſtanding, the foule murther he did in his latter dayes vpon certaine young children that were pledges with him (which doubtleſſe was an act of great cruelty, and anger that could not forgiue) doth manifeſtly proue, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfeit it, when both the time and occaſion did ſo require it. But for mine opinion, ſure I am perſwaded that no misfortune can haue power to make perfect vertue, grounded vpon good reaſon, to worke in any ſort contrarie to it ſelfe: neither do I thinke it impoſſible alſo, but that mens good wils and gentle natures being iniured without cauſe, may peraduenture change their naturall diſpoſitions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrarie vnto him, and his good hap changed into ill, grew ſo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruel reuenge of them which had villianouſly betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICKE vpon the LVSITANIANS offer, who choſe him for their Generall, giuing him abſolute power and authoritie: and ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſtraight leauied men of war, and with them ſubdued the people of SPAINE fronting vpon their marches, of which the more part did willingly ſubmit thẽſelues, vpon the brute that ran of him to be merciful and courteous, & a valiant man beſides in preſent danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuices and ſubtilties to win their good wils: as among others, the policy and deuice he had of the Hinde; which was this. There was a poore man of the countrey called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a Hind in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters, he let the Dam me go, not being able to take her: and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young Hind, and of a ſtrange haire, for ſhe was all milke-white. It chanced ſo, that Sertorius was at that time in thoſe parts, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him ſuch manner of preſents: as fruits, fowle, or veniſon, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and alſo reward them well for the ſame. So, this poore man preſented Sertorius with his young Hind, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made ſo tame, that ſhe would come to him when he called her, and follow him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily ſight of ſuch a number of armed ſouldiers together as they were, nor yet affraid of the noiſe and tumult of the camp. Inſomuch as Sertorius by litle and litle made it a miracle, making the ſimple barbarous people beleeue that it was a gift that Diana had ſent him, by the which ſhe made him vnderſtand of many and ſundry things to come: knowing well inough of himſelfe, that the barbarous people were men eaſily deceiued, and quickly caught by any ſubtill ſuperſtition, beſides that by art alſo he brought them to beleeue it as a thing very true. For when he had any ſecret intelligence giuen him, that the enemies would inuade ſome part of the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his forts from him by any intelligence or ſudden attempt, he ſtraight told them that his Hind ſpake to him as he ſlept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himſelfe in ſtrength. In like manner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenans had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the meſſenger, and bring his Hind abroad with a garland and coller of noſegayes: and then ſay, it was a token of ſome good newes comming towards him, perſwading them withall to be of good cheare; and ſo did ſacrifice to the gods, to giue them thanks for the good tidings he ſhould heare before it were long. Thus by putting this ſuperſtition into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, in ſo much as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a ſtranger wiſer than themſelues, but were ſtedfaſtly

perſwaded that they were rather led by ſome certaine god; and ſo much the more, becauſe that his deeds confirmed their opinions, ſeeing his power ſo daily to increaſe beyond the hope and expectation of man. For with two thouſand and fiue hundred ſouldiers, which he called ROMAINES (although the moſt of thē indeed were AFRICANS, which came ouer with him out of AFRICKE into SPAIN) and foure thouſand LVCITANIANS, with ſeuen hundred horſemen alſo, he made warre againſt foure great Captaines of ROME, which had the leading of ſixe ſcore thouſand footmen, two thouſand archers and ſling-men, with a world of cities and countries beſides. Where Sertorius at the firſt had not aboue twentie at the moſt, and yet with this ſmall power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not onely conquer great countries and many goodly cities, but tooke ſome of the Captaines priſoners alſo, whom the ROMAINES ſent againſt him. Of which company Cotta was one, whom he ouerthrew in battel by ſea, not farre from the citie of MELLARIA. He alſo ouercame Fidius in battel, being gouernor of SPAINE BÆTICA, by the riuer of BÆTIS, where he ſlue two thouſand ROMANS, by his treaſurer likewiſe he ouercame Lucius Domitius Proconſull of the other prouince of SPAINE. And another time he diſcomfited Toranus another Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he ſlue in fight with all his armie. And Metellus ſelfe, being taken at that time for one of the moſt expert men of warre, and chiefeſt Captaines among the ROMAINES: him he put alſo ſo oft to diſtreſſe, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAVLE NARBONENSIS (now Languedocke) to his aid. And they were furthermore driuen to ſend Pompey the great with all ſpeed frō ROME with a new army, becauſe Metellus knew not what courſe to take, hauing to fight with a moſt valiant man, and one whom he could neuer either bring to any ſet battell, nor yet intrap in the plaine field (ſo eaſily could he caſt himſelfe into all kind of formes) by reaſon of the dexteritie and ſwiftneſſe of his Spaniſh ſoldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foot, and to leade an armie heauy armed, which could keepe their rankes, and fighting ſteadily could ouerthrow their enemies with hand-ſtrokes, and march vpon their bellies. But to climbe vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as it were) charged in the rereward with theſe men armed as light as the wind, and to purſue them in chaſe that fled ſtill and neuer kept place, it was impoſſible for them to do it; and much leſſe to abide hunger and thirſt, to liue without a kitchin and fire, and likewiſe to lie on the bare ground without tents or pauilions, as Sertorius ſouldiers did. Furthermore, Metellus being growne an old man (hauing ſpent all his youth in ſeruice of the warres, and taken and ſuffered great paines and troubles, giuing himſelfe now to quiet and pleaſure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his beſt age, and luſtieſt of body; beſides that nature had made him both ſtrong, actiue, & temperate withall. For he was neuer giuē to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at moſt quiet, and out of wars; he was likewiſe acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with long iournies, watch many daies and nights without ſleepe, eate little, and content himſelfe with any meat that came to hand. And had he neuer ſo litle leiſure, he would continually be on horſebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fields, which made him very ready and expert to know how to wind himſelf out of danger whē he was diſtreſſed, and contrarily alſo to compaſſe in his enemy vpon any aduantage: and beſides, to ſee where he might enter, and where not. For this cauſe was Metellus driuen (who was ſtill deſirous to fight) to abide the loſſes and diſcommodities which they ſuffer that be vanquiſhed: and Sertorius on the other ſide refuſing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue which chaſe their enemies whom they haue ouercome. For he cut off his victuals on euery ſide, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward, Sertorius ſtaied him: and when he lay ſtill in his camp, Sertorius came and gaue him alarums, and draue him to diſlodge. If Metellus laid ſiege to any place, Sertorius ſtraight beſieged him for want of victuals: ſo that his ſouldiers were euen weary of altogether. Whereupon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: Oh, well ſaid, cried all the ſouldiers, let Captaine fight againſt Captaine, and RÓMAINE againſt ROMAINE. Howbeit Metellus refuſed him, and the ſouldiers laughed him to ſcorne. Neuertheleſſe he did but ſmile at them, and therein ſhewed himſelfe a wiſe man: for as Theophraſtus ſaith, A Captaine muſt die as a Captaine, not like a priuate ſouldier. Furthermore, Metellus conſidering that the LANGOBRITES (who gaue aide vnto Sertorius in all ſeruices) were eaſie to be taken for lacke of water, (hauing but one onely well in all their citie) and that whoſoeuer did beſiege that ſame, ſhould ſtraight be maſter of all the ſpring heads of the ſuburbes about it, hoping thereby to make the citie yeeld vnto him within two daies at the vtmoſt, he commanded his ſoldiers to victuall themſelues for fiue dayes onely. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue good direction & ſpeedy order to preuent him. For he cauſed two thouſand goates skins to be filled with water, and promiſed round ſumes of mony for euery skin brought thither. Many SPANIARDS and MAVRVSIANS ſtraight tooke vpon them the enterpriſe. Thereupon Sertorius chuſing the luſtieſt men among them, ſent them away through the mountaine, commanding them withal, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water vnto the citizens, they ſhould cauſe them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might laſt thē the longer which defended the city. Metellus receiuing aduertiſement herof, was much agrieued withal, becauſe his ſoldiers victuals were welneare ſpent, which they had brought according to his commandement: & therfore he ſent Aquinus one of his Lieutenants, with ſix thouſand men to get victuals. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his purpoſe, preſently layd an ambuſh for his returne in a valley full of wood, and beſtowed there three thouſand men to ſet vpō the rereward, whileſt he himſelf gaue charge on the voward. Thus made he Aquinus flie, ſlue the moſt part of his men, and took the reſt priſoners. Howbeit Aquinus ſelfe the Captaine, hauing loſt his weapons and horſe, by flying recouered Metellus campe: who thereupon was driuen with ſhame to raiſe his ſiege, being mocked of all the SPANIARDS. For theſe valiant deeds was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honoured of all the barbarous people, and ſpecially becauſe he had made them good ſouldiers, brought them from their former rude and beaſtly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the ROMAINE faſhion, to keepe their rankes when they fought, to follow their enſigne, and to take the ſignall and word of the battell: inſomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly armie wel taught and trained, being before a confuſed multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore he deuided great ſtore of gold and ſiluer among them, ſhewing them how they ſhould gild their head-peeces, ſet out their ſhields and targets with fine workmanſhip, and alſo brauely apparell themſelues with rich clokes, and ſleeueleſſe caſſocks vpon their armor, teaching them to be fine, and furniſhed them with mony, whereby he marſhellouſly wan the hearts of the barbarous people. Yet did he farther bind them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children: for he ſent generally for all the noblemens yong ſons, through al the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him, and brought them to the goodly citie of OSCA, where he prouided them of ſchoolemaſters to teach them the Greeke and Latine tongue: bearing their parents in hand, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be employed in the ſeruice of the commonweale, albeit indeed it was but a fine deuice of him, to haue them as hoſtages for their faith and loyalty towards him. Then were the fathers of theſe childrē glad men to ſee their ſons apparelled like ROMAINS, in faire long gownes garded with purple, to go ciuilly to the ſchools, that Sertorius payed for their learning, and that oftentimes he went thither to appoſe them, to ſee how they profited: and how he gaue rewards vnto them that were the beſt ſcholers, hanging iewels about their neckes, which the ROMAINES call Bulla. Inſomuch as they hauing a cuſtome at that time in SPAINE, that ſuch as were about the Prince or their Chieftaine ſhould die with him when he died: that cuſtome of voluntarie vow to die with their Lord, being called by the barbarous people, deuotion; there were very few of their followers and familiars that would vow to die with other Captaines; but on the other ſide, thouſands commonly followed Sertorius, hauing vowed to loſe their liues with him. And for proofe hereof it is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowne by a certaine citie of SPAINE, the enemies eagerly purſuing him, the SPANIARDS not regarding their owne liues to ſaue his, tooke him vpon their ſhoulders, and ſo paſſed him from man to man vpon them, till they put him into the citie, who being ſafe & out of danger, they then looked by running to ſaue themſelues the beſt they could. Thus was Sertorius not onely beloued of the SPANIARDS, but of other ſouldiers alſo that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the ſame faction, arriued in SPAINE full of money, and with a good number of ſouldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe againſt Metellus, his ſouldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius: the which ſpited Perpenna to the heart, being proud and ſtately by meanes of his wealth and eſtate, comming of a noble houſe. Newes being come that Pompey was paſt ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the ſoldiers armed themſelues, & plucked vp their enſignes that were faſt in the ground, and cryed out vpon Perpenna to leade them to Sertorius, threatning him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and ſeeke them a Captaine that could both ſaue himſelfe and them.

Perpenna ioyned with Sertorius.

So

So was Perpenna forced againſt his will to follow their minds, and to leade the three and fiftie enſignes he had with him, to ioyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius armie very great, and ſpecially after all the cities on this ſide the riuer of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came ſouldiers to him out of all parts, howbeit they were a raſh confuſed multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no reaſon nor patience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to ſet vpon their enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, ſeeking firſt to quiet them by reaſon and perſwaſion. But when he ſaw they fell to mutiny, and would needs haue their wils, and both without reaſon and all good order would ſo go ſet vpon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them go as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly; but yet took ſuch order and direction, as they ſhould not vtterly be caſt away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And indeed they had their payment as he coniectured: notwithſtanding he went to reſcue them, and ſo brought them ſafe into his campe. Now to take away the feare and perplexity from them, which this ouerthrow perhaps had ſtriken into them, immediatly after he cauſed his whole armie to aſſemble, as purpoſing to vſe ſome ſpeech vnto them. At which time he cauſed two horſes to be brought and ſet in the middeſt among them, the one an old and feeble iade, and the other a goodly luſty horſe, which beſides other things, had a maruellous faire thick taile. Behind the old leane iade, he ſet a luſty tall fellow: and behind the goodly horſe alſo, he placed a litle weariſh man, and ſeeming to ſight to haue but ſmall ſtrength. Now vpon a ſigne giuen them which he had made them priuie to, the ſtrong man tooke the leane horſe by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue pluckt it off by the ſtumpe: and the other weariſh man fell to plucking off haire by haire from the great horſe taile. So when the ſtrong man had tugged and ſwet a great while in vaine at the leane horſe taile, thinking to haue plucked it off, and in the end did nothing elſe but make the lookers on laugh: and that the weariſh wretch on the other ſide in a ſhort ſpace (and at eaſe) had left the great horſe taile with neuer a haire on it: Sertorius then riſing vp, ſpake in this ſort to his ſoldiers: Do ye not ſee (my friends & companions) ſaith he, how time and perſeuerance exceedeth force? and that things vnlikely at the firſt to be ouercome by force, are yet in time by litle and litle obtained? For continuance ouercometh all things, and there is no force nor power, but proceſſe of time conſumeth & bringeth to nought, being a moſt certaine helpe to them that can take oportunitie, and abide time: as in contrariwiſe haſt and raſhnes is as dangerous an enemy as may be to thē that do things of a head without regard. By theſe commō deuices wherwith Sertorius dayly acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunity of time. But of all the ſtratagems he vſed in warre, that onely exceeded all other, which he ſhewed vnto a people called ỹ CHARACITANIANS. The people do dwel on the other ſide of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their cōmon abode, but only a great high hil, full of hollow caues and deep holes among the rocks, looking towards the North. At the foot of this mountaine the valley is a great ſlimie ground, and ſo rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crūmeth like white lime, and turneth to duſt vnder his feet. And therfore by meanes of the ſame, when thoſe people were afraid of any enemies, or that they had conuayed the goods they had robbed and ſtolne from their neighbours into thoſe caues, they thought themſelues ſafe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was impoſſible to compel them to come out. Now it chanced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which theſe barbarous people inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrown him. But Sertorius, being in a rage with them, & becauſe he would ſhew that he fled not, took his horſe-back the next morning, and rode as neare to the hill as he could, to view the nature and ſituation of the place: and when he ſaw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, & walked vp & down, vainly threatning them to no purpoſe. Yet going and coming to & fro, he perceiued the wind raiſed a great duſt, of that britle earth we haue ſpoken of, and caried it ful into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes wherof as we ſaid before, lay full vpon the North. This Northren wind which ſome call Cæcias, is the only wind of all other that moſt keepeth in that quarter, and riſeth from the moores and mountaines therabouts, which be continually couered with ſnow, and then in the heat of ſommer is nouriſhed and inforced by the melting of the yce and ſnow, and ſo bloweth a iolly coole wind, which refreſhed the barbarous people and beaſtes all the day long Sertorius marking this with himſelfe, and vnderſtanding by the inhabitants thereabouts, that this wind blew commonly among them: commanded his ſouldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light brittle earth together

Sertorius wonderfull deuice againſt the barbarous people, called the Characitanians

and to raiſe a mount of it, right againſt the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockerie of it at the firſt, thinking Sertorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them vpon it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his ſouldiers backe againe into his camp. The next morning by breake of day there was a prety litle wind ſtirring, that only blew off the top of his forced mount, and the higheſt part of that maſſe of earth, as chaffe when they winnow corne: and as the Sun began to haue any power, the North wind alſo roſe which forthwith filled all the hill with duſt. And withall came Sertorius ſouldiers, who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thoſe drie clods of clay in peeces. The horſemen on the other ſide, they ſtill managed their horſes vp and downe in it, to raiſe vp the greater duſt, which the wind caried as ſoone as it roſe, and blew into the caues of theſe barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and rifts of the rockes. So they hauing no other vents nor ayre any way, but there where the wind blew vpon them: it did ſo blindfold their eyes, and filled their caues with ſuch a hot ſtuffing ayre, that they were almoſt choaked withall, not able to take breath. For when they ſhould draw their breathes, this ſtuffing ayre and duſt came in at their mouthes ſo faſt, that they had much ado to hold out two dayes, and on the third yeelded themſelues vnto Sertorius mercy: the which thing did not ſo much increaſe his power, as it wanne him honour; by policy to haue wonne ſuch an vnlikely conqueſt, which by force could neuer haue been gotten, and where to fight was a matter impoſſible. So long therefore as he made warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, becauſe Metellus was an old man and heauie, and could not reſiſt Sertorius luſtie youth, that led a light armie, like rather to a company of theeues and robbers, than to an armie of men of warre

Sertorius deeds againſt Pompey.

But afterwards when Pompey was come ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them were encamped each before other, and that Pompey had ſhewed him all the ſtratagemes and policies of warre poſſible for a good captaine to deuiſe, and he the like vnto Pompey, and found that Sertorius had the better of him, both in laying his ambuſhes, and alſo in foreſeeing to intrap him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be ſo great, that euen in ROME it ſelfe he was thought to be the nobleſt Captaine, and of beſt conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwards alſo waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Silla, who gaue him the ſurname of Pompey the great, for that he deſerued the honor of triumph before his beard was growne. So, when he was come thus into SPAINE, diuers townes and cities ſubiect vnto Sertorius, were halfe in mind to yeeld vnto Pompey: but afterwards they altered againe, vpon the chance that happened vnto the citie of LAVRON, beyond all expectation. For Sertorius being gone to lay ſiege to it, Pompey in haſte went thither with his armie to raiſe the ſiege. Neare vnto the citie there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a campe in, and alſo to diſtreſſe them of the citie: whereupon the one made haſte to get it, and the other to keepe him from it. Notwithſtanding, Sertorius was the firſt man, and got the hill: and Pompey came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had ſo fallen out, thinking to haue made Sertorius ſure at that time, being kept in on the one ſide with the citie of LAVRON, and with his armie on the other. Thereupon he ſent vnto the citizens, and bade them care for nothing, more then to ſtand vpon their walles at their pleaſure, to ſee Sertorius ſtraightly beſieged, who thought to haue beſieged them. This meſſage being brought to Sertorius, he ſmiled at it, and ſaid, that he would teach Sillaes young ſcholler (for ſo in mockerie he called Pompey) that a wiſe Captaine ſhould rather ſee behind then before him: and therewithall he ſhewed the LAVRONITANS fiue thouſand footmen well armed, which he had left in his campe when he came to take the hill where he was, to the end that if Pompey came by chance to aſſaile him, they ſhould giue a charge vpon his rereward. Pompey hauing found this too late, durſt not offer Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaſſed in behind: and on the other ſide he was aſhamed to forſake the LAVRONITANS, whom he was driuen in the end to ſee vtterly ſpoyled and deſtroyed before his eyes and durſt not once ſtirre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the countrie part ſeeing no hope of aide by him, yeelded ſtraight vnto Sertorius, who did not onely pardon them, but alſo ſuffered them to go whither they would. Howbeit he burnt the citie, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer ſhewed crueltie in anger (but to ſhame Pompey withall, and to ſtop their mouthes that made ſuch account of him: and that this bruit might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey himſelfe being preſent, and might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly citie of his confederates, neither durſt nor could helpe them.

Sertorius goeth to lay ſiege to the citie of Lauron.

Sertorius worthy ſaying of a Captaine.

Sertorius burnt the citie of Lauron in Pompeyes ſight.

Indeed

Indeed Sertorius in continuance of this warre ſuſtained much loſſe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieutenants: for, as touching himſelfe, he was neuer ouerthrown, nor thoſe he led. And yet he euer wan more honor in recouering of thoſe battels which his Captaines loſt, then his enemies did that had put them to the worſe. As in the battell he wan againſt Pompey, by the citie of SVCRON: and in another he wanne againſt Pompey and Metellus both by the city of TVTTIA. And as for the ouerthrow of SVCRON, it is thought it came through Pompeys ambition, making the more haſte for feare Metellus ſhould be partaker of the honour of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him; and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towards night, ſuppoſing the darknes of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to ſaue themſelues if they were ouercome, and alſo to chaſe the enemies if it ſo happened they had the vpper hand, becauſe they were ſtrangers and knew not the country. When both battels came to giue charge, Sertorius at the firſt was not directly againſt Pompey, but againſt Afranius who led the left wing of Pompeys battell, and himſelfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howbeit Sertorius being aduertiſed that the left wing of his owne armie againſt which Pompey fought, was in ſuch diſtreſſe as they gaue back, and could abide no longer, if they were not preſently aided, ſtraight left the leading of the right wing, which he aſſigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all ſpeed poſſible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And firſt he gathered them together againe which had turned their backs, and after put thoſe alſo in good order that were yet a fighting; and ſo hauing encouraged them, both with his words and the preſence of his perſō, he gaue a new charge againe vpon Pompey, more couragiouſly then before, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chaſing ſuch as fled) and came ſo fiercely vpon him, that he put all the whole armie of the ROMAINES to flight, inſomuch as Pompey himſelfe eſcaped killing in the field very hardly, being ſore hurt, and ſaued by a ſtrange meane. For the AFRICANS of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeyes horſe (which was richly trapped with harneſſe of gold and other precious furniture) falling out among themſelues, and fighting for diuiſion of the ſame, in the meane time let Pompey go, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on the other ſide, whileſt Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battel, made them all flie that ſtood before him, and followed killing of them euen into the trenches of their camp, entring in amongſt them that fled, and ſpoiled the campe, being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeyes ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from ſpoile. Sertorius alſo comming thither vpon the inſtant, finding Pompeys men in diſorder, ſlue a number of them, and the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the field to fight once more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he ſounded the retraite, and diſlodged from the place he incamped, ſaying: Had not that old woman come, I would haue whipped that yong boy to ROME with rods. Now was Sertorius very heauy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white Hind: for thereby all his ſubtiltie and fineneſſe to keepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then ſpecially when they ſtood in need of moſt comfort. But by good hap, certaine of his ſouldiers that had loſt themſelues in the night, met with the Hind in their way, and knowing her by her colour, tooke her and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promiſed them a good reward, ſo that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be ſecretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroad among them, and with a pleaſant countenance told the noble men and cheife Captaines of theſe barbarous people, how the gods had reuealed it to him in his dreame, that he ſhould ſhortly haue a maruellous good thing happen to him: and with theſe words ſate downe in his chaire to giue audience. Whereupon they that kept the Hind not farre from thence, did ſecretly let her go. The Hind being looſe, when ſhe had ſpied Sertorius, ranne ſtraight to his chaire with great ioy, and put her head betwixt his legges, and layed her mouth in his right hand, as ſhe before was wont to do. Sertorius alſo made very much of her, and of purpoſe appeared maruellous glad, ſhewing ſuch tender affection to the Hind, as it ſeemed the water ſtood in his eyes for ioy. The barbarous people that ſtood there by and beheld the ſame, at the firſt were much amazed therewith, but afterwards when they had better bethought themſelues, for ioy they clapped their hands together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull ſhouts, ſaying, and ſtedfaſtly beleeuing, that he was a heauenly creature, and beloued of the gods: whereupon they were maruellouſly pleaſed in their minds, and certainly hoped that their affaires ſhold proſper daily better & better. Another time hauing ſtraighted his enemies with ſcarſitie of victuals, in the territorie of the SAGVNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight againſt his will, for that they ſent great troupes of men to forrage the countrey, to get victuals. Vpon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either ſide, where Memmius was ſlaine, (the valianteſt Captaine Pompey had) couragiouſly fighting in the middeſt of the battell. Sertorius finding himſelfe the ſtronger, followed his firſt wing, making great ſlaughter of thoſe that withſtood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus ſelfe, who taried his coming, defending himſelfe more valiantly then was either hoped or looked for in a man of his yeares: in ſo much as he was at the laſt hurt with a partizan. Which was ſuch a diſhonor to the ROMAINS, not vnto them onely that ſaw it, but vnto ſuch alſo as heard of it, that being all aſhamed to forſake their Captaine, and turning their ſhame into anger againſt their enemies, they couered Metellus round about with their ſhields and targets, and getting him out of the preſſe and furie of the fight, gaue ſuch a fierce onſet, as they draue the SPANIARDS to flie. Thus fortune changing the victorie, Sertorius to giue his ſcattered men time to ſaue themſelues, and leaſure alſo for a new ſupply (which he cauſed to be preſently leauied) to come at their pleaſure, fled of purpoſe into a citie of the mountaines of ſtrong ſituation, and there ſetting a good face of the matter, repaired the rampiers and fortified the gates, thinking nothing leſſe then to abide there to be beſieged, but onely to lay a bait for his enemies, coming to beſiege the citie, hoping they ſhould eaſily win it, and in the meane time left purſuing of the barbarous people, which had thereby good leiſure giuen them to ſaue themſelues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to ſuppreſſe the new ſupply that was comming to Sertorius, who had ſent out his Captaines to the next cities and ſhires adioyning to leauie men, with expreſſe commandement, that when they had muſtered a conuenient number together, they ſhould ſend them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderſtood of their comming, he eaſily paſſed through his enemies to meete them, and with them ſodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worſe then before, ſometime cutting their victuals from them by land, through his ambuſhes and continuall ſubtill policies, being quickly in euery place whither they thought to go, with his light armie; and on the ſea alſo with certain pirats pinnaces, with the which he ſcoured all the coaſt vpon the ſea ſide. By this meanes both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to ſeuer themſelues farre one from the other, in ſo much as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, Pompey remained in SPAINE (in great ſcarſity of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCEIANS, and wrote to the Senate of ROME, that he would returne with his army into ITALY, if they ſent him not money out of hand, for that he had ſpent all his owne, daily fighting for the defence of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME that Sertorius would be in ITALY before Pompey, becauſe he had through his valiancie and great skill brought two of the moſt famous Captaines of their time to great extremitie and diſtreſſe. Then did Metellus ſhew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadful enemy. For he proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, that if any ROMAINE could kill him, he would giue him a hundred ſiluer talents, and twentie thouſand Iugera of land: and if he were a baniſhed man, he promiſed he ſhould be reſtored to his countrey and goods againe, buying his death by treaſon, whom he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore, being his chance once to winne a battell of Sertorius; he was ſo iocond and proud for this victorie, that he would needs therefore be called Imperator, to ſay, Prince, or ſoueraigne Captaine: and was contented the people ſhould ſet vp altars and do ſacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlands of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to diſſolute banquets, ſitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victorie go vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine ſecret engines carying triumphs of gold, and crownes and garlands of triumph, and dauncers of goodly young boyes and faire girles following of them, with ſongs of triumph in his praiſe. Wherin doubtleſſe he deſerued to be laughed at, ſhewing himſelfe ſo much caryed away with ioy and vaine glorie, for one ouerthrow giuen vnto him, whom himſelfe was wont to call Syllaes fugitiue, and the remnant of the baniſhed men of Carbo. On the other ſide, Sertorius noble courage was eaſily diſcerned: firſt, for that he called the baniſhed men which were eſcaped from ROME, and come to him, Senators: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making ſome of them Treaſurers, others Prætors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his country. And in this alſo, that making warres with the ſouldiers of the cities of SPAINE, and defraying the ſame at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authority, ſo much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with Romaine officers and captaines: ſaying ſtill, that he fought for the libertie of the people of Rome, and not to increaſe the glorie and power of the Spaniards, to the hurt & diſhonor of the Romains. For to ſay truly of him, he euer loued his country wel, and longed much to be ſent for home againe: and yet in his greateſt troubles, when things thwarted him moſt, then was his mind greateſt, yeelding no maner of ſhew or appearance to his enemies, of any faint heart or diſcouragement in him. Againe, when he was in beſt proſperitie, and had moſt aduantage of his enemies, he ſent vnto Metellus and Pompey both, letting them vnderſtand that for his part he was content to lay armes aſide, and to liue at home like a priuate man, ſo that he might be lawfully reſtored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meaneſt citizen in Rome, then being a baniſhed man out of his country, to be called Emperour of the world. And it is ſaid, that one of the chiefeſt cauſes which made him deſire ſo much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpon whom he caſt all his loue and delight: inſomuch as after that his friends in Spaine had ſent for him to come to be their captaine, and that he had been a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it ſo ſtrake him to the heart, that he had almoſt died for ſorrow. For he lay ſeuen daies together continually on the ground weeping, and neuer gaue his ſouldiers the watchword, nor would be ſeen of any of his friends: vntill that the other noblemen and captaines of his owne eſtate, came to him to his tent, and were ſo importunate of him by intreatie and perſwaſion, that they got him out of his tent to ſhew himſelfe to his ſouldiers, to ſpeake to them, and to take order for his affaires, which proſpered very well. By theſe ſignes many haue iudged, that he was of a courteous and pitifull nature, and that naturally he was giuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of neceſſitie to take charge of men of warre, becauſe he could not otherwiſe liue quietly nor ſafely, being purſued by his enemies, which would neuer let him reſt, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne guard and ſafety. The treatie ſelfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble mind. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had ouercome was recouered againe (like a wreſtler that being ouerthrowne, getteth vp on his feet to trie another fal with his enemy) & took vpon him to inuade Asia. Sertorius fame was then ſo great, that he was ſpoken of through the world, by merchants coming from the Weſt, who blew abroad the report thereof all the Eaſt parts ouer, euen into the Realme of Pont, like to merchandizes which they went to ſeeke for in ſtrange countries. Whereupon Mithridates being perſwaded by the vaine vaunts of his fauoured Courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hannibal, and himſelfe vnto king Pyrrus, ſaying, that the Romains being ſet vpon by them both, could not withſtand two ſuch excellēt natures, & great powers together, whē the nobleſt captain of the world ſhold be ioyned with the greateſt and moſt puiſſant Prince that euer was: ſent therupon his Ambaſſadours into Spaine vnto Sertorius, with full power and commiſſion to promiſe him money and ſhips towards the maintenance and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he deſired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the poſſeſſion of Asia againe, the which he had ſurrendred vp vnto the Romaines vpon the peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his Councell together (which he termed the Senate) to conſult vpon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he ſhould accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the ſame cōſidering that they asked them nothing but a title in the ayre, and a name of things which were not in their power, offering them therefore things preſent, whereof they had greater need: yet would Sertorius neuer agree therunto. Notwithſtanding, thus much he granted Mithridates that he ſhould enioy Cappadocia and Bithynia, which had euer been countries ſubiect vnto kings, and wherunto the Romaines had neuer any right: excepting this ſpecially that he would neuer ſuffer him to vſurp any countrey, vnto the which the Romaines had any iuſt title; and the which he had loſt in wars by force of armes vnto Fimbria, and had afterwards alſo willingly ſurrendred by agreement made betwixt him & Sylla. For he ſaid he wold enlarge the Empire of Rome through his victories, but not impaire or hurt it by his cōqueſts. For a valiāt man (ſaid he) ſhould couet to conquer with honour, but in no wiſe deſire life with diſhonor. His anſwer being reported vnto king Mithridates, did much amaze him: and ſome haue written, that he then ſaid vnto his familiars: What would Sertorius commaund vs then, if he ſate among them in the Senate at Rome, who being an exile now, & remaining in the fartheſt part of the world by the ſea

Atlanticum doth take vpon him to bound the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs alſo with wars, if we attempt any thing againſt Asia? All this notwithſtãding, they were agreed vpon othes taken betweene them, that Mithridates ſhould enioy the countries of Cappadocia and Bithynia, and that Sertorius ſhould ſend him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre; and that vpon performance thereof, the king ſhould giue him the ſumme of three thouſand talents, and forty ſhips of warr. So Sertorius ſent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of Rome, who fled to him for ſuccour: with whom Mithridates diſtreſſed certaine cities of Asia. And when Marius entred into them, with his ſergeants carying the bundels of rods and axes before him, as before a Proconſull of the Romains, Mithridates gaue him the vpper hand, as his better, & followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did ſet certaine cities at liberty, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodneſſe did releaſe them of their taxe and cuſtomes they paid: ſo that poore Asia which had ben oppreſſed by the couetouſneſſe of the Treaſurers and Farmers of the Romaines, and alſo by the pride & inſolencie of the ſouldiers which lay in garriſon among them, beganne to haue ſome hope of change, and to deſire the alteration of gouernement, which Sertorius offered. But on the other ſide, the Senators of Rome that were in Spaine as baniſhed men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and eſtate that himſelfe was of, they hearing ſay that all was well againe at Rome, and perſwading themſelues that they ſhold be ſtrong enough for their enemies, hauing no cauſe to feare any more danger, began then to enuie Sertorius greatneſſe and authority; but Perpenna ſpecially among other, who by reaſon of his nobility, being puft vp with a vaine preſumption and ambitious ſelfe will, practiſed to make himſelfe chiefe of all the army, and to that end threw forth amongſt his friends and familiars ſuch kind of ſeditious wordes: What curſed fortune (quoth he) my friends doth daily haunt vs worſe then other, making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commanding at this day both land and ſea at his will) to chooſe rather to forſake our lands and countrey? And now being come hither in hope to liue at liberty, we willingly make our ſelues ſlaues, becomming Sertorius guard for defence of his perſon in exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with faire words, calling vs the Senate, whereat euery man laugheth to heare vs ſo called; and in fine we muſt abide this diſhonour to be at his commandement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the Spaniards and Lvsitanians doe themſelues. Hereupon the more part of them being caried away with theſe mutinous words, durſt not yet ſhew themſelues in actuall rebellion againſt Sertorius, being affraid of his authoritie: howbeit ſecretly vnderhand they ouerthrew his doings, by ſhewing extreame cruelty vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iuſtice, impoſing great payments vpon them, giuing out it was Sertorius commandement. By which their leud practiſes, many cities reuolted againſt him, and put themſelues into his enemies hands: and they dayly alſo raiſed new mutinies and rebellions vpon him. Furthermore, thoſe whom he ſent to pacifie the tumults did handle themſelues in ſuch ſort, that where they ſhould haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they ſet them farther out, and procured new tumults. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodneſſe ſo altered, that he committed a moſt cruell act vpon all the noble mens children of that land, which he brought vp at ſchoole in the citie of Osca: for ſome of them he put to death, and others he ſold as ſlaues. Thus Perpenna hauing many aſſociates in his wicked conſpiracy againſt Sertorius, brought into his confederacie alſo one called Manlius, who had chiefeſt charge in all the armie. This Manlius loued a yong boy exceedingly, and becauſe he wold let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plot of this conſpiracie, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him onely: for he ſhould ſee him a great man before it were long. The young boy louing another better then him, called Aufidius, went and reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius maruelling to heare the boy made priuy to it, ſeeing himſelfe alſo was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the boy alſo named Perpenna, Gracinus, and ſome other whom Aufidius knew well to be of counſell, he was worſe affraid then before, but yet ſeemed to make litle of it, and told the boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counſelled him not to credit Manlius words, who was but a vaine man, and boaſted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceiue him. This notwithſtanding, departing thence, he went forthwith vnto Perpenna, and told him how their practiſe was diſcouered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not ſpeedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he ſaid, and

and thereupon they deuiſed this treaſon. They had ſuborned a meſſenger to bring counterfeit letters to Sertorius, fayning in the ſame that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a great battell, in the which he had ſlaine a maruellous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made ſacrifice vnto the gods to giue them thankes. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the preſent oportunitie, inuited Sertorius to ſupper to him, and all other his friends that were preſent (euery one of the conſpiracie with him,) and was ſo importunate with Sertorius, that in the end he promiſed him to come. Now Sertorius did euer vſe great modeſtie at the boord, and wold ſuffer no diſſolute talke nor light parts at his meate, and had acquainted them alſo that vſed his table, to talke of graue and wiſe matters, & yet one to be honeſtly merry with another, without any playing or vncomely talke. In the middeſt of ſupper, they that ſought occaſion of quarrel, began to ſpeake leud words, counterfetting to be drunke, and to play many vile parts, of purpoſe to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he could not abide to ſee thoſe villanous parts, or that he miſtruſted their ill will towards him, by fumbling of their words in their mouthes, and by their vnwonted irreuerent maner ſhewed vnto him: fell backwards vpon the bed where he ſate at meate, ſeeming no more to marke what they did or ſaid. Perpenna at that inſtant tooke a cup full of wine, and making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpoſe. The cup falling downe made a noiſe, and that was the ſigne giuen among them. Therwithal Antonius that ſate about Sertorius at the table, ſtabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thruſt, ſtroue to riſe: but the traiterous murtherer got vpon Sertorius breaſt, and held both his hands. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murthered, not able to defend himſelf, all the conſpirators falling vpō him. Sertorius death being blowne abroade, the moſt part of the SPANIARDS ſent Ambaſſadours immediatly vnto Pompey and Metellus, yeelding themſelues vnto them: and Perpenna with thoſe that remained with him, attempted to do ſomething with Sertorius armie and preparation; but all fell out to his vtter deſtruction and ruine, making the world know that he was a wicked man, who could neither command, nor knew how to obey. For he went to aſſaile Pompey, who had ouerthrowne him ſtraight, and was in the end taken priſoner. And yet in that inſtant of his calamitie, he did not vſe himſelfe like a valiant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to ſaue his life, hauing Sertorius letters and writings, he offered Pompey to deliuer him all Sertorius letters ſent him from the chiefeſt Senators of ROME, written with their owne hands, requeſting Sertorius to bring his armie into ITALY, where he ſhould find numbers of people deſirous of his coming, and that gaped ſtill for change of gouernement. But here did Pompey ſhew himſelfe a graue and no young man, deliuering thereby the citie of ROME from great feare and danger of change and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and writings on a heape together, and burnt them euery one, without reading any of them, or ſuffering them to be read. And moreouer, he preſently put Perpenna to death, fearing he ſhould name ſome, which if they were named, would breed new occaſions of trouble and ſedition. And as for the other conſpirators, ſome of them afterwards were brought to Pompey, who put them all to death: and the reſt of them fled into AFRICKE, where they were all ouerthrowne by them of the countrey, and not a man of them ſcaped, but fell vnfortunatly vpon the edge of the ſword, Auſidius onely except, Manlius companion in loue. Who, either becauſe he was not reckoned of, or elſe, vnknowne, died an old man in a pelting village of the barbarous people, poore miſerable, and hated of all the world.

THE LIFE OF Eumenes.

Vris the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Eumenes was born in the citie of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a cariars ſonne of the ſame countrey, (who for pouerty earned his liuing by carying merchandizes to and fro) and that he was notwithſtanding honeſtly brought vp, aſwell at ſchoole, as at other comely exerciſes. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Philip king of MACEDON chancing to come through the citie of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to doe, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee the young men of the citie handle their weapons, and boyes to wraſtle: and among them, Eumenes ſhewed ſuch actiuitie, and performed it with ſo good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But ſure their report ſeemed trueſt, which write that Philip did aduance him for the loue he bare to his father, in whoſe houſe he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his ſeruice with King Alexander his ſonne, where he was thought a wiſe man, and as faithfull to his maſter, as any: and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe Secretary, yet the King did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefeſt friends or familiars. For he was ſent his Lieutenant general of his whole army, againſt the INDIANS, & was Perdiccas ſucceſſor in the gouernement of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephæſtions charge after his death. Now becauſe Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squires for the bodie vnto the King) after the death of Alexander told the Lords of the councell of MACEDON, that he had ſerued the King with his ſhield and ſpeare, and how Eumenes had followed with his penne and paper: the Lords laughed him to ſcorne, knowing that beſides many great honours Eumenes had receiued, the King eſteemed ſo well of him, that he did him the honour by mariage to make him his kinſeman. For the firſt Ladie that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barſine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a ſonne, and called his name Hercules: and two of her ſiſters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomie, and her other ſiſter alſo called Barſine, he beſtowed vpon Eumenes, when he diſtributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lords and familiars to marie them. Yet all this notwithſtanding, he often fell in diſgrace with King Alexander, and ſtood in ſome danger by meanes of Hephæſtion. For Hephæſtion following Alexanders Court on a time, hauing appointed Euius a fife-player a lodging, which Eumenes ſeruants had taken vp for their maiſter: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out, that a man were better be a fife and a common player of Tragedies, than a ſouldier, ſithence ſithence ſuch kind of people were preferred before men of ſeruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that preſent time was as angry as Eumenes, and roundly tooke vp Hephæſtion for it: howbeit immediatly after hauing changed his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, becauſe he thought him not to haue vſed that franke ſpeech ſo much againſt Hephæſtion, as of a certaine preſumptous boldneſſe towards himſelfe. And at another time alſo, when Alexander was ſending Nearchus with his army by ſea to cleare the coſts of the Ocean, it chanced the king was without money: whereupon he ſent to all his friends to take vp money in preſt, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requeſted three hundred talants. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, & ſaid, he had much ado to get him ſo much of all his tenãts. Alexander ſaid nothing to him neither would he ſuffer them to take his hundred talants: but commanded his officers to ſet Eumenes tent on fire, becauſe he wold take him tardy with a lie, before he could giue order to cary away his gold and ſiluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make ſhift to ſaue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was ſorry it was burnt, becauſe al his letters and writings were burnt withal. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and ſiluer mingled together, about a thouſand talants, & yet Alexander tooke none of it away, but more then that, he ſent vnto all his Lieutenants, Captaines, and Gouernours of countries, wherſoeuer they were, that they ſhould ſend him copies of all the letters which they before had ſent vnto him, becauſe all thoſe which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephæſtion fell at variance againe, by reaſon of a gift that was giuen him, inſomuch as very foule words paſſed betwixt Hephæſtion and him: yet did not the King giue Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after Hephæſtion was dead, the King taking his death grieuouſly whom he loued ſo dearely, gaue no good countenance (and was very briefe beſides) vnto thoſe whom he knew bare any grudge to Hephæſtion whiles he liued, and that he thought were glad of his death, but ſpecially vnto Eumenes of all other, whoſe malice towards Hephæſtion was knowne to him well enough: in ſomuch as he would oft twit him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offered Hephæſtion. But Eumenes being very wiſe, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the ſelfe ſame meane that did him hurt: and deuiſed (to further Alexanders deſire, ſeeking to honour Hephæſtions funerall with all pompe poſſible) new inuentions to ſet forth the ſame, of more magnificence then had before beene ſeene, ſparing for no coſt, laying on mony bountifully, to make him a rich and ſtately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the MACEDONIAN footmen, and the noble men that had been neareſt about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will ſtucke to the Lords, but in words he ſeemed a neuter & friend to both parts, ſaying, It was not for him being a ſtranger, to thruſt himſelf into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lords were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behind pacified the greateſt part of the ſoldiers, and made them more tractable and readie to agree with the Lords. Whereupon, after the Lords and Captaines had conſulted together, and taken order for theſe contentions, they diuided the gouernement of the prouinces among them, which they called Satrapes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coaſt vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZVNTE, the which at that time was not ſubiect to the Empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as king. Howbeit it was ſaid, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in poſſeſſion of it, with a great and puiſſant armie, and make him gouernour there. Yet afterwards Antigonus made none account of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, deſpiſing all other. And Leonatus alſo came downe into PHRIGIA, and vndertooke the iourney of this conqueſt for Eumenes ſake. But when he was in his iourney thitherward, Hecataus tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, and prayed him rather to go helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were beſieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus being willing to take ſea, & go thither, went about to perſwade Eumenes alſo to like of it, & to reconcile him with Hecataus: for they were not friends one with another, by reaſon of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecataus, about the gouernement of their city. Beſides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto King Alexander, ſaying, that he was a tyrant, and beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſet the CARDIANS at liberty. And therefore Eumenes refuſing that iourney againſt the GRECIANS, alleadged that he was affraid of Antipater, who had been his enemie of long time, doubting that for the old grudge he bare him, and alſo to gratifie Hecataus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed himſelfe and his purpoſe to him, and how he made as though he would paſſe ouer the ſea to aide Antipater, where indeed his meaning was to take the kingdome of MACEDON. Thereupon he ſhewed him letters ſent from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PELLA, and there ſhe would marrie him. When Eumenes was made priuate to his purpoſe: either becauſe he feared Antipater, or elſe for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fond man, and very raſh and vnconſtant in his doings, he ſtole away from him by night, with thoſe few men he had (being about three hundred horſemen, and two hundred footmen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the ſumme of fiue thouſand talants; and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and mind: whereupon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counſell. Shortly after Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he himſelf did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken priſoner, and Eumenes eſtabliſhed Gouernor of the country, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his friends, and left them there Captaines of garriſons which he appointed, placing euery where Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernours, and all ſuch other officers neceſſary as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithſtanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas againe: as well to wait vpon him, as alſo becauſe he would euer be about the king. But Perdiccas thinking with himſelfe that he alone could well enough performe the enterpriſe he went about: and conſidering alſo that the realme he left behind him ſtood needfull of a wiſe and skilful Gouernor, whom he might truſt with the ſafety of his ſtate: whē they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes backe againe, vnder colour to ſend him to his gouernment, but indeed to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined vpon the frontires of his country whereof he was Gouernour, becauſe Neoptolemus did vnder-hand practiſe ſome alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proud and inſolent perſon, yet Eumenes ſtill deuiſed to hold him in, & kept him from attempts by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiuing alſo that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footmen were growne exceeding ſtout and inſolent, he for a ſtrength and defence againſt them, ſet vp a company of horſemen; and to bring it to paſſe, releaſed all the countrimen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to ſerue on horſebacke, and brought a great number of horſe of ſeruice, which he gaue amongſt them that were about him, in which he put his moſt truſt and affiance, making them courragious, by honors and gifts he gaue to them that ſerued wel; and ſo by continuall exerciſe and often remouing them frō place to place, made them very ready and ſeruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, ſome much amazed, ſome others very glad when they ſaw how by this diligence Eumenes had in ſo ſhort a time gotten about him ſuch a number, as ſixe thouſand three hundred horſemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing ſubdued the GRECIANS, came on with their army into ASIA to ouerthrow Perdiccas greatneſſe and power: and newes alſo, that ſhortly they wold inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwiſe occupied in warres, fighting againſt Ptolomy, made Eumenes his Lieutenant generall, and gaue him commiſſion and full authority ouer al his ſoldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA, and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the ſame that they ſhould be obedient vnto Eumenes, and ſuffer him to order all matters according to his diſcretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly anſwered, that he would not be at this warre: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were aſhamed to take armes againſt Antipater; and moreouer they wold not fight againſt Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, ſo much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other ſide, was as ready to play the traitour, and to do Eumenes a ſhrewd turne, as Alcetas was. For being ſent by Eumenes to come to him, where he ſhould haue obeyed him, he ſet his mē in battel ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the firſt fruite of his wiſe foreſight of the horſemen, which he had ſet vp to make head againſt the footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footmen were broken and ouerthrown, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horſmen, and took al their cariage. Then he made thē march in order of battel againſt the MACEDONIANS, who were diſperſed euery where, following the chaſe of his footmen, whō they had ouerthrowne. Thus coming vpon them in this diſorder; he draue them to throw away their weapons, and to yeeld vnto him: and moreouer, euery man to take his oath to ſerue him faithfully in this war, wherſoeuer he would leade them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater:

who ſent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he ſhould not onely enioy the countries and prouinces ſtill which he had in gouernment, but furthermore that they would giue him others vnto them, and make him ſtronger then euer he was: beſides that by the acceptation of the offer, he ſhould be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemie. Whereunto Eumenes made anſwer: that hauing alwayes beene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a ſudden become his friend, ſpecially ſeeing him vſe his friends as enemies: howbeit otherwiſe that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to reſtore him againe to his fauour, vpon reaſonable and indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he meant to aſſaile him, that then he would aide him ſo long as he had any breath in his bodie, and would loſe his life before he would breake his promiſe. This anſwer being brought vnto Antipater, they fell to conſult at leiſure what was to be done. In the meane ſpace, Neoptolemus that fled vpon his ouerthrow, was come vnto them: who told them how the battell was fought, and beſought them both very inſtantly (but Craterus chiefely) to giue him aide if it were poſſible. For the MACEDONIANS were ſo farre in loue with him, that if they did but ſee his hat, and heare him ſpeake, they would all arme themſelues and follow him. For to ſpeake a troth, Craterus was had in great eſtimation among the MACEDONIANS: inſomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more deſired of the common ſouldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their ſakes incurred Alexanders diſgrace and diſpleaſure, becauſe he went about to perſwade him to leaue the king of PERSIAES manner, wherunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue himſelfe: and alſo for that he maintained and defended the cuſtome of the countrey of MACEDON, the which euery man through pride and exceſſe began to forſake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus ſent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himſelfe with Neoptolemus, went againſt Eumenes with the beſt part of his army, hoping to take him tardie and altogether vnprouided, ſuppoſing he would giue himſelfe to pleaſure and paſtime, after ſo great a victorie. But Eumenes, like a wiſe and valiant Captaine, had taken ſuch order, that he heard newes time enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readineſſe to reſiſt him. Yet was not this the chiefeſt point of his skill in warre: for he looked ſo preciſely to his doings, that he did not onely keepe his enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did; but making his men alſo to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew againſt whom they ſhould fight, and to keepe alſo ſo dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge, that of all other ſhewed the paſſing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policy. Firſt, he made a rumor to be ſpread in his hoaſt, how Neoptolemus and Pigres were againe come againſt him, with certaine horſemen of all ſorts gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great deſire of ſleepe came vpon him, in the which he had a maruellous ſtrange dreame. For it ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with another, either of them leading a battell of footmen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN faſhion: who coming to giue charge the one vpon the other, the goddeſſe Minerua came to aide the one, and Ceres likewiſe to aide the other. Then he thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowne, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to giue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perſwaded himſelfe that this dreame made for him, and promiſed him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile countrey of corne, where was great plentie of it. For all the fields were ſowne with corne in euerie place, that it was a pleaſure to behold it, ſhewing the benefite of long peace, to ſee all the corne fields how greene they looked. But when he vnderſtood that the enemies had giuen their ſouldiers for the ſignall of battell, Minerua and Alexander, then was his firſt imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gaue Ceres aad Alexander for ſignall of the battell to his ſouldiers, and commaunded euery man to make him a garland of wheate eares to weare on their heads, and that they ſhould wreath flowers and noſegaies about their pikes. He was in mind many times to make his truſtieſt Captaines priuie againſt whom they ſhould fight, and not alone to truſt himſelfe withall, to keepe ſo neceſſary a thing as that ſecret: yet in fine, he kept his firſt reſolution, thinking it the ſafeſt way, not to commit this danger, but to himſelfe. Now when he came to giue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly againſt Craterus, but ſet two companies of men at armes that were ſtrangers againſt him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus ſonne) and Phanix Tenidian did leade. Then he ſpecially commaunded, that ſo ſoone as they ſaw the enemies before them, they ſhould ſtraight giue charge, giuing them no leiſure to ſpeake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Herauld or trumpet that they ſhould ſend vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne againſt him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himſelfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefeſt men of all his armie, where he would meete full with Neoptolemus front. When they had paſſed a litle hill that ſtood betweene both battels, Eumenes horſemen following his commaundement, ranne with full carriere to ſet vpon their enemies. Craterus ſeeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and curſed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that ſort, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his ſide, if they might but once ſee him: notwithſtanding, he prayed them that were about him, to ſhew themſelues like valiant men that day, and therewithall fiercely ſet ſpurres to his horſe to meet with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either ſide, and their ſtaues being broken, they fell ſtraight to their ſwords: but that day did not Craterus diſhonour the memorie of Alexander, for he ſlue many of his enemies round about him, valiantly repulſed them that did aſſaile him, and many times ouerthrew them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him ſuch a blow on the ſide, that he turned him off his horſe, and when he was downe, many paſſed ouer him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horſe, and appointed men about him to guard him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the very pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other ſide, which had bin mortall enemies of long time, being on fire with an old malice, they ſought vp and downe the one for the other. And at the two firſt courſes they could not one light vpon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, their ſwords drawne, and with great cries gaue charge vpon each other. And their horſes met ſo fiercely together, as if two armed galleys had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their horſes neckes, cloſed together, and with both hands ſtriued to plucke off each others head peece, & to rent their polrons from their ſhoulders. Whileſt they were thus tearing each other their horſes ran frō them, and they fel to the ground, one holding the other faſt as if they had wraſtled together. Neoptolemus got vp firſt: but as he roſe, Eumenes cut the ham of his legge, and raiſed himſelfe vp withall. Neoptolemus ſtaying himſelfe vpon one knee, his other legge, being very ſore hurt, defended himſelfe on the ground the beſt he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could giue him no deadly wound: neuertheleſſe himſelfe had a blow on the necke, that layed him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choler againſt him, went about to ſtrip him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious mood, remembred not that Neoptolemus had his ſword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groine, not farre from his priuie parts: howbeit the wound made Eumenes worſe afraid then there was cauſe of hurt, for that Neoptolemus ſtrength was gone before the ſtroake came, dying preſently vpon it. Eumenes hauing ſtripped him, found himſelfe very ill (by reaſon of his wounds) on his armes and legges, which had many a ſore gaſh: notwithſtanding, he got vpon his horſe againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had beene fighting ſtill. But there being told that Craterus had his deaths wound, he went ſtraight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not paſt knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horſe, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accurſed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitifull ſtate, and had alſo forced him to be in battell againſt one of his deereſt friends, to make him the inſtrument of his vtter vndoing. This ſecond battell Eumenes wanne ten daies after the firſt battell obtained, which got him great honour, for that he had diſcomfited one of his enemies through wiſedome, and the other by valiantneſſe. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his friends alſo that tooke his part, when they bethought them, that he being a ſtranger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS themſelues, ſlaine the greateſt and moſt famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had been ſo happy, as to haue liued and receiued the aduertiſement of Craterus death, no doubt he had been the greateſt perſon of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill lucke would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was ſlaine in a mutinie of his men in ÆGYPT, newes came to his armie of Eumenes victory, and alſo of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were ſo offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, and gaue Antigonus and Antipater commiſſion to execute the reuenge. When

Eumenes passing by mount Ida(where the king kept a race and breed of horſes) had taken away with him as many horſes as he would, and had ſent letters of aduertiſement therof to the kings riders: Antipater, as it is reported, ſmiled, and in mockerie ſaid, that he maruelled to ſee Eumenes great care, to thinke that he ſhould either giue or receiue any account of the kings goods. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of Lydia, eſpecially neare vnto the chiefe citie of Sardis, becauſe he was the ſtronger in horſemen, and for that he wold make Cleopatra ſee the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high Phrygia, and wintred in the citie of Celænes. But there Polemon Alcetas and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the armie, ſaying that they had as much right to leade the armie as he. Eumenes anſwered them. Truly here is the common ſaying vp and downe: Deſperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes hauing promiſed his ſouldiers pay within three dayes, to keep his promiſe, ſold them al the farmes and caſtles of that country, together with the men and beaſts of the ſame, wherof the prouince was fully repleniſhed. Therupon his Lieutenants of the bands hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of batterie which he ſuffered them to cary with him: and hauing taken them, they went and diuided the ſpoile, paying euery ſouldier ratably his wages due. This deuice brought him againe in fauour among his ſouldiers. For certaine papers being found in his campe caſt abroad by his enemies, promiſing great offices, and a hundred talents beſides to any man that killed Eumenes: the Macedonians that ſerued vnder him were ſo offended withall, that they preſently ſet downe an order, that from that time forward a thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers among them (which alſo had charge vnder them) ſhould alwaies guard his perſon, keeping watch euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Wherunto they all agreed: and Eumenes gaue them thoſe honors and rewards which the kings of Macedon were wont to giue vnto their friends, and which they gladly receiued. For through their grant he had authoritie to giue purple cloakes and hats to whom he thought good, which was the honorableſt gift the king of Macedon could giue. It is true, that proſperity maketh ſimple men high minded, wherby they ſeeme (though they be not) very honorable, but ſpecially whē fortune hath raiſed them to honor and wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble mind and ſtout courage, is beſt diſcerned in aduerſity: for he neuer yeelded to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had loſt a battel among the Orcynians, in the realme of Cappadocia, through the treaſon of one of his ſouldiers he being purſued, yet neuer gaue the traitor any leiſure to flie to his enemies for ſafety, but took him and truſſed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horſe head vpon a ſudden, and leauing his enemies ſide-hand of him that had him in chaſe, he cloſely ſtole by them without their knowledge, and held on iourneying ſo long, vntil he came to the ſelf ſame plaine where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies (the captaines by themſelues, and the ſouldiers apart) he burnt them with the doores, gates, and windowes of all the villages and townes thereabouts that he could get together: and in ſteed of tombes for them, he raiſed vp great heapes of earth. Inſomuch as Antigonus coming thither immediatly after, he wondered much at his valiantneſſe and inuincible courage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, and might eaſily without danger haue taken a number of priſoners as well free as bond, and haue gottē all the riches and treaſure which they had ſpoiled in ſo many ſundry warres, townes and countries: howbeit he was afraid that if his ſouldiers were loden with that ſpoile, it would make them more heauie to march, and vnable to flie, but ſpecially more tender to abide to runne from place to place a long time together, being the onely meane wherein he truſted to come to end this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be wearie in following him ſo long a time, and therefore that he would turne ſome other way. Moreouer he perceiued that it was impoſſible for him by his authority to keepe the Macedonians from taking ſuch a prey, as offered it ſelfe vnto them: whereupon he commaunded them to ſtay a while, and bait their horſe firſt, and then that they ſhould go ſtraight to ſpoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he ſecretly ſent a meſſenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all ſpeed out of the plaine, & to get him to the hanging of a hill not far from thence, and ſafe from horſemen, where they could not be enuironed, and there to fortifie himſelfe, ſending him word alſo, that he ſent him this aduertiſement, for the old friendſhip and acquaintance that had been betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men truſſe vp their cariage ſtraight, Therupon Eumenes openly ſent certaine light armed men to diſcouer, and to bring him newes: and therewithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their horſes, as if he had meant to haue led them againſt the enemies. His ſcouts were now returned, and told him that it was vnpoſſible either to diſtreſſe or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of ſuch ſtrength, and therefore was not to be come by. Eumenes ſeemed to be very ſorry for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithſtanding. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, and the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, and after that loued him better then euer they did before: becauſe that hauing their children in his hands whō he might haue made ſlaues, and their wiues alſo whom he might haue defiled he ſpared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humour, told them, Ye are deceiued, my friends: for it was not for your ſakes, nor yet to pleaſure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, and your goods, but only for the feare he had to haue ſhackles on his heeles, to let him from ſpeedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled ſtill before Antigonus, and wandring vp and downe, did himſelfe wiſh his ſouldiers to get them ſomewhere elſe; either indeed for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue ſuch a number about him, being too few to fight a battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a ſtrange place of ſituation, called NORA, in the confines of LYCAONIA and CAPPADOCIA, with fiue hundred horſmen, and two hundred footmen well armed: and when he was come thither alſo, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that aſked him licence, becauſe they could not haue abidden the diſcōmodity of the place, which was very ſtraight, and the lack of neceſſary victuals, which they muſt needs haue wanted, if the ſiege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the fort, but would not beſiege it, before he ſent for Eumenes to come to him vpon his word. Eumenes anſwered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the heads of his tribe, and that himſelfe on the other ſide had not a noble man for whom he fought: and therefore if Antigonus would haue him come and ſpeake with him, that he ſhould ſend him one of his chiefeſt friends in hoſtage. Againe, Antigonus being earneſt with him, and telling him, it was reaſon he ſhould come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power; Eumenes anſwered him: I will acknowledge none better then my ſelf, ſo long as I can hold my ſword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes requeſt) ſent his owne nephew Ptolomie into the fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced & ſaluted each other, as friends of old acquaintance and familiaritie, and ſo fell in talke of diuers matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made requeſt to depart in ſafety, neither yet demanded pardon, but onely defired the confirmation of his charge and gouernment, and that he might be reſtored to that which was giuē him. They that were preſent at that meeting, maruelled much at Eumenes, and greatly commended his ſtoutneſſe. Now whiles they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all parts of the campe, to ſee what maner of man Eumenes was: becauſe that after the death of Craterus, there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers of any Captaine but of Eumenes. Neuertheleſſe. Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes ſome miſchiefe, commanded them aloud to giue backe, and made ſtones to be throwne among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithſtanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his guard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much ado to deliuer him ſafely into his fort againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compaſſed this fort of NORA round about with a wall, and left a ſufficient number of men to continue the ſiege, and ſo went his way with the reſt of his army. In the mean time Eumenes remained beſieged within this fort, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and ſalt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor of ſweete taſte, to ſuſtaine them with their bread. Yet with ſuch as he had he kept them in good likeing that were in houſe with him. For he made them euery one after another ſit at his boord with him, and withall did faſhion out that maner of diet, with a certaine life and familiaritie of pleaſant deuices to entertaine them at their meate. For beſides that he ſought to ſhew them as pleaſant a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a ſweete faire face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had been trained vp in it: but like a freſh youth, being of ſuch a conſtitution of body, that the excellenteſt workman that euer was, could not better ſet out all the parts and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be ſeene in him. His ſpeech was not harſh nor churliſh, but very milde and pleaſant, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the ſiege, there was nothing that more more annoyed the beſieged then the narrowneſſe of the fort wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlongs compaſſe about, and their houſes ſo litle and narrow, that they could ſcant turne them in them, and did eate and drinke without any manner of exerciſe for themſelues, or their horſe. Now Eumenes to take away the ſluggiſhneſſe that groweth by idleneſſe, a thing moſt hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines, to keepe them in breath; and to make them the lighter to flie, if occaſion were offered, put his men into the longeſt and wideſt hall he had in his houſe (being fourteene cubits long to walk vp and downe in) and taught them firſt of all to march faire and ſoftly, and then by litle & litle to haſten their pace: for the horſes he had, them he made to be girt before, one after another, & thē did ſoftly triſe them vp with long pulleys faſtned to the beames, their hindmoſt part ſtanding on the ground, and their formoſt being aloft. The horſes being triſed vp in this maner, their riders came with loud cries behind them and ſome with whips in their hands to laſh them, that the horſe being mad withall, yerked out behind, & ſprang forward with his formoſt legs to touch the ground, that they did but euen raſe it a litle, ſo as euery veine and ſinew of them were ſtrained by this meanes, that they blew, and were all of a fome withall: ſo good an exerciſe to them it was, as wel to put them in breath, as to keepe their legs ſupple to run. After that, they had their oates very cleane pickt and dreſſed, that they might digeſt them the ſooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this ſiege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, and that the realme was in a great broile, through the factions of Caſſander and Polypercon. Antigonus whoſe head was ſtraight full of great imaginations, greedily coueting with himſelfe the whole kingdome of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his friend, that through his help he might attaine his deſired purpoſe. Therupon he ſent Hieronymus vnto him to treat of peace, & gaue him the forme of the oath which he wold haue him ſweare vnto him. When Eumenes had ſeene it, he would not be ſworne in that maner, but corrected it, and ſaid: that he did referre himſelfe to the iudgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him beſieged, to iudge which of thoſe two formes was moſt meeteſt, that which Antigonus had ſent him, or the ſame which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of oath, there was a litle mention only made at the beginning of the bloud royall, but in all the reſt following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himſelfe. But Eumenes in his forme of oath, did firſt of all put Olympias the mother of king Alexander, & the kings his ſons afterwards: and for the reſt he ſwore he would be friend of the friends, and enemy of the enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the ſiege before NORA, did better like the forme of Eumenes oath, then they did that of Antigonus. So hauing giuen Eumenes his oath, and made him ſweare according to that forme, they raiſed their ſiege, and ſent alſo vnto Antigonus to take his oath. All this accompliſhed, Eumenes redeliuered the CAPPADOCIANS their hoſtages, (which he had kept in NORA with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their ſtead, horſe of warre, beaſts of carriage, tents and pauilions. Thus he began to gather his men againe together, which were diſperſed abroad after his ouerthrow, ſo that in few dayes he was aboue a thouſand horſemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Antigonus: and he did wiſely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to ſhut him vp againe ſtraighter then he was before: but beſides that wrote ſharpe letters, and verie angrily vnto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the oath. Whileſt Eumenes wandred vp and downe flying ſtill, he receiued letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatneſſe) and ſpecially from Olympias, which ſent vnto him to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young ſonne Alexander, whom they ſought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewiſe receiued letters from Polyperchon, and from king Philip, who commanded him to make war with Antigonus with his armie he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purſe of the kings fiue hundred ſiluer talents (which had been taken from him before) which were in the citie of CYNDES: and beſides, to defray the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meet. And therewithall alſo they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraſpides, to wit, the ſouldiers with the ſiluer ſhields, or ſhields ſiluered, which were of the old bands of Alexanders armie. Theſe two Captaines hauing receiued theſe letters, did vſe Eumenes with very good words, and ſhewed him great countenance: yet a man by their lookes might eaſily coniecture that they enuied him; for either of them both thought themſelues men ſufficient, and worthy to commaund Eumenes, not to aid him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued himſelfe verie wiſely, for as touching their enuie, he pacified that, becauſe he tooke not the money which he was commanded to take for his owne vſe, for that he had no need of it. And as for their ambition and preſumption, diſdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell how to command nor obey, he did reclaime them by a ſuperſtition he layd before them, which was this. He made them beleeue that Alexander did appeare to him in his ſleepe, and that he ſhewed him a pauilion ſumptuouſly ſet out in the ſtate and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and told him, that if they would keepe their councell place in that pauilion, he would be preſent among them, and aide them in all their counſels, and conducts of their warres, ſo that they would alwaies begin by him. He eaſily perſwaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleeue that which he ſpake, who would not go to him to conſult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for himſelf to be ſeene to go to other mens gates. Wherfore with al their conſents they incontinently ſet vp a goodly rich pauillion, which was called Alexanders pauilion: and there they kept their councels and aſſemblies for diſpatch of all their weightieſt cauſes. After this, they went towards the high countries, & met with Peuceſtas on the way (Eumenes very great friend) who ioyned with them, and other great peers of the realme, with all their power beſides. This did greatly ſtrengthen the army of the noblemen of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armours and furniture: but for their owne perſons, becauſe they had no man to command them ſince the death of Alexander, they were growne ſelfe willed by diſſolute liberty, and effeminate in their manner of life: and moreouer they had gotten a tyrannicall fierceneſſe, nouriſhed and increaſed by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with another, but ſhamefully flattered the old bands of the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, giuing them money, and making them banquets and feaſts of ſacrifices. And thus in ſhort time, of a campe they brought it to be a diſſolute tauerne, where the noblemen got the ſouldiers fauour that they might be choſen Chieftaines of all the armie: like as the common peoples voices are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honourable ſtates and offices of the common wealth. Now Eumenes found ſtraight that theſe peeres of the realme diſdained one another, howbeit that they al feared and miſtruſted him, and ſought but for oportunitie to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occaſion to occupie mony, and ſo borrowed a great ſumme of them ſpecially whom he knew moſt hated him, to the end that from thenceforth they ſhould no more diſtruſt, but truſt him, ſtanding in feare to loſe the mony they had lent him. And therof followed a ſtrange thing: for other mens mony and goods was the ſafety of his life. For where others giue money to ſaue their liues, he by taking of money ſaued his owne life. Now for the ſoldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whileſt they ſaw they were without danger of enemies to make them afraid, they ſtill hung vpon them that gaue them, being deſirous to be made Generals, and came euery morning to their vpriſing to waite upon them, and follow them whereſoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puiſſant armie, and that their caſe required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the ſouldiers alone, but all the peeres and ſtates beſides (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) ſubmit themſelues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commandement. For when Antigonus aſſayed all the waies he could to paſſe ouer the riuer of Paſitigris, the peeres which were laied in diuers places to let him from paſſing ouer, heard nothing of it, ſo that there was none but Eumenes onely that reſiſted him, and fought with him, where he ſlue ſuch a number of his men, that he filled the riuer with them, and tooke foure thouſand of them priſoners. Againe, when Eumenes was ſicke, theſe old bands did more plainly ſhew what opinion they had of him, and of others, to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheere at their houſes; yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthieſt to be their Captaine, and to command them. For Peuceſtas hauing feaſted them in the kingdome of PERSIA, and giuen euery ſouldier a mutton to ſacrifice, thought he had won great fauor and credit among them. But ſhortly after, as the army marched againſt their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerouſly ſicke, and therfore would needs be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noiſe, becauſe he could take no reſt. But they had not gone farre, before they ſaw their enemies, which hauing paſſed ouer certaine litle hils betweene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the ſoldiers ſaw the gliſtering of the gilt armours of their enemies that glared in the Sunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephants with the towers vpon their backes, and the men at armes with their purple coates vpon their armours (which was the apparell they they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremoſt ſtaid vpon it, and cried out, willing them to ſend for Eumenes to leade them; for they would elſe go no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therwithal they raiſed their pikes, and laid down their ſhields at their feet, calling from one to another to ſtay, and to their priuate Captaines alſo: and told them plainely, that they would not ſtirre a foot from thence, nor fight at all, vnleſſe Eumenes were among them to leade them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great ſpeed, haſtning his ſlaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on euery ſide, he held out his right hand to the ſouldiers, and told them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The ſouldiers alſo as ſoone as they ſaw him, ſaluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their ſhields, clapping them againſt their pikes with a great ſhout, bidding their enemies come when they would, they ſhould be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other ſide, being informed by certaine priſoners which his ſouldiers had taken in skirmiſh, that Eumenes was fallen very ſore ſicke, and by reaſon therof was caried in a litter, thought now he ſhould haue no great ado to diſcomfit the reſt of the army, and therefore made all poſſible ſpeed he could to fight. But when he came ſo neare, that he might eaſily ſee the order and countenance of his enemies, who were ſet in ſuch good order of battell, that it could not any waies be amended, he was much amazed withall, and pawſed a great while; and in the meane time ſpied Eumenes litter a farre off, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloud, as his manner was, and turning himſelfe to his friends, ſaid: See, ſaid he, I beleeue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with thoſe words, he ſounded the retraite, and brought his men backe againe into his campe. Antigonus mocke to Eumenes.

When this feare was a little paſſed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old trade againe, the Peeres to flatter the ſoldiers, and the ſoldiers to waxe braue and ſtoute againſt their Captaines: ſo that when they came to take their garriſons for the winter time, they diuided in maner among them the whole countrie of the GABENIANS, the firſt from the laſt being lodged almoſt a thouſand furlongs off. Which Antigonus vnderſtanding, determined to ſet vpon thē, they miſtruſting nothing; and ſo went ſodainly towards them, by a ſhorter way then that he had alreadie come, but the worſer way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if he met them thus diſperſed aſunder, their Captaines could not readily aſſemble them all together. But while he was in this his iourney, in the deſert crooked way, he was ſo ouertaken with ſuch boiſterous winds and extreame bitter cold, that his ſouldiers could go no further, but were forced to tarrie ſtill, to prouide them preſent remedy againſt the furie of the time. Now the only remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knew of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines, towards the deſert, being amazed to ſee ſuch a number of fires in the valley, ſent preſently with ſpeed vpon two camels light loden, to aduertiſe Peuceſtas, who being neareſt vnto the mountaines was ſo ſcared with theſe newes, that he was at his wits end, not knowing what to do. For ſeeing his other companions as much afraid as himſelfe, he fled vpon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, aſſuring them that he would ſtay the ſudden attempt of their enemies, and that they ſhould come three dayes later then they looked for: which they beleeued. Then did Eumenes ſend meſſengers into euery quarter to all the Captaines, commanding them ſpeedily to put their men in readines, and to meet him in a certaine place which he appointed. Himſelfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to chuſe a fit ground to lodge a campe, the which might eaſily be ſeen from the top of the mountaines which they muſt paſſe that come from the deſert: and there fortified the ſame with trenches, and diuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, ſuch a diſtance off one from another, as they vſe commonly to make in a campe. It was no ſooner done, but Antigonus came to the top of the mountaines, and ſaw theſe fires afarre off, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had long before knowne of his comming, and that they came againſt him. Being affraid therefore leſt his enemies would compell him to fight, comming freſh vpon him, his owne men being wearie and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that deſert countrey: he tooke his way to leade backe his army, not the neareſt way by the which he came, but through the country richly inhabited and repleniſhed with great cities and good townes, to refreſh his ouer-wearied people. Yet ſeeing he had none alarmes giuen, nor any skirmiſhes offered him, (as they vſe commonly when both armies are neare together) and that the valley men told him that they Eumenes ſtratageme againſt Antigonus.

had ſeene none other armie but his, ſauing that round about there was ſtore of fires: then he ſtraight miſtruſted that it was one of Eumenes ſtratagemes of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in ſuch a rage, that he went ſtraight to the place where he thought to find him, determining no more to ſteale vpon him, but to put all to the hazard of a battell. But in the meane time, the moſt part of the hoaſt was gathered about Eumenes, for the great eſtimation euery man had of his wiſedome and ſufficiencie: inſomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant generall ſhould command the whole armie. This ſpited the two Captaines of the ARGYRASPIDES, Antigenes and Teutamus, who bare him ſuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth they practiſed his death: and aſſembling together with many of the States and particular Captaines, they ſate in councell to know when, and in what ſort they ſhould kill him. Howbeit the moſt voices aſſembled in this councell, were whole of opinion, that they ſhould take the benefit of his ſeruice in leading the battell, and that immediatly after they ſhould put him to death. This being thus reſolued vpon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and another called Phædimus, went ſecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded vpon in the aſſembly againſt him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they ſought to pleaſure him, but onely becauſe they were afraid to loſe the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thanks, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his beſt friends, and told them: You ſee how I am enuironed with a troope of wild & brutiſh beaſts. That done, he made his Will, and tore all the letters and writings that had ben ſent him, becauſe he would not haue them ſuffer for him after his death, that had ſent him ſecret aduertiſements. Afterwards when he had diſpoſed of all his priuate matters in this ſort, he ſtood in a doubt whether he ſhould loſe the battell, giuing his enemies the victory, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA & ARMENIA. Howbeit he reſolued of nothing before his friends. But when the miſchiefe he was in had put diuers thoughts into his head, in fine, he determined to fight, and did ſet his army in battel ray, perſwading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous people to ſtand to it like men. And as for the old ſoldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they ſo litle needed exhortation, that they themſelues did exhort Eumenes to be of good courage ſaying: that their enemies wold neuer abide them, becauſe they were all the oldeſt ſouldiers, and of greateſt experience that had been in all the conqueſts of king Philip, and of his ſonne Alexander; and that it was neuer heard that they had been ouerthrowne in any ſet battell, the moſt of them being threeſcore and ten yeares old, and the youngeſt no leſſe then threeſcore. Whereupon, when they ran with great furie to giue charge vpon their enemies, they cryed out aloude, ſpeaking to the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were vnder Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And ſo aſſailing them with a luſtie courage, and in rage withall, in a ſhort ſpace ouerthrew the ſquadron of their enemies, and ſlue the moſt part of them in the field. Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowne on that ſide: but on the other ſide where his men of armes were, through Peuceſtas cowardlineſſe (that handled himſelf very ill at that battell) he had the vpper hand and wanne all their cariage, through his foreſight in the greateſt fury of the battell, and the ſtrength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a mariuellous great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet too hard vnderfoot, but couered ouer with a ſmall fine ſand, much like to a drie ſand the ſea caſteth vp, and leaueth vpon the ſhore. This ſand being ſcattered abroad by riding and going too and fro of ſo many thouſands of men and horſes during the time of the battell foughten, had raiſed ſuch a mighty duſt and white ſmoke in the elemẽt, as if they had ſtirred or tempered white lime together: which troubled their ſight ſo ſore, as they could ſee nothing before them: in reſpect whereof Antigonus might eaſily ſeize all their cariage, themſelues being neuer a whit the wiſer. The battell being come to this paſſe you haue heard, Teutamus ſent preſently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage again, which he had taken and caried into his campe. Antigonus made him anſwer, that he would not only redeliuer the goods vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreouer vſe them with all the fauour he could ſo farforth as they deliuered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke preſently a wicked reſolution, to deliuer him aliue into ỹ hands of his enemies. And with that determinatiõ they came neare vnto him, not making any countenance as though they would lay hands on him, but rather ſeeming to guard and defend his perſon, as their maner was: ſome of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had won the battell: and others accuſing the noblemen of cowardlines, ſaying, that the

the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of them hauing ſpied his time, flew to him, and tooke his ſword out of his hand: the others ſtraight laid hold of him. and bound both his hands behind him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnderſtanding it, ſent Nicanor thither to take him out of their hands, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes hauing made requeſt vnto them to ſuffer him to ſpeake, as they brought him through the bands of theſe old MACEDONIAN ſouldier, it was granted him with condition, that he ſhould make no motion vnto them to turne from that they were determined to do, but to tell them of things, which (as he ſaid) tended greatly to their benefit. Whereupon ſilence being made, he got vp vpon a little hillocke, and there ſpake vnto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithleſſe men, the wickedeſt that euer MACEDON bred! What ſo great triumph or victory, hath euer Antigonus wonne of you, hauing fought it ſuch infinite wayes, as you your ſelues doe now put into his hands, deliuering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great ſhame, that being maſters of the field, you will grant the honour of the victory vnto your enemie, only for a litle couetouſneſſe of money and paltarie ſtuffe which you haue loſt? And yet is not this all, but the worſt behind: to ſend your Captaines as you do to pay the ranſome of your baggage. For my ſelf, though now they leade me bound, yet do I remain free vnouercome, vanquiſher of mine enemies, and ſold by them that ſhould be my friends. Well, yet this requeſt I onely make vnto you in the name of Iupiter, protector of armes, and for the honour of the gods, (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray & coniure you, to kill me your ſelues in this place. For all commeth to one end. To be ſlaine in Antigonus campe by the hands of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deed: and you may be aſſured he will not be angry withall, for he onely deſireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needs hold your hands from this attempt, vnlooſe yet one of mine onely, that ſhall ſuffice to do the feate. And if for feare ye will not put a ſword in my hand, throw me bound yet hand and feete vnto wild beaſts: which if ye performe, then do I diſcharge you of your oth taken between both my hands which ye haue ſworne vnto your Captaine, as holily & perfectly performed. Vpon this ſpeech of Eumenes, all the reſt of the army had compaſſion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cried out to cary him away, and not to giue eare to his preaching: and that it was a good deed to puniſh this wicked CHOERONESIAN, according to his deſerts, conſidering that he had turmoiled the MACEDONIANS with endleſſe warre and battell. And moreouer, that it were too much ſhame that the worthieſt ſouldiers that euer ſerued king Philip and Alexander, ſo painfully in al their warres, ſhold for recompence of their ſeruice in their old age be turned a begging, their wiues hauing now lien three nights with their enemies. With thoſe words, they violently draue him on towards Antigonus campe, who fearing leſt the multitude of people that ranne to ſee him, would ſmoother him in the preſſe, becauſe euery man ranne out of the campe, he ſent thither ten of the ſtrongeſt Elephants he had, and a good number of men at armes of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the preſſe. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his heart would not ſerue him to ſee him in that miſerable ſtate, for that they had once been familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, ſuch as had him in their cuſtodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would haue him kept: who anſwered them: Like a Lion or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pitie of him, and diſcharged him of his weightieſt irons, and ſent one of his houſhold ſeruants to him to ſee him well vſed, and ſuffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many dayes before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man ſpeake, and pondering their purpoſes and ſeuerall opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his owne ſonne Demetrius ſpake for Eumenes, and made ſuite to ſaue his life, contrarie to all the other Lords and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any caſe haue him die. Eumenes ſtanding in theſe termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus meant, that hauing his enemie in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or nobly deliuer him? Onomarchus churliſhly anſwered him againe, that the time was paſt now to ſhew his courage, as though he feared not death: and that he ſhould haue ſhewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Iupiter (quoth he) ſo haue I done, and if thou beleueſt not me, aske them that ſet vpon me: for I neuer met with man yet more ſtrong then my ſelfe. Onomarchus replied againe: ſith now therfore thou haſt found a ſtronger then thy ſelf, why then canſt thou not abide his pleaſure? In fine, whē Antigonus had reſolued of his death, he commanded them to giue him no more meate: and thus taking his ſuſtenance from him, Eumenes was three daies a dying. In the meane time came ſuch newes, that ſuddenly the campe remoued, and therfore before their departure, a man was ſent to Eumenes to diſpatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licenced his friends to take his body & burn it, and then to gather his aſhes and bones to ſend them to his wife and children. Eumenes being ſlaine in this manner, the gods appointed none other iudges to reuenge the diſloyalty and treaſon of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying Eumenes, but Antigonus ſelfe: who deteſting them as cruell murtherers, and periured perſons to the gods, appointed Ibyrtius Gouernor of the prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euery mothers ſon what way he could, that none of them might euer ſee MACEDON againe, nor the Greekiſh ſea.

THE COMPARISON OF Eumenes with Sertorius.

The gouernment of Eumenes and Sertorius.

HEre haue we ſet downe the things worthy memorie of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being ſtrangers in a ſtrange countrey, and baniſhed out of their owne, had alwayes been Captaines of diuers nations, and chieftaines of great and warlike armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all thoſe of his faction gaue him the chiefeſt place of authoritie, as the moſt ſufficienteſt man among them, and worthieſt to commaund: where Eumenes hauing many that contended againſt him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the ſame. So that they obeyed the one, deſiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine: and for their owne ſafety gaue place to the other, ſeeing themſelues vnable to command. For Sertorius being a ROMAINE, gouerned the SPANIARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHOERONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which the SPANIARDS of long time had beene ſubiect to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had ſubdued all the world. Furthermore, Sertorius being then of great eſtimation, for that he was a Senator of ROME, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignity and eſtate to be chieftaine of a great armie. Where Eumenes came with ſmall reputation, diſdained for that he was but a Secretarie: and when he began to come forwards, had not only leſſe meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets and impediments alſo, to hinder his riſing and eſtimation. For many openly ſtood againſt him, and ſecretly conſpired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter end, when certaine of his companions ſecretly conſpired againſt him. Therfore Sertorius end of all his dangers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greateſt dangers came through his victories which he wan of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honour. Now for their deeds of armes, they are both in maner alike: but on the other ſide for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention, and Sertorius embraced peace and quietneſſe. For Eumenes that that might haue liued in safety with honour, if he would but haue giuen place to his betters, and forsaken the warres: liked better with the daunger of his life to follow martiall feates, with the greatest personages of MACEDON, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the safety of his person to take armes against them that would not let him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes been so ambitious and stout to striue against Antigonus for the chiefest place of authority, but could haue been contented with the second, Antigonus would haue been right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer so much as suffer Sertorius to liue in rest. So the one made voluntarie warre onely to rule, and the other against his will was compelled to rule, because they made wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferring the couetous desire of a better estate, aboue the safety of his life: and the other as a right souldier, vsed the warres onely for a meane to saue his life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore the one was slaine, mistrusting no treason against him: and the other, looking euery houre for present death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a noble mind, not to mistrust them whom he thought his friends: and the other shewed a faint heart, being taken when he meant to flie. So Sertorius death dishonoured not his life, suffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him suffer. The other hauing no power to auoide his destinie before he was taken, and hauing sought meanes to liue being in prison and captiuity, could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For begging life at his enemies hands, he gaue him his heart with his bodie, who before had but his bodie in his power. The end of Eumenes life.

THE LIFE OF Agesilaus.

Archidamus the sonne of Zeuxidamus, hauing honourably reigned in LACEDÆMON, left two sons behind him, Agis which he begat of that noble Ladie Lamprido, and Agesilaus a great deale yonger, which he had by Eupolia, Melissippidas daughter. So the kingdome falling by succession vnto Agis the elder, the yonger son Agesilaus remaining a priuate person, was brought vp after the LACONIAN manner, which was a straight kind of life: but withall it taught children how to obey. Whereof it is thought the Poet Simonides calleth SPARTA, Damasimbrotos: to wit, making men ciuill: for that by continuance of custom, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much or more thē any other city that euer was in ỹ world taming thē from their childhood, as they do yong colts. The law dispenceth with the heires apparent to the crowne, frō that straight subiection & hard life: but Agesilaus had that excellency in him aboue all others of his eſtate, that he came to the dignitie and honour to commaund, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoubtedly was the cauſe, that he knew better then any other king, how to pleaſe and beare with his ſubiects, helping his royall ſtate and princely behauiour grafted in him by nature, with that courteſie and familiaritie, which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lyſander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modeſty of his wit. For hauing better ſpirit, and being more conſtant in his opinion than any of the other children, ſtriuing euer to excell in all things, with ſuch a vehemencie he tooke all trauels in hand, that it was vnpoſſible to ouercome him, much leſſe to compell him. He was on the other ſide ſo mild and gentle, that euery courteous word wrought in him better obedience then any feare could doe: becauſe it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take vpon him any paine or labour. And for the deformitie of his legges, the one being ſhorter then the other, in the ſlower of his youth, through his pleaſant wit, he vſed the matter ſo pleaſantly and patiently, that he would merrily mocke himſelfe: which manner of merrie behauiour did greatly hide the blame of the blemiſh. Yea further, his life and courage was the more commendable in him, for that men ſaw that notwithſtanding his lameneſſe, he refuſed no paine nor labour. Of his perſon we haue drawne no counterfeite, becauſe he would not in any wiſe haue it drawne, and did expreſly command by his will, that they ſhould neither draw his picture nor make any mould or image of his body Howbeit we find that he was ſmall of ſtature, whereby his preſence promiſed no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer merry and pleaſant, and neuer penſiue nor troubleſome in word nor look, euen to the laſt end of his life he was better loued, then the moſt faire creature that liued. Notwithſtanding, the Ephori (as Theophraſtus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a ſumme of mony becauſe he maried a litle woman: ſaying that he would beget them demy kings, no kings indeed. In the time that his eldeſt ſonne Agis reigned king, Alcibiades being baniſhed Athens, fled out of Sicile into Lacedæmon, and had not long remained in Sparta before they ſuſpected him that he kept king Agis wife, called Timæa, for which cauſe Agis would not acknowledge the child ſhe brought to be his ſonne, ſaying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timæa cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as ſhe ſate amongſt her women, ſoftly ſhe called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other ſide they report, that Alcibiades himſelfe ſayd, it was for no hurt he meant to any man, that he lay with Queene Timæa, but onely for the deſire he had that ſome of the kings of Lacedæmon ſhould be begotten of his ſeede. Neuertheleſſe at the length he was driuen to forſake Lacedæmon, miſtruſting king Agis, who euer after doubted of the child, and thought him a baſtard: vntill ſuch time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and ſo behaued himſelfe, that Agis before many witneſſes, ſaid he did acknowledge him for his ſonne. This notwithſtanding, when king Agis was dead, Lyſander that had then ouercome the Athenians by ſea, and was more in credit and authoritie in the citie of Sparta then any other, practiſed to put the crowne vpon Ageſilaus head, ſaying, that Leotychides had no intereſt vnto it, becauſe he was a baſtard. The like did diuers other citizens ſay of him, which loued Ageſilaus vertue, and liked him paſſingly; for that he had been brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrarie part alſo, there was a Soothſayer or wiſard in Sparta called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta: and for proofe thereof he told this ancient oracle before the Councell.

Ageſilaus learned to obey, before he came to command.

The modeſty of Ageſilaus

Ageſilaus lameneſſe.

Alcibiades committeth adulterie with king Agis wife.

Ageſilaus created king, through Lyſanders meanes.

A lame king.

As ſtately as thy ſtomacke is, O Sparta take good heed,
And ſtand vpon thy guard, and looke about thee, I thee reed.
For halting one day downe will caſt thine Empire to the ground,
By meane of warres and troubles great that ſhall incloſe thee round.

Lyſander replied againſt it, ſaying, that if the Spartans were afraid of this oracle, they ſhould rather beware of Leotychides. For ỹ gods cared not, if any man lame of a foot aſpired to be king: but rather if he were a baſtard, and not lineally deſcended of the race of Hercules. For that, ſaid he, were to make the kingdome halt. Ageſilaus furthermore alleadged, that the god Neptune himſelfe had witneſſed, that Leotychides was a baſtard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiues chamber, and that ten moneths after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Ageſilaus vpon theſe allegations not onely proclaimed king of Sparta, but he had giuen him him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, conſidering that his parents by his mothers ſide were very poore (yet honeſt men) he left them the moitie of all the goods: by which act, Ageſilaus wonne all their good wils, where elſe they had enuied him for his ſucceſſion in the kingdome. And (as Xenophon ſaith) by obeying his countrey, he grew to ſuch power that he might do whatſoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the ſway and gouernment of the commonwealth; the Ephores office changing yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were onely ordained to bridle the inſolencie of the kings, for that they ſhould not (as we haue more amply written in Lycurgus life) haue abſolute power in their hands. Vpon this occaſion, the kings that ſucceeded in the gouernment, had (as it were) by inheritance a preſent grudge and malice againſt them. This notwithſtāding, Ageſilaus took a contrary courſe to all his predeceſſors. For where others preſently quarelled with the Ephori and Senators, Ageſilaus did honour and reuerence them, and would neuer diſpatch any matter without their priuitie, but was alwaies ready to goe when they did ſend him. When he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate to giue audience, if any of the Ephori chanced to come in, he would riſe vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senator, he would for honours ſake preſent him a gowne and an oxe. And thus cunningly ſeeming to honor and increaſe the dignity of the Senators, winning their good wils, he made his power great, and the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauiour towards the reſt of his countrimen was ſuch, as his enmity was leſſe faulty then his friendſhip. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iuſt cauſe, but he aided his friends euen in vniuſt cauſes. And whereas he thought it a ſhame not to honour his enemies when they had done well, he could not find in his heart to rebuke his friends when they did amiſſe, but rather gloried in ſuccouring and helping of them in their euill doings. For he thought it no ſhame to ſerue his friends turne, howſoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduerſaries offended, he was as ſory for it as any man, & as ready to beare with it if he were intreated: wherby he allured and wan the hearts of all men. The Ephori ſeeing that, and fearing his power, puniſhed him in money, for that he made the common loue of his countrey priuate to himſelf. For as naturall Philoſophers hold opinion, that if contention and ſtrife were taken out of nature, it would come to paſſe that the heauenly bodies ſhould ſtand ſtill, and alſo that the generation of all things ſhould be at a ſtay, by reaſon of the mutuall agreement betweene the world and them: euen ſo, the law-maker of Lacedæmon ſeemed to haue allowed ambition and ſtrife in the commonwealth, as a ſpurre to vertue, by procuring alwaies ſome contention and emulation among great perſons. And his reaſon was, that this baſe and effeminate fauour, in winking one at another when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concord. And ſure ſome think that Homer alſo ſaw the ſame, for he would neuer elſe haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to ſee Vliſſes and Achilles at great words together, if he had not been of opinion, that enuie and contention among great men, were very auaileable for the commonwealth. Yet is not this thus ſimply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent, and do bring great dangers with them. Now when Ageſilaus was entred into his kingdome of Lacedæmon, newes were brought him out of Asia, that the king of Perrsia prepared a great nauy to conquer the Lacedæmonians ſignorie by ſea. Lyſander being glad of this occaſion, longing to be ſent againe into Asia to ſuccour his friends whom he left there as gouernours and Lieutenants of cities and prouinces, (of the which, ſome of them were driuen away by their citizens, others alſo put to death for abuſing of their authoritie, and ruling ouer cruelly,) perſwaded Ageſilaus to go into Asia, to make war vpō this barbarous king, far from Greece, before his army were gathered together. And to compaſſe this the eaſilier, he wrote vnto his friends in Asia, that they ſhould ſend vnto Sparta to require Ageſilaus for their Captaine, and ſo they did. Therupon Ageſilaus going to the aſſembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would giue him thirtie Captaines of the Spartans to be counſellers and aſſiſtants to him in theſe warres, two thouſands free Ilotes, and 6000 of the confederates of Lacedæmon. All this was immediatly granted through Lyſanders friēdſhip towards him, and he was ſent away ſtraight with the thirty Captaines which he had requeſted: of the which Lyſander was the chiefeſt, not onely for his riches and authoritie, but alſo for the good will he bare vnto Ageſilaus: who thought himſelfe more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, then for his friendſhip he ſhewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Ageſilaus army being aſſembled at the hauen of Gereſtæ, himſelf with certain of his friends went vnto

Ageſilaus iourney into Aſia.

the city of AVLIDE, where in his sleepe he dreamed that one said vnto him: O king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knowest that neuer none but Agamemnon, and now thy selfe, was chosen Generall of all GREECE: considering therefore that thou commandest the same people he did, that thou makest warrs with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to goe thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same sacrifice vnto the godd esse, the which he made at his like departure. Agesilaus straight vpon this vision, remembred that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothsayers did sacrifice his owne daughter in the same place: yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and said, he wold sacrifice that vnto the goddesse, which he thought would please her well enough; and that he would not follow that cruell deuotion of this ancient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a Hinde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commanded his Soothsayers to sacrifice her; and would not suffer him to haue the honour to do the sacrifice that was appointed for the same purpose by the gouernours of BOEOTIA according to the custome of that place. The Gouernours of BOEOTIA vnderstanding it were much offended, and sent their officers to will Agesilaus not to do any sacrifice there, contrarie to the law and custome of their country. The officers that were sent, performed their commission: and finding that the beast was slaine, and the quarters of it vpon the altar, they tooke and flung them off the altar euery way. This vexed Agesilaus, being ready to imbarke, and depart thence in choler against the THEBANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this vnluckie prediction, which seemed to prognosticate vnto him, that he should not preuaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHESVS, he presently misliked the honor he saw done vnto Lysander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the countrimen there repaired continually to his house; and when he came abroad, they all followed him whersoeuer he went; as though Lysander had indeed been in authoritie to do what he would, and that Agesilaus only had but the name to be General, so appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in truth there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine in those parts that had won him such estimation, nor that was more feared then he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficiall to his friends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being fresh in memory, the countrimen of that country perceiuing the simplicitie of Agesilaus, and how he was giuen to please the people, and caried no great maiestie nor countenance with him, and obseruing in Lysander that wonted roughnesse and sharpe speech wherewith they had beene acquainted before; euery man obeyed him, & nothing was done but what he commanded. This first of all made the other SPARTANS angry, for that it appeared they were come as it were to serue Lysander, and not as to counsell the king: but after that, Agesilaus himself also grew miscontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious, nor sorie to see others honoured besides himself. Yet being a man ambitiously giuen, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should do any noble exploit in this war, that they would impute it vnto Lysander, for the great estimation he was of, he began to deale in this sort with him. First he contraried all his counsels: and what matters soeuer he preferred, which he was desirous shold haue taken effect. Agesilaus wold none of that, but tooke some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lysanders followers came to make suite to him for his fauour, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lysander, he sent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in matters of iudgements, if Lysander were against any, they were sure to haue the matter passe on their side. On the contrary part also, if Lysander bare good wil to the partie, and fauored the cause to gratifie him, they hardly escaped frō setting a fine on their heads, Agesilaus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chance to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lysander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his friends, but told thē plainly, that it was for his sake they had those repulses & wrongs, and therfore did counsell them to wait vpon the king, and those that had more credit then himself. Now Agesilaus supposed he gaue that aduice to make euery man to malice him: wherfore, to despite him the more, he made him distributer of his victuals: & hauing done so, some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: Now let them go and honor my flesh distributer, Lysander being grieued withall, said vnto the king: My Lord, you know how to oppresse your friends. And so do I, said Agesilaus, how to keepe them vnder that would be greater then my selfe. It may be yet (replied Lysander) I haue not done as your Grace doth say: yet if you so conceiue of me, put me I beseech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good seruice without offence. After this talke betweene them, Agesilaus sent him into HELLESPONT, where by

See the life of Lysander

by practise he tooke prisoner a noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus prouince whereof he was gouernor, and brought him to Agesilaus with a great summe of gold and siluer, and neare about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgat not his grudge to Agesilaus, but being offended still, sought oportunity and means to defeate the two houses of the priuiledge of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broile (in my opinion) in the citie of SPARTA, had he not been preuented by death, in a iourney he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we see, that ambitious minds obseruing no meane, are in a common weale oft times more hurtfull then beneficiall. For though Lysander was indeed intollerable, to shew himselfe so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agesilaus ignorant neither, that there were diuers other meanes lesse reproachfull to punish such a noble man, that offended onely by greedinesse of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe passion: the one not to know his Princes power; and the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afraid of Agesilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to set the cities of GREECE in ASIA at liberty: notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed war. Agesilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through all GREECE, that he would do some noble exploit in his iourney. Moreouer he thought himself dishonored for euer, that the ten thousand GRECIANS which were returned back from the farthest part of ASIA, euen vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had ouercome the king of PERSIAES armie as oft as they listed themselues: and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commanded both sea and land) should not do some deed worthy memorie among the GRECIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periury by iust deceit, he made a countenance as though he would first inuade the countrey of CARIA. Whereupon this barbarous person Tisaphernes gathered all his power together. But Agesilaus on a sudaine returned backe againe, and entred into PHRYGIA, tooke there many cities, and wan great spoile, making his men see by experiẽce, that to infringe and breake a league made and auowed by oath, was a sacrilege, & contemning of the gods. On the other side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not onely iust and honourable, but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agesilaus being weaker in horsemen than his enemies, and finding the liuers of the beasts which he had sacrificed, without heads, he returned into the city of EPHESVS, and there gathered horsmen together, letting the rich men vnderstand (which would not themselues serue in person) that he did dispence with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them took that course; and by this means Agesilaus within few daies had leauied a great number of men at armes, in stead of footmen that could do small seruice. For they that were vnwilling to go to the wars, did hire thẽ that were willing to serue in their place; and such also as would not serue a horseback, did giue them pay that were desirous to serue in their steeds. In this he wisely followed king Agamemnons example, who did dispence with the person of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agesilaus commanded them that sold the prisoners by the drum taken in the warres, that they should strip them naked, and so sell them, which they did. And sundry persons willingly bought their spoils and raiment, but they scorned their bodies, because they saw them white skinned, soft and delicate: so that few men would out-bid the price for them, for that they thought those men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Agesilaus also being present at this sale of purpose, said thus vnto his men: See, my friends, quoth he, these be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoiles for the which ye shall fight. Time being come now to put himselfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies countrey againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tisaphernes againe, but Tisaphernes deceiued himselfe. For he being deceiued before by Agesilaus, gaue no credit to this second rumor, but perswaded himselfe that doubtlesse Agesilaus meant then to enter into CARIA, and the rather for that it was a woody coũtry, very ill for horsmen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agesilaus inuading (as he had giuen it out) the champiõ country, in the which stood SARDIS the capitall citie of LYDIA, Tisaphernes was cõpelled to come to rescue it in hast; and being come thither with great speed with his horsmen he stole vpon many of his enemies whom he found straggling out of order, spoiling the coũtry, and put the most of them to the sword. Agesilaus hauing intelligence of this, imagined with himselfe that the footmen of his enemy could not yet be arriued, and considering also that he had his armie whole about him, thought it best forthwith to bid him battell, rather then to delay time any longer. Therupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed footmen, and commanded them straight to charge the enemy, whilest he caused the heauier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled vpon it immediatly: and the GRECIANS lustily following the chase, took their camp, and made great slaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leisure enough not only to spoile and ouerrun the kings country at their pleasure, but also to see the reuenge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile mã, & a cruell enemie to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made another his Lieutenant immediatly in his roome, called Tithraustes, who strake off Tisaphernes head, and sent vnto Agesilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of gold & siluer to depart out of his coũtry. Thereto Agesilaus answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS; and that for his owne part, it was an easier matter to enrich his souldiers then himselfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it dishonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then spoiles. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tithraustes somewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of al the GRECIANS; for the sum of thirty talents giuen him to defray his charges, he withdrew his army out of LYDIA, and went into PHRYGIA. In his iourney he receiued from the councel of LACEDÆMON the Scytala or serole of parchmẽt wreathed about, aduertising him that the citizens had made him also their Generall by sea, as he was by land. Agesilaus onely of all men obtained this honour, who without comparison was of all other the worthiest man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witnesseth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnesse of his authoritie. In this notwithstanding he was to be blamed, when he made choise of one Pisander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenant of the nauie, and forsooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: seeking rather to please his wife, and to aduance one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and safety of his country. Afterwards he led his army in to Pharnabazus countrey which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all sorts of victuals, but gathered together also a wonderfull masse of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with king Cotys, who for his vertue and constant fidelitie was very desirous of his friendship. The like did Spythridates, forsaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Agesilaus: & after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwaies followed him whersoeuer he went. Spithridates had a yong son that was passing faire, called Megabetes, (of whom Agesilaus had great liking) and likewise a faire young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Agesilaus caused king Cotys to marry. So taking of king Cotys a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footmen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there destroyed Pharnabazus countrey which he had in gouernment, who durst not meete him in the field, nor trust to his holds, but still fled from him, carying all his chiefest things with him, flitting from place to place, vntill that Spithridates accompanied with Errippidas the SPARTAN, followed him so neare, that he tooke his campe, and all his treasure in it. But there did Errippidas shew himselfe so hard and cruell, ouer-straightly searching out part of the spoile that had bin imbezeled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ransacking euery corner for it; that Spithridates was so offended withall, that on a sodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe vnto the citie of SARDIS. This more grieued Agesilaus then any thing that happened to him in all his iourney, for that he had lost so valiant a man as Spithridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he caryed away with him. Moreouer, he was afraid lest they would detect him of miserable couetousnes, a thing which he euer was carefull to auoid, not only in his owne person, but also to keepe all his countrimen from it. But besides these knowne causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates son pinched him nearely, though when the boy was with him, he striued with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection and desire he had of him. For when Megabetes on a time came to make much of him and to kisse him, Agesilaus turned his face from the boy. The boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloofe off. Agesilaus then repented him that he had not suffered Megabetes to kisse him, made as though he maruelled why he did not kisse him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: Your selfe, O king, is in fault, because you durst not tary, but were afraid to kisse so faire a boy: for if he knew your mind, he would come againe, so that you turned your face no more away. Agesilaus

Ageſilaus had heard them, he pauſed a while, and ſaid neuer a word, but in fine anſwered them: It ſhall not need you ſay any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuſe ſuch an other kiſſe againe, then if all that I ſee before me were gold. Thus was Ageſilaus diſpoſed when Megabates was with him: but in his abſence he did ſo loue him, that I dare ſcantly ſay, that if the boy had come againe into his preſence, he would haue refuſed a kiſſe at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus ſought to ſpeake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend vnto them both. Ageſilaus, was the firſt that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he laid him downe vpon the deepe graſſe in the ſhadow, vnder a faire great tree. Pharnabazus alſo came thither, and they ſpread ſoft skins long haired, and tapeſtry excellently wrought, of diuers colours, for him to ſit on vpon the ground. But being aſhamed to ſee Ageſilaus laid on the bare ground in that ſort, he alſo lay down by him, though he had vpon him a maruellous rich gowne, of excellent tiſſue and paſſing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began firſt to ſpeake, and lacked no good perſwaſions & iuſt complaints, for that he hauing been (as he was) a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre againſt the ATHENIANS, was then ſpoiled and ſacked by them. Ageſilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung downe their heads for ſhame, not knowing how to anſwer him, conſidering that Pharnabazus had iniurie offered him, began to ſpeake in this manner: Heretofore when we were friends with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vſed his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vſe them: and ſince we ſee that thou wilt needs be a ſlaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his ſake. But when thou ſhalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS then a ſlaue to the king of PERSIA, then make account that all theſe ſouldiers, this armor, our ſhips, and all we, are to defend thy goods & libertie againſt him, without which, nothing that is honeſt can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his mind plainly: Surely, ſaid he if the king do ſend hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be ſure I will then take your part ſtraight; but on the other ſide, if he make me his Lieutenant in this war, truſt to it, I will do him the beſt ſeruice I can againſt you. This anſwer paſſingly pleaſed Ageſilaus who taking him by the hand, and riſing vp with him, ſaid vnto him: I would wiſh (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing ſo noble a mind as thou haſt, that thou wert rather our friend then an enemie. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his ſonne being left behind, ran to Ageſilaus, and ſmiling told him, King Ageſilaus, I will make thee my friend; and therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hand. Ageſilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beautie of the young youth, and the courteſie he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his companie had any proper thing that he might beſtow on him. At the laſt he ſpied his Secretarie Adæus horſe, which had a rich capariſon on: he ſtraight tooke it from him, and gaue the horſe and furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus ſon, who neuer after forgate it. For it chanced afterwards, that being driuen out of his countrey by his brethren, and flying into PELLOPONNESVS, Ageſilaus made very much of him, and did not ſticke to further him in his loue abroad. For he had a great fancy and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought vp in wreſtling, one day to play for the beſt games. But when he was growne a big man and ſtrong, and that he came to offer himſelfe to be billed with them that ſhould wraſtle at the games Olympicall, being in ſome perill to be vtterly refuſed; this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Ageſilaus, and beſought his helpe, that this wreſtler might not receiue the foyle to be reiected. Ageſilaus being deſirous to pleaſe him, performed his requeſt with ſome difficultie. Thus Ageſilaus in all things elſe was a ſtrict obſeruer of the law: but in his friends cauſes to be ſtraight laced in matters of iuſtice, he ſaid that was but an excuſe for them that would do nothing for their friends. To this effect, they find a letter of his written vnto Idrian Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his friend. If Nicias haue not offended, let him go; if he haue offended, then pardon him for my ſake: but howſoeuer it be, let him go. This was Ageſilaus maner in the moſt part of his friends cauſes. Notwithſtãding, occaſions fell out oftentimes, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the commonwealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haſt on a ſudaine, and to leaue one ſicke behind him whom he loued dearely: the ſicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, beſought him that he wold not forſake him. Ageſilaus (as Hieronymus the Philoſopher reported) turned backe againe and ſaid: O how hard is it, both to loue and to be wiſe! Now had Ageſilaus ſpent two yeares in this warre, and was ſpoken of throughout ASIA, being maruellouſly commended to the king himselfe, for his great honestie, his continencie, his courtesie, and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the countrey with his owne traine onely, he would euer lie in the holiest temples of the gods, because he would the gods themselues should be witnesses of his priuate doings; whereas commonly we are loth that men should see what we do. Furthermore, amongst so many thousand souldiers as were in his camp, there could hardly be found a worse mattresse then that himselfe did lie vpon euery night. And as for heate and cold, he could as easily away with either of both, as if by constitution of bodie he had been borne to abide any weather and season. But aboue all, it was a pleasant sight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they saw the great Lords, the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and giuen to all lust and pleasure) to honour and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, being afraid of euery short word that he spake like a LACONIAN: insomuch as many of them called to mind the Poets verses, who said:

As Mars hath no mercie, so Greece scorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yeelded to him in euery place, after he had taken order with the cities, and had established the libertie of their commonweale, without any bloudshed, or banishment of any person: hee determined to go further into the land, and transporting the wars from the sea coasts of GRECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper person, and with the wealth and happinesse of the ECBATANIANS and the SVSIANIANS, and by that means to take his leisure from him, who sitting stil before, made the GRECIANS make war one with another, by force of money corrupting the gouernours of euery citie. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuously troubled with wars, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephorꝫ did send for him home, and commanded him to returne to defend his countrey.

Agesilaus sent for out of Asia.

Ah wretched Greece, how cruell slaughters hast
Then brought vpon thee, for to lay thee wast?

For how should a man otherwise call this enuie, treason, and ciuill conspiracie among the GRECIANS, who ouerthrew their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their wars against the barbarous people out of GRECE, and now to bring it against themselues? I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that said the GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which saw not Alexander the Great sitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would think they should haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander and the MACEDONIANS, fondly losing so many famous Captaines of GRECE, at ỹ battels of LEVCTRES, of CORONEA, of CORINTH and of ARCADIA. Neuertheless, Agesilaus neuer did better act in his life, nor euer shewed better example of obedience and iustice due to his countrey, then he did in his returne home. For sith Hannibal that began to haue ill successe in his warres, being in manner driuen out of ITALIE, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his countrey, to obey his countreymen, which called him home to defend the warres the ROMAINES had made at their owne doores: and that Alexander the Great also being sent for home vpon the like occasion, did not onely refuse to returne into MACEDON, but made a iest at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with king Agis, saying: Me thinkes when I heare these newes, whilest we are ouercoming of king Darius here, there hath beene a battell of Rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (I say) these two famous Captaines haue made so litle account of their countrie, may we not thinke the citie of SPARTA blessed to haue had such a king, that so much reuerenced his countrey and obeyed the law, as receiuing onely a litle scrole of parchment commaunding him to returne, he forsooke a world of goods and wealth that he quietly enioyed, (with assured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked forthwith, leauing all the allies and confederates of his country very sorrowfull, for that he had giuen ouer so noble an enterprise, which he had so happily begunne? Yes sure. Nay furthermore he passed not for the saying of Demostratus PHÆACIAN, who said, that the LACEDÆMONIANS, in publicke matters were the worthiest men, and the ATHENIANS in priuate causes. For as he had shewed himselfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the Common wealth, so was he alwaies courteous priuately to his familiar friends. And because the PERSIAN coine was stamped on the one side, with the print of an Archer; Agesilaus being ready to depart, said, that ten thousand Archers draue him out of ASIA. For so much was brought vnto THEBES and ATHENS, and distributed among the Orators and Gouernours there, who through their

Orations

Orations made both thoſe great cities to riſe, and make warre againſt the SPARTANS. In his returne Ageſilaus hauing paſſed the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, tooke his way through the country of THRACIA, and neuer intreated barbarous king nor people to ſuffer him to paſſe, but onely ſent vnto them to know whether they would he ſhould paſſe through their country as a friend, or an enemy. All countries and nations elſe receiued him very honourably to their power, ſaue the people called the THROCHALIANS, vnto whom king Xerxes himſelfe gaue preſents that he might paſſe friendly through their countrey: who ſent vnto Ageſilaus to demand a hundred ſilner talents, and a hundred women, to ſuffer him to paſſe through their countrey. But Ageſilaus laughing them to ſcorne, anſwered again: Why, how chanceth it that they came not themſelues to receiue them? So therewithall he marched forward againſt theſe barbarous people who were ranged in battel ray to ſtop his paſſage: howbeit he ouerthrew them, and ſlue a great number of them in the field. The like demand he made vnto the king of MACEDON, whether he ſhould paſſe through his countrey as a friend, or an enemie. The king made him anſwer, he would conſider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quoth Ageſilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldneſſe, and fearing leſt he would do him ſome hurt as he went, ſent to pray him that he would paſſe through his countrey as a friend. Now it chanced ſo that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDÆMONIANS: therefore as he paſſed through their countrey, he did ſpoile and forrage it as his enemies countrey, and ſent Xenocles and Scytha to the citie of LARISSE, hoping to perſwade them to take part with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe two Ambaſſadours were retained there as priſoners. The SPARTANS were maruellouſly offended withall: and thought good that Ageſilaus ſhould beſiege LARISSE with his armie. But he anſwered them, he would not loſe one of thoſe men, to winne all THESSALIE: and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by compoſition. Peraduenture this is not to be maruelled at in Ageſilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of CORINTH, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines ſlaine of the enemies, & but few of the SPARTANS, he ſeemed not to reioyce at it, but rather to fetch a grieuous ſigh, ſaying: O poore GRECE, how vnfortunate art thou, to haue ſlaine with thine owne hands ſo many valiant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue ouercome all the barbarous people? The PHARSALIANS harrying and troubling the rereward of Ageſilaus army, he put forth fiue hundred horſemen which gaue them ſo luſtie a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he ſet vp tokens of triumph vpon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victorie pleaſed him aboue all the reſt, becauſe with the ſmall number of horſemen which he had gotten together of himſelfe, he had ouerthrowne the glorie and pride of the enemies horſemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, ſent of purpoſe from SPARTA, to command him immediatly to inuade BOEOTIA, with his armie. Now though Ageſilaus intended ſome other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet becauſe he would not diſobey the counſels commandement of SPARTA, he told his men ſtraight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA was at hand, and therefore he ſent for two companies of them which lay in campe by CORINTH. The LACEDÆMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honour Ageſilaus for that he had obeyed their commandement ſo readily, proclaimed in the city, that as many young men as were deſirous to goe aide the king, ſhould come to enter their names. Notwithſtanding, they onely choſe but fifty of the valianteſt among them, and ſent them vnto him. In the meane time, Ageſilaus paſſed through the countrey of THERMOPYLES, and coaſting ouer the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDÆMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHERONIA: where immediatly after his arriuall, he ſuddenly ſaw the Sunne eclipſed, and darkned in the faſhion of a new Moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Piſander vnto him, who was ſlaine in a battell which he had loſt by ſea, fighting againſt Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. Theſe newes were very heauie vnto him, both for reſpect of the perſon his kinſman whom he loſt, as alſo for the great loſſe that happened to the commonwealth. Neuertheleſſe, fearing his ſouldiers would be diſcouraged with the newes, and become faint-hearted, being ready to ioyne battell, he commanded them that came from the ſea, to brute abroade a contrary tale to that they told him: and he himſelfe to make good their ſpeech, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did ſacrifice to the gods, as thanking them for the good newes, ſending to euery one of his friends a peece of fleſh ſacrificed, as he commonly vſed to do, in any publike cauſe of ioy. Thē marching forward, he ſtraight diſcouered his enemies farre off, and they likewiſe him: and thereupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himſelf the right wing. The THEBANS on the other ſide, placed themſelues in the right wing of their army, & gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Ageſilaus ſide, writeth that he neuer knew of the like field fought. At the firſt onſet, the conflict was not great betweene both, neither held long, becauſe the THEBANS brake ỹ ORCHOMENIANS ſtraight, and Ageſilaus the ARGIVES. But whē either ſide vnderſtood that the left wings of their battels were in great diſtreſſe and that they turned their backes, they returned ſuddenly againe. And where Ageſilaus might eaſily haue had the victory without any danger, if he had ſuffered the ſquadron of the enemies to paſſe by him, and afterwards to haue charged thē in the rereward: of a noble courage to ſhew his valiantneſſe, he gaue charge vpon the voward, to haue honour in ouercoming them. The THEBANS on the other ſide no leſſe valiantly receiued him, & fought luſtily on al hands: but the cruelleſt fight was about Ageſilaus perſon, with the fiftie young men that were ſent to guard him, who ſhewed themſelues very valiant. Ageſilaus was ſore hurt, notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſtance, his armour being paſſed through with their pikes and ſwords in ſundry places: Whereupon they enuironed him round amongſt them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of them, and many of themſelues alſo being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too ſtrong in the voward, they were forced to do that which they refuſed at the firſt: and opening themſelues, gaue them paſſage through them. So when they were paſſed them, the SPARTANS perceiuing how looſely & diſorderly they marched, as thinking thēſelues out of all danger, followed them, and gaue charge vpon their flanke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they reioycing for their victorie at this battell, retired faire and ſoftly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Ageſilaus, notwithſtanding he was verie ſore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreſſed, before he had been firſt at the place where the battell was fought, and had ſeen his men that were ſlaine brought away in their armours. As many of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerua Itonian, which was not farre from thence (where alſo were ſet vp tokens of triumph offered vnto her long time before by the THEBANS, when they had ouercome the armie of the ATHENIANS, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had ſlaine alſo Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his men they ſhould let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Ageſilaus deſirous to ſee if the THEBANS had any courage to come downe to fight againe commaunded his ſouldiers to put garlands vpon their heads, and his muſitions to ſound their ſhalmes or pipes, whileſt he did ſet vp a token of triumph as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies ſending to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the city of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a ſolemne proceſſion and common ſacrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth part of all his ſpoiles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred talents. This thing done, he returned into his countrey, where he was greatly honoured and eſteemed of all his citizens and countrimen, for his orderly life and noble behauior: for he was no changeling, but the ſelfe ſame man in ſtate and condition that he was before he tooke his iourney. He transformed not himſelf into ſtrangers maners, as commonly other Captaines do, that returne out of a farre countrey where they haue made wars: neither did he ſcorne his countrey faſhons, or ſhewed himſelfe diſobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwaies kept and obſerued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate and drinke, in waſhing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armorie, or any way elſe in his houſhold ſtuffe, as if he had neuer paſſed ouer the riuer of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his old gates ſtanding, that were of ſo great continuance, that they were thought to be thoſe which Ariſtodemus had ſet vp. Xenophon alſo ſaid, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more ſumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDÆMON, is a kind of coach or chariot after the likeneſſe of Griffins, Harts, or Goats: vpon the which they caried young wenches in ſolemne proceſſion in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Ageſilaus: and Dicæarchus alſo was much offended, that they neither knew Ageſilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we find in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Ageſilaus wiues name was Cleora, Cliora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Ageſilaus ſpeare is ſeene to this day in the citie of SPARTA, euen like vnto others, and no manner of difference. Now Ageſilaus perceiuing certaine citizens of SPARTA to ſtand vpon their reputation, and eſteeming themſelues aboue others, becauſe they kept horſe in their ſtable, perſwaded his ſiſter Cyniſca to ſend her coach and coach-horſes to the Olympian games to runne for the beſt prize, onely to let the GRECIANS ſee, that it was no act of any vertue, but ſimply of riches and coſt. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philoſopher about him, whom he loued, and made great account of, he perſwaded him to ſend for his ſonnes to LACEDÆMON, that they might be brought vp there, where they ſhould learne the nobleſt ſcience that men could poſſibly learne, to wit, to obey, and to command. When Lyſander was dead, Ageſilaus at his returne out of ASIA, found a great faction and conſpiracie raiſed by his meanes againſt him in SPARTA: and becauſe, it might appeare what manner of citizen Lyſander was when he liued, he was likely to haue openly ſhewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnaſſeus had written for him, and Lyſander ſhould haue cunned without booke, to haue ſpoken in open aſſembly) that was to ſtirre innouation, and in manner haue made a change of the whole gouernment of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit there was a graue Counſellour that hauing read the Oration, and doubting the apparant reaſons and perſwaſions alleadged, told him, that he would wiſh him not to pluck vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to bury this Oration together with his bodie. Ageſilaus liked the counſell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had been his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make ſome of them to be ſent as Lieutenant of armie, or otherwiſe to haue charge in the warres. In fine, he made it openly knowne, what couetous and wicked men they had been in their charges: ſo that when they were accuſed of it before the councell, he would then helpe and intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his friends, where they had been his enemies: inſomuch as in the end, he had not one enemie at all. For the other king Ageſipolis his colleague, whoſe father had been baniſhed, he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernment of the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, he ſo behaued himſelfe vnto Ageſilaus that he made him his verie good friend: for both the kings when they were in the citie, did eate together in one hall. Then Ageſilaus knowing that Ageſipolis (as himſelfe) was giuen to loue, would euer miniſter talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the citie, enticing him to loue ſome one of them, which he himſelfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in theſe LACONIAN loues there was no manner of diſhoneſtie offered, but a true affection and honeſt regard to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honeſt conditions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Ageſilaus by this meanes, hauing the whole authoritie (aboue all men in the citie) in his hands, made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by ſea, and himſelfe with the army by land went to beſiege the citie of CORINTH, where with his brothers helpe by ſea he took the long wals of the ſame. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTH at that time, at Ageſilaus arriuall there, were ſolemnizing the feaſt of the Iſthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from ſacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and ſolemnitie. Then diuers baniſhed men of CORINTH that were in his army, beſought him that he would keepe theſe Iſthmian games: but he denied them, yet was contented they ſhould themſelues ſolemnize them; and ſo himſelfe remained there, during the time of the feaſt, for their ſafety. Afterwards when Ageſilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Iſthmian games, and there were ſome of them which hauing wonne the game at the firſt, did alſo winne it at the ſecond time: and others that were victors before, were this ſecond time ouercome. Whereupon Ageſilaus ſaid, that the ARGIVES ſhewed themſelues ranke cowards, that eſteeming ſo much (as they did) theſe playes and ſacrifices, they durſt not once offer to fight with him for defence of the ſame. For himſelfe, touching ſuch like ſports and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour ſuch ſolemne aſſemblies and common feaſts with his preſence, as were commonly vſed in SPARTA, and tooke great pleaſure to ſee the ſports betweene the young boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he ſeemed not to be acquainted with ſome of them, wherein others had great delight. As we reade, that Callipides an excellent ſtage player (wonderfully eſteemed of among the GRECIANS for a ſingular man in that art) meeting Ageſilaus on a time, at the firſt did his duty to him, and then arrogantly thruſt himſelfe among them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Ageſilaus, do you not know me? Ageſilaus looking vpon him, anſwered: What, art not thou Callipides the ſtage player? and ſo made no further account of him. Another time being deſired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingales voice, he would not heare him, ſaying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingale it ſelfe. Another time alſo when Menecrates the Phyſitian (hauing by good fortune cured a deſperate diſeaſe) called himſelfe Iupiter, and arrogantly vſurped that name, preſuming in a letter he wrote vnto Ageſilaus, to ſubſcribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Ageſilaus, greeting: Ageſilaus wrote againe vnto him, Ageſilaus vnto Menecrates * health. So, whileſt Ageſilaus was in the territorie of CORINTH (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his ſouldiers forraging and ſpoyling the countrey round about, Ambaſſadours came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwaies hated the THEBANS, and beſides that thought it then verie requiſite for the good ſucceſſe of his doings, to make light of it, ſeemed as he neither heard nor ſaw them that ſpake vnto him. But euen at that very inſtant, as by diuine reuenge to cry quittance, there fell a great miſhap vpon him: for before the Ambaſſadours were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bands called the Mothers, were ſlaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greateſt loſſe that they in long time before had ſuſtained. For they loſt a great number of valiant ſouldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were ſlaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Ageſilaus went ſtraight into the field with hope to ſaue them, or at the leaſt to be reuenged: but receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all ſlaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then ſent for the Ambaſſadours of the BOEOTIANS, to giue them audience. But they, to requite his former diſdaine vnto them, made no manner of ſpeech of peace, but onely requeſted him to ſuffer them to enter into CORINTH. Ageſilaus being offended, anſwered them: If it be to ſee your friends triumph of their victorie, ye may ſafely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaſſadours with him, he deſtroyed the CORINTHIANS countrey, euen to the wals of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaſſadours ſee, that the citizens of CORINTH durſt not come out into the field to defend their countrey, he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowne, which by flight had eſcaped, he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwaies remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, becauſe the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) ſhould not reioyce at their loſſe. After this voyage, to gratifie the ACHAIANS, he entred with them into the countrey of ACARNANIA, and brought great ſpoyles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battell. Moreouer, when the ACHAIANS beſought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from ſowing of their ground, he made them anſwer, he would not. For, ſaid he, they will be afraid of warre the next yeare, when all their fields ſhall be ſowen with corne: and ſo indeed it came to paſſe. For the army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the king of PERSIANS armie, being Lords of the ſea, without let of any deſtroied and ſpoiled al the coaſt of LACONIA. Moreouer, the city of ATHENS did reare vp her wals againe by the helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furniſhed them. Thereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that end ſent Antalcidas Ambaſſador vnto Tiribazus, moſt ſhamefully and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whoſe libertie Ageſilaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Ageſilaus hap not to be foiled with any part of this ſhame: for Antalcidas that was his enemie, ſought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he ſaw warre did dayly increaſe the authoritie, honour, and fame of Ageſilaus. Notwithſtanding, he anſwered one of them, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: No, ſaid he, they do not ſo, but the MEDES do play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheleſſe, threatning warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace, he compelled them to yeeld vnto that ý king of PERSIA liked. But ſurely he did this chiefely for reſpect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to ſet the countrey of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, ſhould be ſo much the weaker. This plainly plainely appeared ſoone after by that that followed. For Phœbidas hauing committed a foule act, in open peace to take the caſtle of the city of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themſelues alſo not being very well pleaſed withall, and thoſe ſpecially which were Ageſilaus enemies) Phœbidas being asked in great anger, at whoſe commandement he had done that ſudden enterpriſe, to lay all the ſuſpition of the fact vpon him, Ageſilaus for Phœbidas diſcharge, letted not openly to ſay, that the qualitie of the fact was to be conſidered of, whether it were profitable for the commonwealth, or not,: and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his country, to do it of his owne head without commandement. All this notwithſtanding he was wont to ſay in priuate talke, that iuſtice was the chiefeſt of all vertues, and therefore that valiantneſſe without iuſtice was of no validitie, and that if all men were iuſt, valiantneſſe were of no eſtimation. And to them that told him, the great king will haue it ſo: Why, ſaid he, and wherein is he better then my ſelfe, if he be no iuſter? Iudging very wiſely therein, that they ſhould eſteeme a king (whether he were of great or ſmall power) by his iuſtice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the king of PERSIA hauing ſent him a priuate letter deſiring his friendſhip, Ageſilaus refuſed it, ſaying: that common friendſhip was inough betwixt them, and that they ſhould need none other, ſo long as that was kept. But this notwithſtanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his firſt good opinion, and gaue place to his will and ambition, ſpecially againſt the THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely ſaue Phœbidas, but alſo procured the city of SPARTA to take the fault vpon them which he had committed, and to iuſtifie it, by keeping the caſtle of Cadmea ſtill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernors of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phœbidas came by the caſtle of Cadmea, and poſſeſſed it. Thereupon euery man thought ſtraight, that Phœbidas was he that had put the matter in execution, but that Ageſilaus gaue the counſell to do it: as things falling out afterwards, did manifeſtly proue the ſuſpition true. For, after that the THEBANS had driuen the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the caſtle of Cadmea, and reſtored their city againe to libertie, burthening them that they had traytorouſly ſlaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were tyrants, though in name Gouernours) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus, reigning then king with him after Ageſipolis death, was ſent before into BOEOTIA with an army: Ageſilaus was diſpenſed with by law for going any more to the wars, by reaſon of his age, for that he was fourty yeares old from the firſt growth of haire on his face, & therfore went not that iourney: being aſhamed that the THEBANS ſhold now ſee him fight to reuenge the tyrants deaths, who had but a litle before taken armes for the baniſhed men, againſt the PHLIASIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrary faction vnto Ageſilaus: and was then gouernor in the city of THESPIES, a valiant and ſtout man of his hands, but euer fuller of vaine hope, then of good iudgement. He deſiring fame, and ſuppoſing that Phœbidas came to dignitie and great eſtimation through his valiant enterpriſe at THEBES: perſwaded himſelfe that he ſhould win much more honour, if of himſelfe he took the hauen of Piræa, ſuddenly ſtealing vpon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by ſea. It was thought commonly that this was a practiſe deuiſed by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine men to faine themſelues very deuout and friendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe men praiſing and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none ſo worthy as himſelfe alone, to take in hand ſo noble an enterpriſe. Thus by their perſwaſions they trained him on to this attẽpt, which for vileneſſe was nothing inferiour vnto that treacherous winning of the caſtle of Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leſſe hardines and diligence. For day was broken whẽ he was yet in the plaine of THRIASIVM, where he made account to haue bin at the wals of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him, ſeeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all afraid and amazed: yea he himſelf alſo fainted perceiuing he was diſcouered, and ſo returned backe with ſhame and diſhonour to the citie of THESPIES, without any exploit done, ſauing only a litle ſpoile taken. Therupon accuſers were ſtraight ſent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who vpon their arriuall found that they needed not to accuſe him, for that the Councel and Gouernors of the city had already ſent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of high treaſon. But he durſt not returne to SPARTA, fearing the furie of his countrimen, thinking indeed that they would ſeeme as though the wrong had been done to them, becauſe it ſhould not be thought that they had cauſed it to be done. Sphodrias practiſe to take the hauen of Piræa at Athens.

Sphodrias accuſed of treaſon.

Sphodrias had a ſonne called Cleonymus, a very faire boy, with whom Archidamus (Ageſilaus ſonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruellous ſorrie to ſee this boy he loued, in ſo great danger to loſe his father, and yet durſt not be ſeene to helpe him, becauſe Sphodrias was one of Ageſilaus aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Ageſilaus, (whom they feared aboue all men elſe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durſt not breake the matter to him: in fine, the day of the next ſeſſion being at hand, when iudgement ſhould be giuen of Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had prayed him to be an humble ſuter to him touching his fathers fact. Ageſilaus vnderſtanding that his ſonne loued Cleonymus, would not withdraw him from louing him, becauſe the boy euen from his childhood gaue alwayes good hope that one day he would ſure make as honeſt a man as any other whoſoeuer: neither made he any countenance to his ſonne, as though he would do any thing at his ſuite, but onely anſwered him, for that, he would doe as became him in ſuch a caſe. Whereupon Archidamus being baſhfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would ſee him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias friends deſpaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Ageſilaus familiars talking with them, told them that for the fact it ſelfe, Ageſilaus thought it a ſhamefull deed, and as much miſliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias ſelfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and ſaw that the common wealth had neede of men of ſuch ſeruice. This was Ageſilaus common talke to pleaſe his ſonne, when any man came to ſpeak to him of Sphodrias accuſation. Inſomuch that Cleonymus found ſtraight how Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be: and then Sphodrias friends alſo tooke heart againe vnto them, to ſolicite his cauſe, and to be earneſt ſuters for him. Ageſilaus among other had this ſpeciall propertie, that he loued his children dearly: and a tale goeth of him, that he would play with them in his houſe when they were litle ones, and ride vpon a litle cock-horſe, or a reed, as on horſebacke: inſomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children, he prayed him to ſay nothing, till he had litle children himſelfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his Iudges. The Athenians vnderſtanding it, ſent to proclaime warre with the Lacedæmonians. Wherupon Ageſilaus was much reproued, becauſe that to pleaſe the fond affection of his ſonne, he had hindered iuſtice, and brought his citie to be accuſed among the Grecians for ſuch grieuous crimes. Ageſilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no verie good will to make warre with the Thebans, he breaking the order ſet downe for leading of the armie, which was kept before, went to the warres himſelfe in perſon, and ſo inuading Boeotia, he both receiued and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, Now truly (ſaid he) the Thebans haue payd you your deſerued hire, for teaching them againſt their will to be ſouldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For indeed they ſay the Thebans became better ſoldiers and warriors than they were before, being dayly trained and exerciſed in arms through the continual inuaſions of the Lacedæmonians. Alſo this was the reaſon, why the old father Lycurgus his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make warre too oft with one ſelfe people, becauſe that by compulſion they ſhould not be made expert ſouldiers. For this cauſe did the confederates of Lacedæmon hate Ageſilaus, ſaying, that it was not for any knowne offence to the ſtate, but for very ſpite and priuate malice of his owne, that he ſought to vndo the Thebans in this manner: and that to follow his humor, they conſumed themſelues going yearely to the warres one while this way, another while that way, without any neceſſity at all, following a few Lacedæmonians, themſelues being alwaies the greater number. Then it was, that Ageſilaus deſiring to make them ſee what number of men of warre they were, vſed this deuice. On a time he commanded al the allies to ſit down together one with another by themſelues, and the Lacedæmonians alſo by themſelues. Thē he made a Herauld proclaime that all pot-makers ſhould ſtand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made them cry to the Braſiers to riſe alſo. After them in like manner, the Carpenters: then the Maſons, and ſo conſequently all occupations one after another. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamation, were all in manner on their feete. The Lacedæmonians, not one of them roſe: becauſe all baſe mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupie. Then Ageſilaus laughing at them: Lo, my friends (ſaid he) do you not ſee now that we bring moe ſouldiers to the field than ye do? At his returne from this iourney of Thebes, paſſing by the citie of Megara, as he went vp into the councell-houſe within the caſtle, there ſuddenly tooke him him a great crampe in his left leg, that ſwelled extremely, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but bloud which had filled the veine: a Phyſitiã of Syracvsa in Sicile being there, ſtraight opened a veine vnder the ankle of his foot, which made the paine to ceaſſe: notwithſtãding there came ſuch abundãce of bloud, that they could not ſtanch it, ſo that he ſwounded off, and was in great danger of preſent death. In fine, a way was found to ſtop it, and they caried him to Lacedæmon, where he lay ſicke a long time, ſo that he was paſt going to the warres any more. The Spartans in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by ſea and land, and among other, their greateſt ouerthrow was at the battell of Levctres, where the Thebans ouercame and ſlue them in plaine battell. Then the Grecians were all of one mind to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambaſſadours and Deputies from all the cities of Greece, and met at Lacedæmon to that end. One of theſe Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philoſopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He ſeeing how the other Ambaſſadors curried fauor with Ageſilaus, only he of the reſt kept his grauity to ſpeak freely, and made an Oration, not for the Thebans alone, but for all Greece in generall, declaring to them all, how warrs did only increaſe the greatneſſe and power of the citie of Sparta, and contrarily did miniſh and decay all other cities and townes of Greece: and for this cauſe, that he did counſel them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all, to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Ageſilaus perceiuing then that all the Grecians preſent at the aſſembly gaue him good eare, and were glad to heare him ſpeake thus boldly of peace, asked him openly, if he thought it meete and reaſonable, that all Boeotia ſhould be ſet cleare at libertie againe? Epaminondas preſently and boldly againe asked him, if he thought it iuſt and requiſite to ſet al Laconia cleare againe at libertie? Ageſilaus being offended therewith, ſtood vp on his feet, and commanded him to anſwer plainly whether they would ſet all Boeotia at liberty or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the ſelfe ſpeech againe, and asked him whether they would ſet all Laconia at liberty or not? That netled Ageſilaus ſo, that (being alſo glad of ſuch a cloake, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the Thebans) he preſently put the name of the Thebans out of the bill of thoſe which ſhould haue been compriſed within the league, and cried open warres vpon them in the market place. For the reſt he licenſed the other Deputies and Ambaſſadors of the people of Greece to depart, with this concluſion, that they ſhould louingly take order among themſelues for the controuerſie betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together: & they that could not fall to ſuch agreement, that then they ſhould try it by warrs, for it was a hard thing to take vp all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chance was at that time in the country of Phocide with his army, vnto whom the Ephori wrote, that he ſhould forthwith ſpoile the Thebans country: and therwith alſo they ſent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fancy to the iourney, and were loth to make war with them, but yet durſt not refuſe to go, nor diſobey the Lacedæmonians. And notwithſtanding that there were many ſignes preſaging ill lucke, as we haue written in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous Laconian was againſt the enterpriſe of this warre all that he could, Ageſilaus would needs forward, hoping he had now found oportunity to be reuenged of the Thebans, ſith all Greece beſides was in peace & at liberty, themſelues only exempted from treatie of peace. If there had been no other thing in it but the very ſhortneſſe of time, that made it manifeſt enough that this warre was begun in a geere, without any manner of reaſon. For the generall peace amongſt the Grecians was concluded at Sparta the foureteenth of May, and the Lacedæmonians were ouercome at the battell of Levctres the fifth of Iune: ſo as there was but twentie dayes betweene them. There were ſlaine a thouſand Lacedæmonians with their king Cleombrotus, and the choiceſt and the valianteſt Spartans about him. Among them was alſo ſlaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias ſonne, of whom we ſpake before: who hauing been beaten downe thriſe at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was ſlaine, valiantly fighting againſt the Thebans. This great ouerthrow chancing to the Lacedæmonians vnlooked for, and withall ſo glorious a victorie vnto the Thebans, as Grecians fighting with Grecians had neuer the like: the vanquiſhed citie of Sparta notwithſtanding deſerued no leſſe honour and commendãtion for her fortitude and worthineſſe, then did the victorious citie of Thebes. For as Xenophon writeth, that as among good men euen in table talke, and in their ſports and mirth, there falleth out euer ſome thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen ſo in like caſe, no leſſe but rather more, ought noblemens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked, as well in aduerſitie as in proſperitie. At that time by chance there was a common feaſt day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of ſtrangers that came to ſee the daunces and ſports of them that ſhewed naked in the Theater, when as the meſſengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell loſt at LEVCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor ſtraight ran all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had loſt the ſigniorie and commaundement ouer all GREECE, would not ſuffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the citie in any thing to change the forme of their feaſt; but ſent vnto the parents (to euery mans houſe) to let them vnderſtand the names of them that were ſlaine at the battell, they themſelues remaining ſtill in the Theater to ſee the daunces and ſports continued, to iudge who caried the beſt games away. The next morning when euery man knew the number of them that were ſlaine, and of thoſe alſo that were eſcaped, the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced another. On the other ſide, the parents of them that eſcaped, kept their houſes with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them alſo had occaſion to go abroad out of their houſes for any matter of neceſſitie, ye ſhould ſee him looke ſo heauily and ſad, that he durſt not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Beſides all this, euen amongſt the women there was greater difference: for the mothers of them that were to returne from the battell, were ſad and ſorrowfull, and ſpake not a word: contrarily, the mothers of them that were ſlaine, went friendly to viſite one another, to reioyce together. Now when the people ſaw that their confederates began to forſake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victorie, would inuade PELOPONNESVS, then they began to be pricked in conſcience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their city for that they had thruſt out of the kingdome a man perfect of limmes, to place an impotent perſon, being ſpecially warned by the gods to beware of that aboue all things. This notwithſtanding, they had him in ſuch veneration for his valiantneſſe, and his authoritie was ſuch thereby, that they did not onely vſe him in warre as their king and ſoueraigne Captaine, but in ciuill cauſes alſo, wherein there roſe any queſtion, they euer vſed his counſell and aduice: as they did, when they durſt not puniſh them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Treſantas (being a great number of them, and men of the nobleſt houſes, and of greateſt power within the citie) leſt they ſhould moue ſome ſtir or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth: it is ſhame and reproch to giue them any wiues, and alſo to marry any of theirs: whoſoeuer meeteth them, may lawfully ſtrike them, and they muſt abide it, and not giue them a word againe: they are compelled to weare poore tottered cloth gownes, patched with cloth of diuers colours; and worſt of all, to ſhaue one ſide of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamie they deſerued, ſpecially then ſtanding in need of a great number of men of warre, they referred themſelues altogether vnto Ageſilaus, to take ſuch order in it as he thought good: but Ageſilaus then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, ſaid in open aſſembly at LACEDÆMON, that for that day they ſhould let the law alone, notwithſtanding, that afterwards it ſhould ſtand in force. By this policie he kept the law inuiolate, and ſaued alſo the honor of thoſe poore men: and withall, to put theſe youths againe in heart, being amazed with this feare, he led the armie into the countrey of ARCADIA, and would giue no battell, but only tooke a ſmall citie of the MANTINEANS, and foraged the country. This againe did a litle reuiue the city of SPARTA with ſome hope, to make that it ſhould not vtterly deſpaire. But ſhortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the country of LACONIA with fourty thouſand footmen wel armed, beſides an infinite number of other light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the ſpoile: ſo that in all, there were about threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was wel neare ſixe hundred yeares ſith the DORIANS poſſeſſed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time till then they neuer ſaw enemies in their country that durſt inuade them: but then they ſacked and burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuer of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto SPARTA, & no man durſt come out to reſiſt them. For Ageſilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to goe out to fight againſt ſuch a tempeſt and furie of warre; but hauing fortified the middeſt of the citie, and guarded euery end of the ſtreetes with ſouldiers, he patiently bare all the bragges and threats of

of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bade him come into the field to defend his countrey, that onely was the cauſe of all theſe their calamities, hauing himſelfe procured this warre. If this went to Ageſilaus heart, no leſſe grieuous were thoſe troubles to him that roſe within the city: as the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to ſee that they did before their eyes: and of ſilly women alſo, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe as ſtraught of their wits, to heare the noiſe the enemies made, and to ſee the fire which they raiſed all the fields ouer. Much more ſorowfull alſo did this make him, when as he bethought himſelfe, that entring into his kingdome at ſuch time as the citie of SPARTA was in greateſt proſperitie that euer it was, he now ſaw his honour eclipſed, and the glory of his kingdome ouerthrowne: and the rather, for that himſelfe had often vaunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer ſeen the ſmoake of any enemies camp. And as they ſay of Antalcidas one day, that he anſwered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantneſſe of one anothers nation, alleadging for himſelfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driuen the LACEDÆMONIANS from the riuer of Cephiſus: It is true, ſaid the LACONIAN; but we did neuer driue you from the riuer of Eurotas. The like anſwer made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that caſt him in the teeth, There are diuers of your LACONIANS buried in the countrey of ARGOLIDE: So are there none of yours, ſaid he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did ſecretly ſend his children into the Ile of CITHERA, fearing leſt the city of SPARTA ſhould be taken, Ageſilaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to paſſe ouer the riuer to enter the citie, he ſtood to defend the middle part of the citie, being the higheſt place of the ſame, and there had his men ſet in order of battell. Now at that time, by chance the riuer of Eurotas was ſwelled greater then of ordinarie, by reaſon of the ſnow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldneſſe, then roughneſſe of the ſame in paſſing it ouer. Some ſhewing Ageſilaus how Epaimnondas marched formoſt before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, ſaying neuer a word but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminondas hauing done all that he could poſſible to giue the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, euen within the citie ſelfe of SPARTA, that he might there haue ſet vp ſome tokens of triumph, he could neuer entice Ageſilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driuen in the end to depart thence, and ſo went to deſtroy all the reſt of the countrey. There fell out a conſpiracie of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and took that quarter of the citie where the temple of Diana ſtood, called Iſſorium, a place of ſtrong ſituation, and ill to diſtreſſe. Hereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS in fury would ſtraight haue ſet vpon them. But Ageſilaus fearing great mutinie and ſtirre vpon it, commanded that no man ſhould ſtirre: and himſelfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that ſtrength: Sirs, ye haue not obeyed my commandement, this is not the place I appointed you to aſſemble in, neither all of you in one place; for I willed you to diſperſe your ſelues, ſome one way, ſome another way, ſhewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing theſe words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and ſo leauing that ſtrength, went into thoſe parts of the citie that he had ſhewed them. Ageſilaus then bringing others thither, poſſeſſed the fort of Iſſorium, and tooke fifteene of thoſe conſpirators, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out another conſpiracie farre greater then the firſt, of the SPARTANS themſelues, which were ſecretly gotten together into a houſe, to make ſome ſudden ſtirre and garboile; and to puniſh them in ſo great a trouble, it was hard: on the other ſide to neglect it, the conſpiracie was ouer-dangerous. Ageſilaus hauing conſulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any iudgement of law: where neuer SPARTAN before them ſuffered death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuerſe of their neighbours, and of the ILOTES themſelues (whom they had billed in their bands of ſouldiers) ſtole away and ranne to their enemies, which did much diſcourage them that remained: he warned his men that they ſhould euery day go to their couches where they lay, and that they ſhould take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, becauſe they ſhould not know the number of them that were fled in this ſort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, ſome ſay that they went out of LACONIA by reaſon of the winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADIANS diſcharged their bands, and euery one departed his way in diſorder. Others alſo hold opinion, that they continued there three moneths together, during which time they deſtroyed the moſt part of the

countrey. Theopompus writeth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, sent from Agesilaus, who brought them ten talents that they should depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money giuen them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselues had long before determined to haue done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All do acknowledge truly, that Agesilaus onely was the cause that the city of SPARTA was saued: who leauing his ambition and selfe will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safety. Neuertheless, after this great ouerthrow, he could neuer raise SPARTA againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole bodie, which hauing acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: euen so Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect state of gouernment in the common wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amitie together; when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happie life, they were straight ouerthrowne, and all went to wracke. By this time Agesilaus was growne old, and could no more go to the warres for very age: but his sonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA sent vnto them, wanne a battell against the ARCADIANS, called the Tearlesse battell; for there died not one of his men, and they slue a great number of their enemies. This victorie plainely shewed the great weaknesse and decay of the city of SPARTA. For in former times it was so common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did sacrifice nothing else to the gods in token of thankes, within the citie, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the battell, made no boast of it, neither did they that heard the newes, greatly reioyce at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of MANTINEA, which Thucydides describeth, the Ephori onely sent the messenger that brought the newes, for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they vnderstood Archidamus came home victorious, neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father himselfe went first of all to meete him, with the teares in his eyes for ioy, and after him all the other magistrates and officers of the citie; and a swarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the riuers side, holding vp their hands to heauen, and thanking the gods, as if their citie had redeemed and recouered her shame and lost honour, and began now to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, some say, that the husbands durst not boldly looke their wiues in the faces they were so ashamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the citie of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and replenished with people, he called home againe out of all parts, the naturall inhabitants of the same. The SPARTANS durst not fight with him (nor to hinder his purpose) though it spited them to the hearts, and were angry with Agesilaus, for that in his reigne they had lost al that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA selfe, and for goodnesse and fertiltie to be compared with the best parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilaus would not agree to the peace which the THEBANS sent to offer him: and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the enemies kept in deeds. Therfore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not onely without recouering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the city of SPARTA by a warlike stratageme, in the which he was deceiued. For the MANTINEANS being newly reuolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing sent for the LACEDÆMONIANS, Epaminondas receiuing intelligence that Agesilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aide the MANTINEANS, marched away secretly by night from TEGEA, without the priuitie of the MANTINEANS, and went straight to SPARTA; the which he had almost surprised on the sudden, going another way then Agesilaus came (being in maner without men to defend it.) Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callisthenes saith, (or as Xenophon writeth, a CRETAN) brought Agesilaus newes of it; who dispatched a horseman straight to aduertise them of the citie of SPARTA, and marching forward himselfe to returne, stayed not long after before he arriued. He was no sooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who passing ouer the riuer of Eurotas, gaue assault to the citie. Then Agesilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of securitie as before, but rather of desperation and courage, hee valiantly defended it, more then an olde mans yeares could beare.

Agesilaus repulsed Epaminondas from Lacedæmō.

Thus,

Thus, through courage and desperate mind, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euer vse it, he put by the danger and saued the city of SPARTA from Epaminondas hands, setting vp markes of triumph for repulsing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to see the LACEDÆMONIANS how honourably they rewarded their nurse and countrey for their good education, but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulse the enemies where-soeuer the danger was greatest. It is said also, that at that time there was one Isadas the sonne of Phœbidas, that did maruellous strange things to behold, both in the face of his enemies, as also in the sight of his friends. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being starke naked, and vnarmed, his bodie nointed with oyle, hauing in one hand a boresstaffe, and in the other a sword, in this manner he went out of his house, and ranne amongst them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withstood him, and was not once hurt, either for that the gods preserued him for his manhoods sake, or else because men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honour and reward of his valiantnesse: but withall they set a fine on his head to pay a thousand siluer Drachmaes for his rash attempt, to hazard himselfe in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought another great battell before the citie of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowne the first rankes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and couragiously distressing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiuing him (as Dioscorides writeth) slue him with his boresspeare. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithstanding, do call the ofspring of this Anticrates, Macheriones, as much to say, as sword-men, as though he had slaine him with a sword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did esteeme this Anticrates so much, for that deadly stroke he gaue (because they were afraid of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that slue him, great honours and dignities, and discharged all his ofspring and kindred from paiment of subsidy and common contributions, which priuiledge one Callicrates, a kinsman of this Anticrates enioyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS hauing taken peace generally amongst them, Agesilaus would needs exclude the MESSENIANS from being sworne to this peace, saying: that they need not sweare, because they had no city. Now, forasmuch as all the GRECIANS else did receiue them as amongst the number, and tooke their oath vnto this peace, the LACEDÆMONIANS brake off from this generall peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS country; and all through the allurement of Agesilaus, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS a cruell and unsatiable man for warres, to deale so craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, he brought himselfe in discredite with all men, being compelled to make his city bare of money, borrowing of them still, and raising sundry contributions amongst them: whereas indeed it had been his best way to haue ended all these miseries, hauing so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to haue lost so great an Empire of so many townes and cities both by sea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue himself vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the ÆGYPTIANS, euery man thinking it a shameful part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of al the GRECIANS, & the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glory) should for money let out his person to hire, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traytour and rebell to his king and master, to become a mercenary Captaine and souldier to do him seruice. And moreouer, he being now fourescore yeares of age and vpwards, his bodie all mangled with wounds, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserued some blame: for noble acts haue their time, yea rather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Agesilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in seruice, specially for benefit of the commonwealth, but perswaded himselfe that it was a dishonour to him to liue idlie in a city and do nothing, till death should come and make his summons: thereupon therefore he leauied men of warre through all GRECE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea, hauing thirtie SPARTANS counsellors and assistants to him, as he had in his first iourney. Now Agesilaus being arriued in ÆGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and gouernours of king Tachos came to the sea shore, and honourably receiued him: and not they onely, but infinit numbers of ÆGYPTIANS of all sorts Agesilaus greedy of warres.

(that were maruellous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agesilaus) came thither from all parts to see what manner of man he was. But when they saw no stately traine about him, but an old graybeard layed on the grasse by the sea side, a litle man that looked simply of the matter, & but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored threed-bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merry tale, that a mountaine should bring foorth, and was deliuered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him presents to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geese, and such grosse things: and refused all confections, perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to giue them to the ILOTES his slaues. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted maruellously in the rush Papyrus, and liked the garlands they made of them, for their fitnesse & the handsomenesse, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing spoken at that time with Tachus, who was assembling his army to go on his iourney, he was not made Captaine generall, as he looked he should haue beene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the strangers, Chabrias Generall of all the army by sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos himselfe in person. This at the first grieued Agesilaus to the heart, being driuen whether he wold or not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this EGYPTIAN. So he sailed with them into PHENICE, against the PHENICIANS, imbasing himselfe against his noble disposition and mind, and gaue him place, vntill he saw time of reuenge. It chanced that one Nectanebos a nephew of this Tachos, hauing the leading of part of this army, rebelled against him, and being chose king by the EGYPTIANS, he sent vnto Agesilaus, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, & prayed him to ioyne with him, promising great rewards vnto them both. Tachus vnderstanding that, besought them both that they would not forsake him. Chabrias for his part also did likewise intreate Agesilaus, & perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agesilaus answered him: For thee, Chabrias, thou camest of thine owne good will, and therefore mayest do what thou thinkest good, but so is it not with me: for I am sent hither a Captaine by my countrey, to serue the ÆGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honestie for me to make warre with them, whom I am sent to serue and aide: were it not that they themselues which sent me, do now commaund me the contrarie. This answer being made, he sent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they also for their parts sent to intreate the councell of LACEDÆMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promising to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing heard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilaus should consider of this matter: and wrote secretly to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the common wealth of SPARTA. So Agesilaus taking with him the mercenarie souldiers which he had brought out of GREECE, went vnto Nectanebos, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his countrey, to bewray a wicked thing: but indeed taking away the vizard to benefite his country, they might by a better name rightly haue termed it treason, Howbeit ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS placing the chiefest point of honor, to consist in the benefite of their country, did acknowledge nothing to be iustice, but that which they thought might serue for the aduancement of the glory of SPARTA. Tachos seeing himselfe forsaken thus by his mercenarie strangers, fled. But now on the other side, there arose another king in the citie of MENDES against this Nectanebos who hauing leauied to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agesilaus, told him, that indeed they were a great number of men of all sorts together, and specially men of handie craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, because they knew not what warre meant. But Agesilaus answered him againe: It is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and vnskilfulnesse, which is hardest of al to deceiue. For warlike stratagems do most preuaile against men that haue greatest feare and experience: and therefore they foresee one thing rather then another. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor haue forecast, and therefore do giue him no more aduantage that seeketh to deceiue them, then the wrastler by slight is able to ouerthrow him whom he cannot stirre nor remoue. Afterwards the MENDESIAN king himselfe sent vnto Agesilaus, to winne him if he could. Nectanebos then began to be afraid. For when Agesilaus counselled him to try it by battell as soone as he could, and not to prolong this warre against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multitude might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuers things: then he began to feare and

and ſuſpect him more, and thereupon retired into a great citie, well walled about, and of great ſtrength. Ageſilaus being offended that he miſtruſted him thus, tooke it inwardly: but being aſhamed to turne againe vnto the third, and alſo to depart without any exploit done, he followed him, and encloſed himſelfe within thoſe walles. The enemies purſuing him hard, came vnto the city, and began to intrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the Ægyptian Nectanebos fearing a long ſiege, determined to giue them battell. Thereto the hired Grecians gaue conſent, as deſiring no better match, & the rather alſo for that there was but ſmall ſtore of corne within the city. But Ageſilaus perſwading the contrary, would in no wiſe conſent to it: whereupon the Egyptians thought worſe of him then before, and plainly called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all theſe accuſations, expecting time to performe an exploit he intended, which was this. The enemies had caſt a deepe trench without to compaſſe them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commanded the Grecians to arme and to put themſelues in readineſſe: then he came vnto the Egyptian, and ſaid vnto him: Lo here is an excellent occaſion preſented to ſaue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I ſaw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing leſt otherwiſe we ſhould haue loſt it. Now ſith the enemies themſelues haue with their owne hands giuen vs the way to ſaue our ſelues by this trench they haue caſt, the which as much as is finiſhed therof doth hinder their great multitude to helpe themſelues, & that which is yet left vnfiniſhed doth giue vs oportunitie to fight with them of euen hand: determine to ſhew thy valour, and following vs, ſaue thy ſelfe and thy people. For the enemies which we ſhall aſſaile before vs, ſhall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trench which defendeth vs on euery ſide, can no way hurt vs. Nectanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great wiſedome, and ſo thruſting in among the Grecians, did aſſaile the enemies: the which were ſoone ouerthrowne and put to flight, as many as durſt reſiſt and make head againſt them. Ageſilaus hauing won Nectanebos againe to truſt him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like ſubtiltie wherewith he had firſt beguiled them, and which they knew not how to auoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: ſodainely againe he would turne this way & that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a ſtraight ſluce, walled about on either ſide, with great broade ditches full of running water: ſo that when they were euen in the midſt of it, he ſudainely ſtopped their paſſage with the front of his battell, which he caſt to the breadth of the ſluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neuer compaſſe him in behind, nor flanke him on the ſides. They hauing in this ſort made ſome ſmall reſiſtance, in the end turned their backes and fled, and left a great number ſlaine in the field: the reſidue after that laſt ouerthrow forſooke their Captains, and fled ſtraggling here and there. Thus the affaires of this Egyptian king after that time had good ſucceſſe, and he was quietly ſtabliſhed in his kingdome, making much of Ageſilaus: and doing him all honor poſſible, prayed him to tarrie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needs haſten home to his countrey, which was in warre with others, knowing that his city of Sparta was without money, becauſe they were driuen to giue pay to ſtrangers. Thereupon Nectanebos in the end tooke his leaue of him very honourably, preſenting him a gift (beſides all other honours he did him) of two hundred and thirty ſiluer talents in ready money, to defray the charges of the war in his country. Howbeit the ſea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithſtanding recouered land with his ſhips in a deſert place of the coaſt of Lybia, which was called the hauen of Menelaus, after he was foureſcore & foure yeares old: of the which he had reigned one and forty yeares king of Sparta, and 30 yeares therof and more he was alwaies taken and reputed for the greateſt perſon, and in maner Chieftaine generall of all Greece, vntill the battell of Leuctres. Now the Lacedæmonians hauing a cuſtome to bury the dead bodies of their citizẽs that died out of their country, in the ſame place where they departed, (the bodies of their kings excepted) the Spartans which were at that time about Ageſilaus, annointed his body with waxe for lacke of honey, and caried him home to Sparta in this maner. His ſonne Archidamus ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whoſe iſſue ſucceſſiuely reigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the fifth king in ſucceſſion after Ageſilaus) whom indeed Leonidas put to death, becauſe he ſought to reſtore the Lacedæmonians ancient diſcipline and forme of life.

But that I loue the ſonne of him much rather.

The father of Pompey hated in Rome.

For the ROMAINES neuer ſhewed more bitter hate againſt any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truly ſo long as he liued, they feared his greatneſſe obtained by armes, for indeed he was a noble Captaine: but being ſtricken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare wheron his body lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie. Contrariwiſe, neuer any other ROMAINE (but Pompey) had the peoples earneſt good wils ſo ſoone, nor that in proſperitie and aduerſitie continued longer conſtant, then vnto Pompey. One onely cauſe procured the fathers hate, and [illegible] was, an vnſatiable and greedy deſire of money. But Pompey his ſon, was for many occaſions beloued: as for temperance of life, aptneſſe to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulneſſe of word, and courteſie in conuerſation: ſo that there was neuer man that requeſted any thing with leſſe ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleaſure any man when he was requeſted. For he gaue without diſdaine, and took with great honor. Furthermore, being but a child, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good wils before he ſpake: for his countenance was ſweet, mixed with grauitie, and being come to mans ſtate, there appeared in his geſture and behauior a graue and princely maieſty. His haire alſo ſtood a litle vpright, & the caſt and ſoft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine reſemblance (as they ſaid) of the ſtatues & images of king Alexander. And becauſe euery man gaue him that name, he did not refuſe it himſelfe: inſomuch as there were ſome which ſporting wiſe did openly call him Alexander. Wherupon Lucius Philippus a Conſull, was not aſhamed to ſay openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip did loue Alexander. It is reported alſo, that when Flora the curtiſan waxed old, ſhe much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which ſhe had with Pompey being a youug man: telling that after ſhe had lien with him, ſhe could not poſſibly riſe from him, but ſhe muſt needs giue him ſome ſweet quip or pleaſant taunt. She would tell alſo how one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her, and was a maruellous earneſt earneſt ſuter to obtaine her good will: and that ſhe anſwered him flatly, ſhe would not, for the loue ſhe bare to Pompey. Geminius thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himſelfe. Pompey deſirous to pleaſure him, granted the requeſt: howbeit Geminius after that, would not come neare Flora, nor ſpeake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtiſan-like, for ſhe was ſicke a long time for very griefe of mind and the thought ſhe tooke vpon it. All this notwithſtanding, it is ſaid that this Flora had then ſuch fame for her paſſing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus ſetting forth and beautifying the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, with goodly tables and pictures, among the reſt, he cauſed her picture to be liuely drawne for her excellent beauty. Furthermore, Pompey againſt his nature, dealt very hardly and vncourteouſly with the wife of Demetrius, his franchiſed bondman (who while he liued was in great credite with him, and dying, left her worth foure thouſand talents) fearing to be taken with her beautie which was very ſingularly faire, leſt he ſhould be thought in loue with her. Now though herein he ſeemed to be very circumſpect, and to caſt the worſt, yet could he not thus ſcape the detracting tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuſe him, that to pleaſe and content his wiues, he would let paſſe and winke at many things that were againſt the profit of the common-wealth. To proue his ſober and temperate diet, and how he was contented with common meats, a word (they ſay) he ſpake when he was very ſicke, and could taſt no meate, is ſpecially noted. For to bring his ſtomacke to him againe, his Phyſition willed him to eate a thruſh. So ſeeking all about to get him one, there was no Thruſh to be bought for money, for they were out of ſeaſon. Notwithſtanding, one told him that he ſhould not miſſe of them at Lucullus houſe, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. Why, what then, ſaid he: if Lucullus riot were not, ſhould not Pompey liue? Therewithall, letting his Phyſitians counſell alone, he made them dreſſe ſuch meate as was euery where common. But of that we will ſpeake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the field with his father that was in armes againſt Cinna, there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius; who being bribed with money, had promiſed Cinna to kill him, and other confederators alſo had promiſed to ſet their Captaines tent on fire. This conſpiracie was reuealed vnto Pompey as he ſate at ſupper, which nothing amated him at all, but he drank freely, and was merier with Terentius then of cuſtome. So when it was bed time, he ſtole out of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his ſafety. Terentius thinking the houre come to attempt his enterpriſe, roſe with his ſword in his hands, and went to Pompeys bed where he was wont to lie, and gaue many a thruſt into the matreſſe. After he had done that, all the campe was ſtraight in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the ſoldiers in all haſt would needs haue gone and yeelded to their enemie, beginning already to ouerthrow their tents, and to truſſe away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durſt not come out of his tent: notwithſtanding Pompey his ſonne ranne amongſt the mutinous ſouldiers, and humbly beſought them with teares in his eyes, not to do their Captaine this villanie; and in fine threw himſelfe flatling to the ground ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them march ouer him, if they had ſuch a deſire to be gone. The ſouldiers being aſhamed of their folly, returned againe to their lodging, and changing mind, reconciled themſelues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the world, Pompey being his heire, was accuſed for the father, to robbe the common treaſure. Howbeit he confeſſed and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchiſed bondmen that had ſtolen the moſt part of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithſtanding, he was accuſed himſelfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cords of hunters nets, and bookes that were taken at Ascvlvm. He confeſſed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had loſt them ſince, when Cinna returned vnto Rome with his ſouldiers, who breaking into his houſe by force, ſpoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitiue ſentence, in which time Pompey ſhewed himſelfe of good ſpirit and vnderſtanding, more then was looked for in one of his yeares: inſomuch he wanne ſuch fame and fauour by it, that Antiſtius being Prætor at that time, and Iudge of his matter, fell into ſuch a liking with him, that ſecretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, and the parties were ſecretly aſſured. This was not ſo cloſely conueyed, but the people perceiued it, by the care and paines Antiſtius tooke to fauor his matter. Inſomuch, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, & cleared him, all the people together, as if they had been agreed, cryed out with one voice, Talaſſio, Talaſſio, being the vſuall and common crie they vſed of old time at mariages in Rome. This cuſtome by report of ancient folke came vp in this maner. At what time the chiefeſt Peeres and Lords of Rome did rauiſh the Sabines daughters, which came to Rome to ſee common ſports played, there chanced a few raſcals (as hog-heards or neat-heards) to carrie away a goodly faire woman. They fearing ſhe ſhould be taken from them, cryed out in the ſtreets as they went, Talaſſio, as if they would haue ſaid, ſhe is for Talaſſius. This Talaſſius was a young gentleman well knowne, and beloued of moſt men: ſo that ſuch as heard him but named onely, did clappe their hands for ioy, and cryed out with them, Talaſſio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they ſay came this cuſtome, that euer ſince they haue cryed this word Talaſſio vnto them that are newly maried, becauſe the mariage of that faire yong maide proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talaſſius. And this me thinkes ſoundeth neareſt to the troth of that they report of this wedding crie of Talaſſio. Shortly after this iudgement giuen Pompey maried Antiſtia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accuſed him of ſomewhat, whereupon he being afraid, ſecretly ſtole away. Now when they could not find him in Cinnaes campe, there ranne ſtraight a rumour abroade, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did ſet vpon him for this occaſion. But he thinking to ſaue himſelfe by flying, was ſtraight ouertaken by a priuate Captaine that followed him with his ſword drawne in his hand. Cinna ſeeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his ſeale from his finger wherewith he ſealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tuſh, ſaid the Captaine, I come not to ſeale any couenant, but to chaſtiſe a villaine and cruell tyrant: and therewithall thruſt his ſword through him, and ſlue him preſently. Cinna being ſlaine in this ſort, Carbo ſucceeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hand, being a more cruell tyrant then the firſt. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wiſhed for, and deſired of the moſt part of the Romaines, for the grieuous oppreſſions and miſeries they endured, that they thought themſelues happie to change Gouernour: for their city was brought into ſuch miſerie, as hoping no more to ſee Rome recouer her laſt libertie, they deſired yet a more tolerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of Italy called Picenvm (now the marches of Ancona) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more great loue and goodwill of the citie for his fathers ſake. He ſeeing that the nobleſt men of Rome forſooke their houſes and goods, to flie from al parts vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of ſafety, would not go to him as a fugitiue and caſtaway to ſaue himſelfe, without bringing him ſome power to increaſe his armie, but would honourably go thither with an army, as he that meant firſt to do himſelfe pleaſure. So he felt the goodwill of the Picentines, who willingly took his part, and reiected them that were ſent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that ſtepping forth, ſaid: that Pompey which came from the ſchoole the laſt day, muſt now in haſte be a Captaine. But they were ſo offended with his ſpeech, that they ſtraight diſpatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time Pompey being but three and twentie yeares old, tarying to receiue no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him of himſelfe; and cauſing a tribunall to be ſet vp in the middeſt of the market place of Avximvm, a great populous citie, he commaunded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefeſt men of the citie, and they that for Carboes ſake withſtood his doings) without delay forthwith to auoide the city: and ſo began to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, Sergeants of bands, Centeniers, and ſuch other officers as appertaine to martiall diſcipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the ſame marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the reſt willingly yeelded vnto him: wherby in ſhort ſpace he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, carts, and all manner of beaſts for cariage. In this ſort he tooke his iourney towards Sylla, not in haſte, as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by ſmall iourneys ſtaying ſtill where he might hurt his enemie, cauſing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuertheleſſe, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Celius, and Brutus, all three did ſet vpon Pompey together, not all in a front, nor of one ſide, but in three ſeueral places they compaſſed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him ſure at the firſt onſet. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting forth his force together in one place, he firſt marched againſt Brutus, hauing placed his horſemen (among the which he was himſelfe in perſon) before the battell of his footmen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were Gavles, coming to giue charge vpon him, he ran one of the chiefeſt among them through with his

his lance and slue him. The other GAVLES seeing him slaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: so that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themselues, and some fled one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare, came all in to Pompey, and yeelded themselues. Afterwards Scipio the Consull coming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to ioyne, before they came to throwing of their darts, Scipioes souldiers saluted Pompeys men, and went on their side: so was Scipio driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo himselfe hauing sent after him diuers troopes of horsemen by the riuer of Arsis, Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assaile them, that he draue them into such places as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon they seeing no way to scape, yeelded themselues horse and armours, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone he vnderstood of it, fearing lest Pompey should miscarrie, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies, he made haste to march towards him for to aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approach, commanded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might see them brauely appointed when he should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour, and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla saw him afarre off comming towards him, and his army marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly men that so brauely aduanced themselues, being couragious for the victorie they had obtained of their enemies, he lighted on foot. When Pompey also came to do his dutie to him, and called him Imperator, (as much as Emperour, or soueraigne Prince) Sylla resaluted him with the selfe name, beyond all mens expectation present, litle thinking that he would haue giuen so honourable a name vnto so young a man as Pompey, who had not yet been Senator: considering that he himself did contend for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was answerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rise and put off his cap to him, which he did not vnto any other noble men about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in himselfe. Wherfore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into GAVLE, because Metellus that was there, was thought to haue done no exploit worthy of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than himselfe: yet if Metellus of himself were contented, and would intreate him, that he would willingly go and helpe him to end this war. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE, did of himselfe wonderful exploits, and did so reuiue Metellus old courage and valiantnesse to fight, which now began to faint, like boyling copper that being powred vpon the cold and hard copper, doth melt and dissolue it, as fast or faster then fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath been counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne, the prize away where he had wrestled, they neuer record among them his childish victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: euen so I am afraid to speake of the wonderfull deeds that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had wonne afterwards. For I am affraide that whilest I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe ouer his chiefest acts and most notable enterprises, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had ouercome all ITALY, and was proclaimed Dictator, he did reward all his Lieutenants and Captaines that had taken his part, and did aduance them to honourable place and dignity in the commonwealth, frankly granting them all that they requested him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valiantnesse, and thinking that he would be a great stay to him in al his wars, he sought by some meanes to allie him to him, Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to mary Æmylia the daughter of Metella, & of her first husband, the which also was another mans wife, and with child by her husband. These mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys nature and condition: to see Æmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to mary her great with child; and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husband that did put her away. For Antistius was murthered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take part with Sylla for his sonne in law Pompeys sake;

and her mother voluntarily put her ſelf to death, ſeeing her daughter receiued ſuch open wrong. By theſe apparant cauſes, thoſe vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miſerable tragedie, by means of the death of Æmylia, who ſhortly after miſerably died with child in Pompeys houſe. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Iland at his deuotion, as a ſafe place to receiue all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo alſo kept the ſea thereabouts with a certaine number of ſhips: that Domitius alſo was gone into AFRICKE: and diuerſe other noblemen that were baniſhed, that had ſcaped his proſcriptions and outlawries, were all in thoſe parts. Againſt them was Pompey ſent with a great army. Howbeit he no ſooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole Iland, and went his way. There he fauourably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miſerie, and ſet them againe at libertie, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the citie of MESSINA. They deſpiſing his tribunall and iuriſdiction, alledged the ancient order and priuiledge of the ROMAINS ſet downe in times paſt amongſt them. But Pompey anſwered them in choler: What do ye prattle to vs of your law, that haue our ſwords by our ſides? It ſeemeth alſo that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his miſerie. For ſith he muſt needs die, as there was no remedie but he ſhould, then it had been better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would haue imputed it to his malice that ſo had commanded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had been thriſe Conſull at ROME, to be openly examined, and he ſitting in his chaire of ſtate or tribunall, condemned him to die in preſence of them all: to the great offence and miſliking of euery one that was preſent. So Pompey bade them take him away and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the ſcaffold where he ſhould be executed, and ſeeing the ſword drawne that ſhould cut off his head, he prayed the executioners to giue him a litle reſpite & place to vntruſſe a point, for he had a paine in his belly. Cæius Oppius alſo (one of Iulius Cæſars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, ſaid he knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, & few like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him aſide, and walked a few turns about: then when he had queſtioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commanded his guard to cary him away, and to diſpatch him. Howbeit we may not giue too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, ſpeaking of Iulius Cæſars friends or foes, For Pompey indeed was cõpelled to make away the greateſt perſonages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriouſly taken; but for the reſt, al thoſe that he could ſecretly ſuffer to ſteale away, he was cõtented to winke at it, and would not vnderſtand it: and moreouer did helpe ſome beſides to ſaue themſelues. Now Pompey was determined to haue taken ſharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had ſtoutly taken the enemies part. But Sthenis one of the Gouernours of the city, craning audience of Pompey, told him he ſhould do them wrong and iniuſtice, if he ſhould pardon him that committed all the fault, and ſhould deſtroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durſt take vpon him to father the offence of them all, Sthenis anſwered ſtraight, that it was himſelfe, that had perſwaded his friends, & compelled his enemies to do that which they did. Pompey being pleaſed to heare the franke ſpeech and boldneſſe of this man, firſt forgaue him the fault he had committed, and conſequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderſtanding that his ſoldiers did kill diuers men in the high waies, he ſealed vp al their ſwords, and whoſe ſeale ſoeuer was broken, he was well fauouredly puniſhed. Pompey being buſie about theſe matters in SICILE, receiued letters and commiſſion from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into AFRICKE, to make war vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leauied already more men of war, then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICKE into ITALY: and had there ouerthrowne all the ROMAINES doings, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyrant. Pompey thereupon hauing ſpeedily put himſelfe in readineſſe to take the ſeas, left Memmius his ſiſters husband gouernor of SICILE: and ſo himſelf imbarked, & hoiſſed ſaile with ſixeſcore gallies, and eight hundred other ſhips or bottomes, to tranſport their victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatſoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleet, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE, there ſtraight came to him ſeuen thouſand ſoldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themſelues, beſides ſeuẽ whole legions that he brought with him. They ſay moreouer, that at his arriuall, he had a preſent chance happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his ſouldiers ſtumbled on a treaſure by chance, and got thereby a great maſſe of money. thought ſure that the field where this treaſure was found, was full of gold and ſiluer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, could haue no rule of his ſouldiers; neither could he chooſe but laugh to ſee ſo many thouſand men digging the ground, and turning vp the field: vntill in the end they wearied themſelues, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey, with his armie ſet in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quagmire before him, that ranne with a ſwift running ſtreame, very ill to get ouer: beſides that, from the very breake of day it had powred downe and rained ſo faſt, and was ſo great a wind withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they ſhould not fight, commanded his people to truſſe away, and remoue. Pompey on the other ſide, finding this an excellent fit occaſion for him, ſodainly made his men to march, and paſſed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order, were maruellouſly amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made reſiſtance. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly ſet in battell ray, and had beſides the wind beating the raine full in their faces. So did the ſtorme much hurt vnto the ROMAINES alſo, for they could not one ſee another: inſomuch as Pompey himſelfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his owne ſouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and was ſomewhat long before he anſwered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowne his enemies with great ſlaughter, (for they ſay, that of twenty thouſand of them, there were but three thouſand ſaued) Pompeys ſouldiers ſaluted him by the name of Imperator: but he anſwered them, that he would not accept the honor of that name, ſo long as he ſaw his enemies campe yet ſtanding: and therefore, if it were ſo they thought him worthy of that name, that firſt they ſhould ouerthrow the trench and fort of their enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The ſouldiers when they heard him ſay ſo, went preſently to aſſault it. There Pompey fought bare-headed, to auoide the like danger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the camp by force, and in it ſlue Domitius. After that ouerthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded themſelues, ſome willingly, and others taken by force: as alſo they tooke king Iarbas that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was giuē to Hiempſal. But Pompey being deſirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his army, went many daies iourney into the maine land, and ſtill conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMAINES dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that countrey, the which made but ſmall account of them at that time. He ſayd moreouer, that the wild beaſts of AFRICKE alſo ſhould feele the force and good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINS: and thereupon he beſtowed a few dayes in hunting of Lyons and Elephants. For it is reported, that in fortie dayes ſpace at the vttermoſt, he had ouercome his enemies, ſubdued AFRICKE, and had eſtabliſhed the affaires of the kings and kingdomes of that countrey, being then but foure and twenty yeares old. So when he returned vnto the citie of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to diſcharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion onely, tarying the cōming of another Captaine that ſhould be ſent to ſucceed him in the gouernment of that countrey. This commandement grieued him not a litle, though he made no ſhew of it at all: but his ſouldiers ſhewed plainly that they were offended, For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to giue out broad ſpeeches againſt Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatſoeuer became of them) to forſake him, and they would not that he ſhould truſt vnto a tyrant. Pompey ſeeing that he could not perſwade them by any reaſon to be quiet, roſe out of his chaire and retired into his tent weeping. But the ſouldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of ſtate, where he ſpent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and command them, and he deſiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, ſeeing them importunate to preſſe him to it, he ſware he would kill himſelfe, rather then they ſhould compell him: yet they ſcant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled againſt him. Sylla when he heard that, ſayd to his friends: Well, then I ſee it is my deſtinie in mine old dayes to fight with children. He meant ſo, becauſe of Marius the yonger, who had done him much miſchiefe, and had beſides put him in great danger. But afterwards vnderſtanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to go and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honor they could: becauſe he would go beyond them all in ſhew of good will, he went out of his houſe to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to ſay

great and commanded all them that were present to giue him that name also. This notwithstanding some say, that it was in AFRICKE this name was first giuen him by a common cry of all his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeed it is true, that Pompey himself being sent Proconsul into SPAINE, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so cõmonly knowne and accepted, as no man did enuie it. And therefore rightly is the wisedome of the ancient ROMAINES to be both commended and had in admiration, which did not onely reward seruice in the field with such honourable names and titles, but ciuill seruice and good gouernment also in peace at home. For there were two, whõ the people of ROME called Maximi, to say, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate: the other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certain bondmen infranchised, who through their riches and fauour had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honor of triumph, but Sylla denied it, alleadging that none could enter in triũph into ROME but Consuls or Prætors. For sith Scipio the first, who in SPAINE had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer desired this honour of triumph, being neither Consull nor Prætor, much lesse should he stand vpon demaund of triumph into ROME, when that through his yong yeares he was not yet a Senator: and besides, it would purchase him enuie of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla alleadge against Pompey and told him plainly that if he were bent to stãd in it, he wold resist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the rising, not the setting of the Sun: meaning therby, how his owne honor increased, & Syllaes diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he said; but perceiuing by their countenãces that stood by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he said, When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnesse of so yong a man, and then cried out twise together, Let him then triumph a gods name. Many being offended therwith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger thẽ more, would needs be brought in in triumphant chariot drawne with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the citie being too narrow, he was driuen to leaue the Elephants, and was contented to be drawn in with horses. Now his soldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised thẽ, going about to trouble and hinder his triumph: he said, he passed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Wherupõ, there was a famous man at that time called Seruilius who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeys triumph, who said openly, Now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserueth triumph: being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue easily beene made Senator: he sued not for that, but as they say, sought honor by a stranger meane lesse honourable. For if he had been made Senator so yong, it had not been so great a matter: but to haue such honor before he was Senator, that was maruellously to be noted. But this wan him the more fauor and goodwill still amongst the common people: for they were glad when after his triumph they saw him in company amongst the ROMAINE knights. On the other side, it spited Sylla to see him come so fast forward, and to rise to so great credite: notwithstanding being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keepe it to himselfe vntill that Pompey by force, and against Syllaes wil, had brought Lepidus to be Consull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furthered his desire. Therupon Sylla seeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honour him, he sayd vnto him: O yong man, I see thou art glad of this victorie, and so hast thou cause; for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had such fauour of the people, as for thy sake to haue made Lepidus Consull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the citie: but I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy businesse, for thou hast aduanced a dangerous enemie to thy selfe. Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discouered most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last wil and testament: for he gaue Legacies vnto euery one of his friends, and some of them he made tutors and ouerseers of his sonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would haue kept Syllaes bodie from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funerall should not be openly solemnized, he contrary wise brought him very honourably and safely to the ground. Shortly after Syllaes death, his words of prophecie vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vsurping the authority which Sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred straight in armes,

Lepidus moueth ciuill war

ſtirring vp againe thoſe of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be auenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, ſpying for occaſion to riſe againe. True it is, that his colleague and fellow Conſull Catulus (whom the beſt and ſoundeſt part of the people followed) was thought a maruellous honeſt man, both iuſt and modeſt: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, inſomuch as time required Pompeys skill and experience. So Pompey ſtood not doubtfull which way he would diſpoſe himſelfe, but tooke part ſtraight with the Nobilitie and honeſteſt men, and was preſently choſen Captaine of their army againſt Lepidus, who had alreadie wonne the greateſt part of ITALY, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the reſt, Pompey, eaſily ouercame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODONA, beſieging of Brutus. In the meane ſeaſon Lepidus came to ROME, and being hard at the walles demaunding the ſecond Conſulſhip, made them afraid in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all ſorts. Howbeit this feare was cooled ſtraight, by a letter which Pompey ſent to ROME, aduertiſing how he had ended this warre without any bloud ſhed: for Brutus either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeelding himſelfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certaine number of horſmen that conducted him vnto a litle towne vpon the riuer of Po; where the next day after, Geminius being ſent by Pompey, ſlue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himſelfe into his hands; and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting him to death. Thus Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwards by the helpe of Caſſius ſlue Iulius Cæſar: howbeit he ſhewed not himſelfe ſo like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did; as we haue declared more at large in his life: Furthermore Lepidus being driuen to forſake ITALY, fled into SARDINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ſickneſs that he had, not for any ſorrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his heart, knowing thereby that his wife had plaied the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAINE, who was another maner of warrier then Lepidus, and that kept the ROMAINES in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late ciuill wars were fled to him, as from the laſt diſeaſe of the warres. He had alreadie ouerthrowne many inferiour Captaines, and was now wreſtling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble ſouldier, but now being old, made warres but ſlowly, and would not couragiouſly take preſent occaſions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimbleneſſe and dexterity took out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought leaſt of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of ſoldiers; and would ſtil lay ambuſhes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heauie armed. Hereupon Pompey keeping his army alway together, practiſed at ROME that he might be ſent into SPAINE to aide Metellus, But notwithſtanding that Catulus commanded him to diſperſe his army, Pompey ſtill kept them together by colour of new deuices, and was continually about ROME in armes, vntil that by Lucius Philippus means he had obtained the gouernment of that country. They ſay, that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: How now Philip, doeſt thou then thinke it meete to ſend Pompey Proconſull (to ſay, for a Conſul) into SPAINE? No truly, ſaid Philip, not Proconſull onely, but pro Conſulibus, (to ſay, for both Conſuls) meaning that both the Conſuls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arriued in SPAINE, men began ſtraight to be caried away (as the maner is commonly where no gouernours be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter words againſt Pompey, ſaying in mockery, he would haue no other weapon but rods to whip this yong boy, if he were not afraid of this old woman, meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithſtanding theſe gallant brags, he ſtood better vpon his guard, and went ſtronger to fight then he did before, being afraid of Pompey. For Metellus was very diſſolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was giuen ouer too much to riot and pleaſure: howbeit they ſaw in him a maruellous ſodaine change, both of his honour and glorie which he vſed before, as alſo the cutting off of his ſuperfluous expence. That thing, beſides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan him alſo much more the goodwil of the people, whē they ſaw that he drew himſelf downe to a ſtraighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne diſpoſition he was a graue man and temperatly giuē for his deſires. In this war fortune changed diuerſly, as it is commonly ſeene in wars: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON.

Pompeys iourney into Spaine againſt Sertorius.

Metellus giuen to riot & pleaſure.

For he thinking to haue ſhut him in, and had giuen out ſome glorious words of the matter, wondred when he ſaw himſelfe ſtraight compaſſed in, that he could not ſtirre out of the camp where he lay, and was driuen beſides to ſee the citie burnt before his face. This notwithſtanding, afterwards at a ſet battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he ſlue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable ſouldiers, and Sertorius Lieutenants, and with them ten thouſand men. This victorie ſo encouraged Pompey, that he made haſte to fight with Sertorius alone, becauſe Metellus ſhould haue no part of the honour of the victory. So they both met by the riuer of Sucron, about ſunne ſet, both fearing Metellus comming: the one, that he might fight alone; and the other, with one alone. In fine, the victorie fel out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betweene the two Captaines, Sertorius had the greater honour: for he alone ouercame all them that ſtood before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being on foot, came and ſet vpon him; and hauing both their ſwords in their hands, they both lighted vpō their hands, but not both in one ſort: for Pompeys hand was but a little hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompeys men fell vpon him, all his owne fellowes on that ſide being fled from him: notwithſtanding, beyond all hope, he ſaued himſelfe after a ſtrange ſort, by caſting vp his horſe among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harneſſe, hauing a capariſon of great value: and in the meane time while they were buſie deuiding this bootie among them, and fighting for it he eſcaped their hands. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bands into the field, to confirme the victorie, which either of them ſuppoſed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that preſent time; wherupon Sertorius went his way, and diſperſed his armie: for his campe was eaſily broken, and ſodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would ſometime wander the fields alone, and at another time again he would haue a hundred and fifty thouſand fighting men together in the field; like a vehement ſtreame, that ſometime is dried vp, and that ſodainly againe is all of a floud. Pompey after this battel going to welcome Metellus, when they came neare one another, he commanded his ſergeants and officers to put downe their bundle of rods and axes which they caried before him, to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man then himſelfe. But Metellus would not ſuffer them, but ſhewed himſelfe equall with him in that, and in all things elſe, not reſpecting his ſenioritie, nor that he had been Conſull, and Pompey not, ſauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watchword to all the campe. Notwithſtanding, commonly they camped aſunder, for their enemy that was ſo flitting frō place to place, and was ſeene in ſo ſundry places in ſo ſhort time, compelled them to be aſunder to foreſee the worſt, drawing them ſodainly from one purpoſe to another: ſo that in fine, cutting them off from victuals euery way, ſpoyling their country, and keeping the ſea ſide, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAIN, & did compel them to go ſome other where for lacke of victuals. Pompey in the meane time hauing ſpent ỹ moſt part of his goods in this war, ſent to ROME for mony to pay his ſoldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they ſent him no mony, he would returne with his army into ITALY. Lucullus then being Conſull, though Pompeys enemie, procured they ſhould ſend him money: for he practiſed to be ſent Captaine againſt king Mithridates, and therefore was afraid to giue Pompey any occaſion to returne, who deſired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius to bend his force againſt Mithridates, whoſe ouerthrow ſhold be more honorable to him, and alſo leſſe dangerous. In the meane ſpace Sertorius died, being betrayed by thoſe whom he thought his friends, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needs counterfeit his doings, hauing the ſame meanes, the ſame furniture, and the ſame power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affaires, he layed a bait for him of ten cohorts which he ſent to prey in the fields, commanding them to diſperſe themſelues abroade as farre as they could, one from another. Perpenna ſtraight tooke the occaſion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chaſe. But Pompey tarying him at the foord, was readie for him with al his armie ſet in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victorie, and ended all this warre, becauſe the moſt of the captaines were ſlaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe of all taken priſoner, whom he preſently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as ſome do burthen him) of Perpennaes friendſhip ſhewed him in SICILIA, but rather deſerued praiſe to haue determined ſo wiſely for the benefite of the common wealth. For Perpenna hauing in his cuſtodie all Sertorius writings, he ſhewed letters of the greateſt Noblemen of ROME, which

(which were desirous of change of gouernment) willing him to returne into ITALIE. Pompey vpon sight of these letters, fearing lest they would breed greater sedition and stirre in ROME then that which was already pacified, put Perpenna to death as soone as he could, and burnt all his papers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in SPAINE a certaine time, till he had pacified all commotions and tumults marueilously out of order, he brought his armie backe againe into ITALY, and arriued there when the warre of the bondmen and fencers led by Spartacus, was in greatest furie. Vpon his comming therefore Crassus being sent Captaine against these bondmen, made haste to giue them battel, which he wan, and slue twelue thousand, three hundred of these fugitiue slaues. Notwithstanding, fortune meaning to giue Pompey some part of his honour, fiue thousand of these bondmen escaping from the battel, fell into his hands. Whereupon he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate, that Crassus had ouercome the fencers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this warre by the rootes. The ROMAINES receiuing Pompeys letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAINE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in sport, that euer gaue any man else the honour, but vnto Pompey onely. For all this great honor and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did suspect him, and were afraid of him, because he did not disperse his army, that he wold follow Syllaes steps, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereupon as many went to meet him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspition quite out of their heads, telling them that he would discharge his army after he had triumphed, then his ill willers could blame him for nothing else, but that he was more inclined vnto the people then to the nobility, and that he had a desire to restore the Tribuneship of the people which Sylla had put downe, onely to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the common people at ROME neuer longed for thing more, then they did to see the office of the Tribune set vp againe. Yea Pompey himselfe thought it the happiest turne that euer came to him, to light in such a time to do such an act. For had any other man preuented him of that, he could neuer haue found the like occasion possibly to haue requited the peoples good wils vnto him so much as in that. Now therefore this second triumph and first Consulship being decreed by the Senate, that made him nothing the greater nor better man. And yet was it a shew and signification of his greatnesse, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time dealt in matters of state, and made more estimation of himselfe then of Pompey and all the rest) neuer durst once demaund, before he had craued Pompeys good will. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had sought occasion of long time to pleasure him: and thereupon made earnest suite vnto the people for him, assuring them he would as much thanke them for making Crassus his colleague and fellow Consull, as he would for making himselfe Consull. All this notwithstanding, when they were created Consuls, they were in all things contrary one vnto another, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Consuls together. Crassus had more authority with the Senate, but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he restored them the office of the Tribune, and passed by edict, that the Knights of ROME should haue full power againe to iudge causes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleasant sight also vnto the people, when he came vnto the Censors in person, to pray that he might be dispensed with for going to the warres. For it was an auncient custome in ROME, that the Knights of ROME hauing serued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, should bring their horse into the midst of the market place before the two Censors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whom they had serued, in what iourneys and countries they had been: and hauing also deliuered account of their good behauiour and seruice, they then prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good seruice, there were they honorably rewarded: or otherwise, openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Censors, being honorably set in their tribunall or iudgement seate, taking view of all the ROMAINE Knights that mustered before them, to be seene and examined, they maruelled when they saw Pompey comming at the farther end of the market place, hauing all the markes of a Consull borne before him, and himselfe leading his horse in his hand by the bridle. When Pompey came nearer, and that they saw it was he, he commanded his sergeants that carried his axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Censors sate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and reioycing, being very silent. The Censors themselues also were

maruellous glad to ſee him ſo obedient to the law, and did him great reuerence. In fine, the elder of the Cenſors did examine him in this ſort. Pompey the Great, I pray thee tel me if thou haſt ſerued ſo long time in the warres as the law did appoint? Then anſwered Pompey aloud: Yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my ſelfe. The people hearing this anſwer, made an open ſhout for ioy, they were ſo glad to heare it: and the Cenſors themſelues came from their iudgement ſeate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his houſe, to pleaſe the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their hands with great ſignes of ioy. At the end of their Conſulſhip, when miſliking increaſed further betweene Pompey and Craſſus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time neuer ſpake in open aſſembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and told the people openly, how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commanded him to tell both the Conſuls from him, that they ſhould not leaue their charge and office before they were reconciled together. For all theſe words Pompey ſtirred not. But Craſſus firſt tooke him by the hand, and ſpake openly to him before the people: My Lords, I thinke not my ſelfe diſhonoured to giue place to Pompey, ſith you your ſelues haue thought him worthy to be called the Great, before he had any haire on his face, and vnto whom you granted the honour of two triumphs before he came to be Senator. When he had ſaid his mind, they were made friends together and ſo ſurrendred vp their office. Now for Craſſus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neare as he could, gaue ouer to pleade mens cauſes any more, and began by litle and litle to withdraw himſelf from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, coming ſeldom abroade, and when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rare thing alſo to ſee him any more come out of his houſe, or talke with a man, but he was euer accõpanied with a great number, and he reioyced to himſelfe to ſee that he had alwaies ſuch a traine after him: for that made him to be honoured the more, and gaue him greater countenance to ſee him thus courted, thinking it diſhonour to him to be familiar with meane perſons. For men that riſe by armes, are eaſily deſpiſed, when they come to liue like priuate citizens, becauſe they cannot faſhion themſelues to be companions with the common people, (who citizen-like vſe a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the citie, as they are in the field. Yea and contrarily, they that do acknowledge themſelues to be their inferiors in warres, will thinke foule ſcorne if they be not their ſuperiours in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrier among them that followed publike cauſes, (which hath triumphed for many victories and battels he hath obtained) they obſcure his glory, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they do not otherwiſe enuie any ſouldiers that are contented equally to giue them place and authoritie, as plainly appeared ſhortly after by Pompey himſelfe. By ſuch an occaſion, the power of pirates on the ſea, took beginning in the country of CILICIA, which was not reckned of at the firſt, becauſe it was not perceiued vntill they grew bold and venturous in king Mithridates wars, being hired to do him ſeruice. And afterwards the ROMAINES being troubled with ciuill wars, one fighting with another, euen at ROME gates, the ſea not being looked to all this while, it ſet them a gogge, and made them go farther then euer they did before. For they did not onely rob and ſpoyle all merchant-venturers by ſea, but rifled alſo the Ilands and townes vpon the ſea coaſt: inſomuch as then there ioyned with them men of great wealth and nobilitie, and of great wiſedome alſo, and entred into their fellowſhip, as into a commendable facultie. Now they had ſet vp arſenals or ſtore-houſes in ſundry places, they had ſundry hauens and beacons on the land, to giue warning by fire all along the ſea coaſt, and thoſe well kept and watched: moreouer, they had great fleets of ſhips ready furniſhed with excellent good galliots of ores, skilful pilots and mariners, their ſhips of ſwift ſaile, & pinnaces for diſcouery, but withal ſo gloriouſly ſet out, that men leſſe hated their exceſſe, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all gilt, the couerings of the ſame all of purple ſilke, delighting only to make a glorious ſhew of their pillage. All the ſea coaſt ouer, there was no ſight of any thing but muſicke, ſinging, banquetting, and rioting, priſes of captaines and men of great qualitie, and ranſomes of a thouſand priſoners: and all this was to the ſhame and diſhonour of the ROMAINES. Their ſhips were about a thouſand in number, and they had taken about 400. townes. They had ſpoyled and deſtroyed many holy temples that had neuer been touched before: as the temple of the Twins in the Ile of CLAROS, the temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the citie of HERMION, and the temple of Æſculapius in EPIDAVRVM: the temples of Neptune in ISTHMOS, TÆNARIA, and CALABRIA: and the temples of Apollo

They had also many strange sacrifices and certaine ceremonies of religion among themselues, in the mount Olympus, and among other, the mysterie of Mithres, which is the Sunne: and remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent parts and iniuries they did the ROMAINES vpon the sea, they went aland, and where they found any houses of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoyled and destroyed them: and on a time they took two ROMAINE Prætors, Sextilius and Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their sergeants and officers attending on them, and caryed them quite away. Another time also they stole away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honour of triumph) as she went a walking abroade in the fields, and she was redeemed for a great summe of money. But yet the greatest spite and mockery they vsed to the ROMAINES, was this, that when they had taken any of them, and that he cryed he was a citizen of ROME, and named his name: then they made as though they had been amazed, and afraid of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The poore prisoners thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled themselues as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, and put shoes on his feet: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMAINE fashion, for feare (said they) lest he should be misttaken another time. When they had plaide all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their ship ladders, and put him on it, and bad him go his way, he should haue no hurt: and if he would not go of himselfe, then they cast him ouer the boord by force, and sent him packing. These rouers and sea-pirats had all the sea Mediterraneum at commandement: insomuch there durst not a merchant looke out, nor once traffick that sea. And this was the only cause that moued the ROMAINES (fearing scarcitie of victuals, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recouer the signiory againe of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall or Generall by sea, but should haue absolute power to command all maner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge, was Gabinius, Pompeys friend. The summe of this decree gaue him full power and absolute authority of all the sea from Hercules pillars, and of the maine land, the space of foure hundred furlongs from the sea, (for the ROMAINES dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations and mighty kings. (Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the Senate fifteene Lieutenants, to giue vnto euery one of them seuerall prouinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the treasure, of the generall Receiuers of the state, to defray the charges of a fleet of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leauie what men of warre he thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he listed. This law when it had been read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceed all enuie, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to giue such absolute power vnto a priuate person. Whereupon they were all against it but Cæsar, who fauoured the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey as the people, whose fauour he sought. The noble men fel maruellously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consuls was very hote with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steps, but peraduenture he would come short of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stood vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuie, to speake many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduised the people to spare him, and not to venture in such dangerous warres (one after another) a man of so great account, as they ought to make of him. If ye chance to lose him, said he, whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: Your selfe. Then perceiuing that he lost his labour, seeking to turne the people from their determination, he left it there, and said no more. Roscius rose next after him to speake, but he could haue no audience. When he saw that he could not be heard, he made a signe with his fingers, that they should not giue Pompey alone this authoritie, but ioyne another with him. The people being offended withall made such an outcrie vpon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that instant, was stricken blind and fel downe amongst the people. Whereby it appeareth that fowle falling out of the aire to the ground, do not fall for that the aire is broken or pierced with any force or furie: but because the very breath of the voice (when it cometh with ſuch a violence, as it maketh a very tempeſt in the aire) doth ſtrike & ouercome them, Thus for that day, the aſſembly brake vp, & nothing paſt: and at the day appointed when this decree ſhould paſſe by voices of the people, Pompey went abroade into the country. There being aduertiſed that the decree was paſt for the confirmatiõ of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie, becauſe he would auoid the enuie they would haue borne him to haue ſeene them run out of all parts of the citie vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroade, and ſacrificed to the gods: and audience being giuen him at an open aſſembly, he handled the matter ſo, that they gaue him many things beſides to enlarge his power, almoſt doubling the preparation ſet downe and appointed at the firſt decree. For he ordained that the common wealth ſhould arme him fiue hundred ſhips, and they leauied for him ſixe ſcore thouſand footmen, and fiue thouſand horſemen, and choſe beſides foure and twentie Senators, which had euery one of them been Generals of armies, and two general Treaſurers alſo. While things were thus a preparing, the price of victuals fell by chance, which reioyced the people ſo much, that they ſtucke not to ſay, that the name of Pompey onely had already ended this warre. This notwithſtanding, he deuided all the ſea betweene the lands into thirteene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his ſhips, and moreouer one of his Lieutenants ouer them. Thus hauing diſperſed his power all abroade, he brought all the pirates ſhips that were in a fleete together, within his danger: and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that had diſperſed themſelues betimes, or that otherwiſe could ſcape his generall chaſe, they fled all into CILICIA, as Bees into the beehiue, againſt whom he would needs go himſelfe in perſon with threeſcore of his beſt ſhips. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had ſcoured all the THVSCANE ſea, the coaſts of LYBIA, SARDINIA, SICILE, and of CORSICA, of al thoſe theeues which were wont to keep therabouts, and this he did within fortie dayes ſpace, taking infinite paines, both himſelfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Conſuls called Piſo, did all the beſt he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had diſcharged his ore-men, for that he enuied Pompeys proſperitie: Pompey ſent his ſhips before to make towards ITALY to arriue at the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. He in the meane time went through THVSCANE to ROME, where, ſo ſoone as his coming was knowne, all the people ranne out to meete him, as if he had been abſent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to ſee him, was the ſodaine change of victuals vnlooked for, that daily came to the towne out of all parts. But Piſo went neare to be depriued of his Conſulſhip: for Gabinius had the decree written, and ready to preſent to the people. But Pompey would not ſuffer it. So, hauing gently brought all to paſſe as he deſired, he went vnto the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, and there tooke ſea, and hoiſed ſaile. Now though his haſtie voyage, and ſhortneſſe of time made him paſſe by many good cities without coming into them: notwithſtanding, he would not ſo paſſe by the citie of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had ſacrificed to the gods, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the citie, he read two writings that were made in his praiſe, the one within the gate which ſaid thus:

Pompeys preparatiõ againſt the pirates.

The courteſie of Pompey vnto Piſo.

The humblier that thou doeſt thy ſelfe as man behaue,
The more thou doeſt deſerue the name of god to haue:

And the other writing was without the gate, which ſaid,

We wiſht for thee, we waite for thee,
We worſhip thee, we waite on thee.

Now becauſe Pompey hauing taken certaine of theſe rouers by ſea that kept together, did vſe them gently when they required pardon, and hauing their ſhippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercie, fled from his other Captaines and Lieutenants, and went and yeelded themſelues, their wiues and children into his hands. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of themſelues, and by that meanes he came to haue knowledge of the reſt, and to follow them where they went, whom he tooke in the end: but knowing that they deſerued no pardon, they hid themſelues. Yet the moſt part and the richeſt of them, had conueied their wiues, children and goods, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into ſtrong caſtles and litle townes vpon mount Taurus: and ſuch men as were able to carrie weapon, imbarked, and lay before a citie of CORACESIVM, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell firſt by ſea, and there were ouercome, and afterwards they were beſieged by land. Howbeit ſhortly after, they prayed they might be receiued to mercie,

and thereupon yeelded their bodies, townes, and Ilands, which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worse to haue approched. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirats in lesse then three moneths driuen from the sea whereſoeuer they were. He wan also a great number of other ships, besides foureſcore and ten gallies armed with copper spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number aboue twenty thousand persons) he did not only consider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise part on the other side to let them go at libertie, to gather force againe, being so great a number of them as indeed they were, and all poore men and souldiers. Therfore weying with himselfe that man by nature is not borne a wild or sauage beast, but contrarily becometh a brute beast changing nature, when he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and ciuill in time, changing place and maner of life: (as the brute beasts that being wild by nature do also become gentle and tractable, with gentler vsage by continuance) he determined to draw these pirates from the sea into the vpland, and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine small townes of the CILICIANS, that were scant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giuing them land to keepe them with. The city of the SOLIANS also, that not long before had been destroyed by Tigranes the king of ARMENIA, being desirous to repleniſh that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed diuers also in the city of DYMA in the country of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great store of very good land. Now therfore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest friends misliked him. For Metellus that gentle perſō (a cousin to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made wars in SPAINE with him against Sertorius) was sent Prætor into CRETA, before Pompey was chosen Generall against the pirates. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was euen a second den of pirats. Metellus finding there a great number of these theeues, tooke many of them and put them to death, euen all that came to his hands. Then, such as had scaped frō him, being straightly besieged, sent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercy: declaring vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, because al parts of that region from the sea came iust within the compasse limited him on the land. Pompey pardoning them vpon their submission, wrote vnto Metellus, and commanded him to leaue off his war, and therwithall charged all the cities, that they should not obey Metellus commandements. After that he sent Lucius Oćtauius one of his Lieutenants, who entred into the townes Metellus besieged, and fought for the pirats. This made Pompey not only hated and enuied, but derided also: for that vnder his name he had protected such vile theeues, that had neither god nor law, and giuen them his authoritie to saue their liues, for a little enuie & emulation he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles, and say that he shewed not the part of a wise man, but of a yong foole besides himselfe, for desire of glory making a signe to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to strike at Hector, to the end that as Homer said:

Left he too late should to the battell runne,
When others had the honour of it wonne.

But Pompeys fact was worse then this: for hee fought for the common enemies of the world, and onely to depriue a ROMAINE Prætor of triumph, who had done great good seruice to haue destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not off his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by assault, he put them to death: and afterwards hauing done Oćtauius open shame through his campe, he let him go. When newes came to ROME, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, and that Pompey hauing no other seruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp and downe, one Manlius a Tribune of the people, put forth another decree vnto them of this effect: That Pompey taking all the armie Lucullus had, and the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with all BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept, should go make warre vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands notwithstanding all his iurisdiction and armie by sea, in as royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMAINE Empire. For by this second decree, he had all these countries, not named in his former commission, added to amplifie his authoritie, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome those two mighty kings. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriuing him of the honour of his doings, to giue it to another, that ſhould rather ſucceed him in honour of triumph, then in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifeſt iniury, and ſhewed themſelues too vnthankfull: but that which moſt grieued them, was to ſee Pompeys power eſtabliſhed in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore one of them perſwaded and encouraged another, ſtoutly to withſtand this edict, and not to ſuffer their liberty to be loſt in this ſort. Notwithſtanding, when the day came that this decree ſhould paſſe, they were ſo afraid to anger the people, that their hearts failed them, and none durſt ſpeake againſt it but Catulus only, that earneſtly inueyed againſt the paſſing of it a long time together, & greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they ſhould looke to ſeeke out ſome mountaine or high rocke to retire ſafely vnto, to defend their liberty, as their anceſtors had done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree paſſed by the voyces of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his abſence made Lord almoſt of al that, which Sylla by force of armes, and with great effuſion of bloud (hauing made himſelfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power. When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertiſing him what the people had paſt in that behalfe, ſome ſay that at the receit of them (in the preſence of his familiar friends that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruellouſly to haue ſuch great offices and charge laid vpon him, one in the necke of another, and burſt forth in theſe words: O gods, ſhall I neuer ſee an end of ſuch a world of troubles as I haue! Had it not been better for me to haue beene a meane man borne and vnknowne, then thus continually to be in warre with armour on my backe? What, ſhall I neuer ſee the time, that breaking the neckes of ſpite and enuie againſt me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my countrey with my wife and children? When Pompey ſpake thoſe words, his familiar friends could not abide to ſee his deepe diſſimulation, knowing that beſides his naturall ambition, and couetous deſire to rule, he was glad in his heart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deeds forthwith bewrayed. For he preſently ſent out precepts into euery quarter, commanding all ſorts of ſouldiers to come to him immediatly, and made all the Princes and kings within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the countries, altered and changed all that Lucullus had eſtabliſhed before. Furthermore, he did releaſe the penalties enioyned them, and took from them alſo the gifts that Lucullus beſtowed on them. In fine, this was all his purpoſe and deſire: to make them that honoured Lucullus know, that he had no further power and authority to do any thing. Lucullus finding himſelfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either ſide thought good they ſhould meet and talke together: which came ſo to paſſe, for they met in the countrey of GALATIA. And becauſe they both were Captaines of the ROMAIN armies, & had done many famous acts, they had their ſergeants & officers that caried the bũdels of rods before them, wreathed all about with Lawrell boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a cloſe and woodie countrey, all couered with greene trees; and Pompey on the other ſide had paſſed through a great ſandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Therupon Lucullus ſergeants ſeeing the laurell boughs drie and withered away, which Pompeys ſergeants caried, they gaue them of their green & freſh boughs to beautifie the rods and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In truth Lucullus had been Conſul before Pompey, and ſo was he alſo older man then he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, becauſe he had triũphed twiſe. At their firſt meeting, their entertainment and diſcourſe was with great ceremonie and courteſie as might be, one highly praiſing the others deeds, reioycing at each others good ſucceſſe: but at parting they fel to hot words together, Pompey vpbraiding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, ſo that their friends had much ado to part them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the lands in GALATIA, which he had conquered, & beſtowed thẽ & other gifts on ſuch as he thought good. Pompey on the other ſide camping hard by him, ſpecially commanded the people in euery part to obey him in nothing that he did: and beſides he took all his ſouldiers from him, leauing him onely fixteene hundred; which he ſuppoſed were ſuch, as for diſdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but ſmal ſeruice. Furthermore, to blemiſh the glory of his doings, he told euery body Lucullus had fought with the pompe and ſhadow onely of theſe two kings, and that he had left him to fight with al their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with ſhields, ſwords, and horſes. Lucullus for reuenge on the other ſide ſaid, that Pompey went to fight but with a ſhadow of war, like a cowardly buzzard that preieth vpon dead bodies, which others haue haue ſlaine: and to cut aſunder the remaine of this war ended by another, as he had done before, attributing the honor of the ouerthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus and Spartacus, to himſelf, where indeed Metellus Craſſus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therefore it was no maruell, that he ſought the glory and honor to triumph for the kingdoms of PONTVS & ARMENIA: ſith that thorough his ſubtile practiſes he had obtained triumph for a few ſlaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being now gone his way, Pompey ſent good garriſons vnto all the coaſts vpon the ſea, from the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the Realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iourney by land towards Mithridates, who had in his camp thirty thouſand footmen, and two thouſand horſemen, and yet durſt not offer battell, but camped firſt vpon a mountaine of great ſtrength, and hard to get vp on: notwithſtanding ſhortly after, he forſooke it for lack of water. He was no ſooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it: who, coniecturing by the nature of the plants and trees in that place which were very greene, and alſo by diuers holes he found, that by reaſon therabouts ſhould be ſome ſprings, he commanded them to digge Wels in euery corner; ſo that in a very ſhort time all his camp had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not find that out in all the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped round about Mithridates, & intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the ſiege fiue and fortie daies, fled away with all the choiſe of his army, vnknowing vnto Pompey, hauing firſt ſlaine all the ſicke and impotent perſons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him another time by the riuer of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would paſſe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raiſed his campe againe, and marched away at midnight. About that time, they ſay, that Mithridates ſaw that in a dreame which did prognoſticate what would happen. He thought, that hauing the wind in the poope of the ſhip, he was vnder ſaile in the middeſt of the ſea of Mare Boſphorum, and that he was marueilous glad of it, and reioyced with them that ſailed with him, thinking himſelfe certainly paſt all danger: yet ſodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the ſea, vpon a litle peece of the ſhip that was broken, truſting to the mercie of the winds. As he was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him & told him, that Pompey was come ſo neare, that there was no ſhift, but they muſt needs fight to defend their campe. Thereupon his Captaines ſtraight began to put his men in battell ray ready to fight. Pompey vnderſtanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venture his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compaſſe them in to keepe them from flying, and then in the morning to ſet vpon them more eaſily, his men being the better ſouldiers. But Pompeys old captains were ſo earneſtly in hand with him to perſwade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they ſhould giue charge. Now it was not ſo darke but they could ſomewhat ſee, for the Moone that was very low and vpon her ſetting, gaue light inough to diſcerne the body of a man: yet becauſe the Moone was very low, the ſhadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almoſt euen to their very enemies, which did let them that they could not certainly iudge what ſpace of ground was betweene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they caſt their darts at the ROMAINES, but they hurt neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, ran vpon them with great cries. But the barbarous people durſt not abide their charge they were ſo afraid, but turned their backs, & ran away for life, ſo that they were ſlaine downe right. Thus were there ten thouſand of the barbarous people ſlain and more, and their campe alſo taken. As for Mithridates himſelfe, at the beginning of the onſet, he made a lane through the ROMAINES with eight hundred horſemen, and paſſed cleane through them. But incontinently his men diſperſed vpon it, ſome one way, ſome another way, ſo that he was left alone but with three perſons only, whereof Hypſicratea was one of the number, which had euer been valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cauſe Mithridates called her Hypſicrates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted alſo on a horſe after the PERSIAN maner, was neuer weary with any long iourney the king made, nor neuer left to waite vpon his perſon, and to look to his horſe, vntil ſuch time as the king came to a ſtrong caſtle called Inora, where was great ſtore of gold & ſiluer, and the kings chiefeſt treaſure. Then Mithridates took of his richeſt apparel he had there, and gaue it amongſt them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poiſon beſides to euery one of his friends to cary about them, becauſe they ſhould not (vnleſſe they would themſelues) fal into their enemies hands aliue. From thence he thought to take his iourney into ARMENIA vnto king Tigranes

Howbeit Tigranes ſent to let him, & further proclaimed by trumpet, that he would giue a hundred talents to him that could kill him. Thereupon, paſſing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates, he fled through the countrey of COLCHIDE. In the meane time, Pompey inuaded the countrey of ARMENIA, at the requeſt of Tigranes the yonger, who was reuolted againſt his father, and went to meet with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almoſt about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the eaſt, and falleth into Mare Caſpium. So they both together marched on further into the country, receiuing ſuch townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had been conſumed and deſtroyed by Lucullus) vnderſtanding that Pompey was of a mild & gentle nature, he receiued his garriſons into his ſtrongeſt forts and royall houſes, and went himſelfe with his friends and kinſmen to meet Pompey, and to yeeld himſelfe vnto him. When he came hard to his camp, being a horſe-back, there came out two ſergeants of Pompeys & commanded him to light and go in a foot, for there was neuer man ſeene a horſe-back within the ROMAINS campe. Tigranes did not onely obey them, but further plucked off his ſword and gaue it them: and in fine, when he came almoſt to Pompey, taking off his royall hat from his head, he would haue laid it at Pompeys feete, and falling downe moſt ſhamefully on the ground, imbaſed himſelfe to embrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himſelf preuented him, and taking him by the hand, made him to ſit downe by him on the one ſide of him, and his ſonne on the other. Then he ſaid vnto them both: as for the other loſſes you haue ſuſtained hertofore, you muſt thank Lucullus for them, who hath taken frō you SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my coming, I will let you enioy it, paying to the ROMAINS a fine of ſixe thouſand talents for the iniurie you had done them, prouided alſo, that your ſon haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the conditions of peace. The ROMAINES then ſaluted him king. He was ſo glad thereof, that he promiſed to giue euery ſouldier halfe a Mina, euery Centener ten Minas, & to euery Colonell of a thouſand men a talent. His ſonne was very angry withall: inſomuch as Pompey ſending for him to come to ſupper to him, he anſwered againe, that was not the friendſhip he looked for at Pompeys hands, for he ſhould find many other ROMAINES that would offer him that curteſie. Pompey for his anſwer, clapped him vp as a priſoner, and kept him to be led in triumph at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA ſent Ambaſſadors to Pompey to demand this yong Prince, that was his ſonne in law, and to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates muſt be the vttermoſt confines of his conqueſts. Pompey anſwered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his ſonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would do it with iuſtice. So, leauing Afranius in ARMENIA, to keepe the country, Pompey paſſed by other nations which inhabite about mount Caucaſus, hauing Mithridates in chaſe: of which nations, two of the chiefeſt and of greateſt power, are the ALBANIANS and IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do ſtretch out vnto mount Moſchium, and to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANS lie towards the Eaſt, and Mare Caſpium. Theſe men firſt ſuffered Pompey to paſſe through their countrey, vpon his ſending to them. But winter hauing ſtolen vpon the ROMAINES while they were there, and they buſily occupied about Saturnes feaſts: the barbarous people hauing leauied aboue fortie thouſand fighting men in one camp together, came and paſſed ouer the riuer of Cyrnus. (This riuer cometh from the mountaines of the IBERIANS, and receiuing the riuer of Araxes into it, which paſſeth through ARMENIA, diſperſed it ſelfe into twelue ſeuerall mouths, and ſo falleth into Mare Caſpium. Some notwithſtanding hold opinion, that Cyrnus receiued not the riuer of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it ſelfe, and falleth into the ſame ſea, neare vnto the mouths of the other.) Pompey might if he would, haue kept them from comming ouer the riuer, yet did he ſuffer them quietly to paſſe ouer. When they were all ouer, he went againſt them, ouercame them in battell, and ſlue a great number of them in the field. Afterwards he pardoned their king, ſubmitting himſelf vnto Pompey by his Ambaſſadors, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went againſt the IBERIANS, who were no leſſe in number then the ALBANIANS were at the firſt, and alſo better ſoldiers, and were reſolutely bent to do good ſeruice vnto Mithridates, and to driue out Pompey. Theſe IBERIANS were neuer ſubiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and ſcaped alſo frō being ſubiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander neuer ſtaid in the coūtry of HYRCANIA: whom alſo Pompey ouercame in a great and bloudy battell, hauing ſlaine 9. thouſand in the field, and taken ten thouſand priſoners. Frō hence he went into the country of COLCHIDE. There Seruilius met him by the riuer of Phaſis, with the fleete of ſhips with the which he

he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himselfe amongst a people that were neighbours vnto the straights of BOSPHORVS, and the marishes Mæotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Therupon he passed againe ouer the riuer of Cyrnus, with great paine and danger, because the barbarous people had made a strong defence a great way along the riuer side, with a maruellous number of great trees, feld and layed acrosse one ouer another. Furthermore, when he had with great difficultie passed through them, he fell into an ill fauoured countrey, where he should trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he caused ten thousand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and so went forward to meete with his enemies whom he found by the riuer of Abas, being fixe score thousand footmen, and twelue thousand horsemen, but all (or the most of them) ill armed with wilde beasts skinnes. Their Chieftaine was Cosis the kings owne brother. He, when the battell was begun, flew vpon Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on the other side, ranne him through with his lance on both sides, and slue him starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battell, which fought on the barbarous peoples side, coming from the mountaines that runne along the riuer of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrow giuen, the ROMAINES spoyling the dead, found targets and buskins of the AMAZONES, but not a bodie of a woman among them. They also do inhabite on the side of the mountaine Caucasus that looketh towards Mare Hyrcanium, and doe not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELE and the LELEGES are betweene them, with whom they companie two moneths onely euery yeare, meeting together by the riuer of Thermodon; all the rest of the yeare they liue apart by themselues. After this battell, Pompey going to inuade the countrey of HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venimous serpents which he met with, being come within three dayes iourney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there receiued presents which were sent vnto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, & wrote very curteously vnto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with part of his army against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the countrey of GORDINEA, and harried and spoyled the king Tigranes subiects. Notwithstanding he draue him out, and followed him vnto ARBELITIDE. Furthermore, all the lemmans and concubines of King Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but sent them all home againe to their parents and friends, because the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of Noblemen, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans had most credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left the charge of his castle, where the greatest part of his treasure of gold and siluer lay, was a singers daughter, who (as they said) was not rich, but an old man. She hauing sung one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in such fancy with her, that he would needs haue her lie with him the same night, and the old man her father went home offended, because the king would not so much as giue him one gentle word. But the next morning when he arose, he maruelled to see the tables in his house ful of plate of gold and siluer, and a great companie of seruingmen, groomes of chamber and pages, and that they had brought him maruellous rich apparel, & a horse ready at the gates brauely furnished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroad into the city: he thought it was done in mockery, to haue made sport with him, and therfore would haue run his way, had not the seruingmen kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mãs goods that died of late, which the king had bestowed on him and that all this he saw, was but a litle portion in respect of the other goods & lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, at the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got vpon horsbacke, & riding through the streets, cried, Al this is mine, al this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told them: Masters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so mad for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this castle into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich presents, but he would take none of them, other then such as serued to adorne the temples of the gods, and to beautifie his triumph, and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the King of the IBERIANS, hauing sent him a bed-steed, a table, & a chaire of cleane gold, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treasurers custodie, to be accountable for it vnto the Senate. In another castle called Cœnon, he found certaine secret letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruellously to reade, because thereby he plainly vnderstood the kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poisoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne sonne, and Alcæus the SARDINIAN, because he had wonne the bell, at the horse-race before him. There was also interpreting of dreames, that either himselfe or his wiues had dreamed, and also loue-letters betwixt Monime and him. Theophanes writeth also, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he inticed and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMAINES to death that were in ASIA. Howbeit in reason men thinke that this was a shamefull lie, maliciously deuised by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, because he was but a counterfet to him: or paraduenture to gratifie Pompey, whose father Rutilius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence Pompey departed towards the citie of AMISVS. There his ambition brought him to commit such facts, as he himselfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemie being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to establish lawes, to giue gifts, and distribute such honors, as Captaines that had obtained victory were wont to do, when they had ended all warre and trouble. For he himselfe (Mithridates being yet the stronger in the realme of BOSPHORVS, and hauing a great puissant armie about him) did all that which he reproued another for, appointing prouinces, and giuing out gifts to euery man according as he deserued: to gratifie twelue barbarous kings, with diuers other Princes, Lords and Captaines that came to him thither. Writing also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to giue him that title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great desire to winne SYRIA, and to go through the countrey of ARABIA, euen vnto the red sea, because he might enlarge his conquests and victories euery way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole earth. For in LYBIA, he was the first ROMAINE that conquered all to the great sea. On the other side, in SPAINE he enlarged the Empire of ROME, and brought the confines thereof vnto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chase, he came almost vnto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put himselfe in iourney, intending his circuit vnto the red sea, specially because he saw Mithridates so ill to follow, and worse to ouercome by force when he fled, then when he fought any battell: and that made him say, that he would leaue a sharper enemie behind him then himselfe; and that he meant famine. For he appointed souldiers with sufficient number of ships, to lie in waite for the merchants that sailed to the countrey of BOSPHORVS, to cary them any victuals or other merchandizes, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best part of his armie, and in his way, found the bodies of the dead ROMAINES which Mithridates had ouerthrowne vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet vnburied. So he caused them all to be taken vp, and honorably buried. Lucullus hauing forgotten, or otherwise neglected to do it, in my conscience that was the chiefest cause why his men did hate him. Pompey now hauing by Afranius subdued the ARABIANS dwelling about mount Amanus, went himselfe in person into SYRIA, and made a gouernment & prouince of it, being wonne to the ROMAINE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king: and conquered all IVRIE also, where he tooke king Aristobulus, and builded certaine cities there, and deliuered others also from bondage, which by tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chastised well inough. Howbeit he spent the most part of his time there, deciding of controuersies, pacifying of contentions and quarels by arbiterment, which fell out betwixt the free cities, princes and kings, and sent of his friends into those places where he could not come himselfe. For on a time when he was chosen arbitrator betwixt the PARTHIANS and the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a country which both parties claimed, he sent three Commissioners thither to iudge definitiuely betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame and renowne were great, no lesse was his vertue, iustice and liberality, which indeed did hide many faults, his freinds and familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did vse them so well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter, that he made them contented patiently to beare their couetousnesse and straight dealing. One of his chiefest familiars about him whom he loued best, was called Demetrius, a bondmã infranchised, who otherwise was very discreet in his doings, but being somewhat too bold of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a yong man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble mind, in Pompeys vertues. The power and insolencie of Demetrius, Pompeys infranchised bondman.

Pompeys abſence went to ſee the city of ANTIOCH. Now for himſelfe, his maner was alwaies to go on foot, and all his friends beſides that did accompany him to honor him, were on horſback. He perceiuing afarre off, a great ſort of people comming towards him all in white, and of one ſide of the ſtreet litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the firſt he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his ſake to honour him, that they made this proceſſion, which he in no wiſe would haue had done. Thereupon he commanded his friends to light from their horſes, and go on foot with him. But when they came neare to the gate of the citie, the maiſter of the ceremonies that led this proceſſion, hauing a garland on his head, and a rod in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes friends laughed to heare this queſtion: then ſaid Cato, Alas poore citie: and ſo paſſed by it. Notwithſtanding, Pompey himſelfe was cauſe that Demetrius had the leſſe ill will borne him, then otherwiſe he ſhould haue had: becauſe they ſaw how boldly he would vſe Pompey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden ſome to dinner or ſupper; while he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would tarie till they were all come: Demetrius would be ſet at the boord, and preſumptuouſly haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of his iourney, he had already purchaſed the goodlieſt houſes of pleaſure, and faireſt walkes that were about ROME, and had ſumptuous gardens alſo, the which the people commonly called, Demetrius gardens: though his maiſter Pompey was but meanely houſed till his third Conſulſhip. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous ſtately Theater, called Pompeys Theater; and ioyned vnto that alſo another houſe, as a penthouſe to his Theater, far more ſumptuous and ſtately then the firſt, and yet no more then needed. Inſomuch as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he maruelled, and asked whereabouts it was that Pompey dined and ſupped. Theſe things are reported thus. Now the king of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the caſtle called Petra, hauing neuer vntill that time made any account of the ROMAINES armie, was then greatly afraid of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to do what he would command him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he meant as he ſpake, brought his army before this caſtle of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, becauſe they iudged it was an occaſion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, againſt whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an ancient enemie to ROME and that began to gather ſtrength againe, and prepared (as they hard ſay) to leade a great armie through SCYTHIA and PANNONIA into ITALIE. But Pompey thinking he ſhould ſooner miniſh his power by ſuffering him to go on with warres, then that he ſhould otherwiſe be able to take him flying: would not toile to follow him in vaine. And for theſe cauſes he would needs make warres in other places, and linger time ſo long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the caſtle of Petra, and had lodged his campe for that day: as he was riding and managing his horſe vp and downe the campe, poſts came flinging to him from the realme of PONTVS, and brought him good newes, as was eaſily to be diſcerned a farre off by the heads of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with lawrell boughs. The ſouldiers perceiuing that, flocked ſtraight about him: but Pompey would make an end of his riding firſt, before he read theſe letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his horſe, and returned into his campe, where there was no ſtone high enough for him to ſtand vpon to ſpeake vnto them; and againe, the ſouldiers would not tarie the making of one after the maner of their camp, which men of war do make themſelues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them vpon another: but for haſte and earneſt deſire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they laied together a heape of ſaddles one vpon another, and Pompey getting vp on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himſelfe with his owne hands, becauſe his ſonne Pharnaces did rebell againſt him, and had wonne all that which his father poſſeſſed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for himſelfe and the ROMAINES. Vpon theſe newes, all the campe, ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did ſacrifice to the gods, giuing them thankes and were as merie, as if in Mithridates perſon alone, there had died an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occaſion, hauing brought this warre more eaſily to paſſe then he hoped for, departed preſently out of ARABIA; and hauing ſpeedily in few dayes paſſed through the countries lying by the way, he came at length to the citie of AMISVS. There he found great preſents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kings bloud, and amongst the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, because they that had the carying of his bodie had forgotten to drie vp the braine: neuertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine scarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to auoide enuie, sent him away vnto the citie of SINOPE. He wondered much at the maruellous sumptuous rich apparell and weapons that he wore. The scabbard of his sword (which cost foure hundred talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a hat of Mithridates, of wonderfull workemanship, being begged of Caius his foster brother was secretly giuen to Fanstus the son of Sylla, without Pompeys priuity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey hauing ordered all things, and established that prouince, went on his iourney homewards with greater pomp & glorie. So comming vnto MITYLENE, he released the citie of all taxes and payments for Theophanes sake, and was present at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their works contending one with another, hauing at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompeys acts & gests. Pompey liked exceeding wel of the Theater where these plaies were made, and drew a modell or platforme of it, to make a statelier then that in ROME. As he passed by the citie of RHODES, he would needs heare al the Rhetoritians dispute, & gaue euery one of them a talent. Posidonius had written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetoritian, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey selfe did giue them, touching the generall question. Pompey did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philosophers there. For he gaue towards the redifying of the city againe, fiftie talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALY, to haue bin very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home to see his wife & children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge giuen him to mingle fortunes prosperity with some bitter sop of aduersity, laid a block in his way at home in his own house, to make his returne more sorowful. For Mutia his wife had in his absence played false at tables. But Pompey being then farre off, made no account of the reports nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare vnto ITALIE, and that he was more attentiue to giue eare to the ill reports he heard, then he sent vnto her to tell her, that he refused her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Notwithstanding, in Ciceroes Epistles, the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ranne abroad in ROME, which troubled them sore, being giuen out that he would bring his army straight to ROME, and make himselfe absolute Lord of al the ROMAINE Empire. Crassus therupon, either for that he beleeued it indeed to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accusation true, and the enuie towards Pompey the greater, conueyed himself, his family & goods sodainly out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALIE, called all his souldiers together, and after he had made an oratiõ vnto them, as time and occasion required, he commanded them to seuer themselues, and euery man to repaire home to apply his businesse, remembring to meet at ROME together at the day of his triumph. His army being thus dispersed, and straight reported abroad for newes, a maruellous thing hapened vnto him. The cities seeing Pompey the Great without souldiers, hauing but a small traine about him of his familiar friends only, went al of them to meet him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquests, but from some iourney taken for his pleasure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: so that if he had beene disposed to haue made any innouation in the common wealth, he had not needed his army. In those dayes there was a law, that no man should enter into ROME before his triumph: wherupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to defer the chusing of Consuls for a few daies, because he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yeare. They denied him his request, by Catoes means that hindred it. Pompey maruelling to heare of his boldnes and plaine speech, which he only vsed of all other to defend his iust causes, had a maruellous desire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato hauing 2. neeces, Pompey desired to mary the one himself, & the other for his son. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompey, that it was a colour onely to win and corrupt him, denied him flatly. His wife & sister on the other side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliance with Pompey the great. About that time it chanced, that Pompey being very desirous to prefer Afranius to be Consul, he caused certain mony to be giuen among the tribes of the people, & the same was deliuered out to some, euen in his owne gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city, euery man spake ill of Pompey: that he put the Consulship to sale for mony vnto those that could not deserue it by vertue, sith himselfe onely had obtained it by purchase of many a noble and worthy deed. Then said Cato to his wife and sister: Loe now, we had been partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equitie and his honour. But now to his triumph. For the statelinesse and magnificence therof, although he had two dayes space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the shew, that were not seene, which would haue serued to haue set out another triumph. First there were tables caried, whereon were written the names and titles of all the people and nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow: The kingdome of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA and PALÆSTINE, IVDÆA, and ARABIA: and all the pyrates which he had ouercome both by sea and by land, in all parts of the world. In all these countries he tooke about a thousand castles, few lesse then nine hundred townes and cities: of pyrates ships eight hundred; and nine and thirty desolate townes left without inhabitants, replenished againe with people by him. Moreouer, these tables declared, that the reuenue of the common-wealth of ROME before these conquests he made, amounted yearely but to fiue thousand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the summes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they should now receiue eight thousand and fiue hundred Miriades: and that he brought presently in readie gold and siluer, and in plate and iewels, to put into the common treasurie, the value of twenty thousand talents, besides that which had been distributed alreadie among the souldiers: of the which, he that had least for his share, had 15 hundred Drachmaes. The prisoners that were led in the shew of this triumph, besides the Captains of the pyrats, were these that follow: The sonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife and daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime: Aristobulus king of IVRY: Mithridates sister, with fiue sonnes of hers, and some Ladies of SCYTHIA. The hostages also of the IBERIANS and the ALBANIANS and also of the kings of the COMMAGENIANS: ouer and besides a great number of other markes of triumphs which himselfe or his Lieutenant had wonne at sundry battels in diuers places. But the greatest honor that euer he wan, and which neuer other Consul of the ROMAINES but himselfe obtained, was this, that he made his third triumph of the three parts of the world. Diuers other ROMAINES had triumphed thrise before him: howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICKE: the second time of EVROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by these three triumphs, that he had triumphed in maner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time (as it is reported by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the Great) vnder 34 yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare forty. O happy had it bin for him, if he had died when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwards, made his prosperity hatefull, or his aduersity miserable: imploying the honor and authority he had gotten by his valiantnesse, fauoring mens vniust causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honor, & vnawares brought his greatnesse to nothing. For like as when the strongest places of a citie, which receiuing their enemies into them, do giue them the benefite of their owne strength: euen so through Pompeys power, Cæsar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he imploied to the ouerthrow of others. And thus it fortuned: Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had vncurteously vsed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to ROME. For the Senate did counsell and encourage him to deale in the affaires of the state, seeing him waxe very slow, and giuen to much to his ease & pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gotten. So when Pompey was come, he began to speak against him; and through the friendship and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and reiected. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendship with light yong men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent and vilest person was Clodius, who receiued him, and made him a prey vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, and against his honour caried him vp and down the market place after him, to speake as occasion serued, to confirme any matter or deuice which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his goodwill, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he would forsake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of commonwealth. Pompey granted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in danger of law, and requiring Pompeys friendſhip to helpe him, he ſhut his doore againſt them that came to ſpeake in his behalfe, and went out himſelfe at another backe doore. Cicero therupon fearing the extremity of law, willingly forſooke ROME. At that time, Iulius Cæſar returning home from his Prætorſhip out of SPAINE, began to lay ſuch a plot, that preſently brought him into great fauour, and afterwards much increaſed his power, but otherwiſe vtterly vndid Pompey and the common wealth. Now he was to ſue for his firſt Conſulſhip, and conſidering the emnitie betwixt Pompey and Craſſus, if he ioyned with the one, he made the other his enemie: he deuiſed to make them friends, a thing ſeeming of great honeſty at the firſt ſight, but yet a peſtilent deuice, and as ſubtill a practiſe as could be. For the power of the citie being before deuided into two parts, (as a ſhip euenly ballaſt of each ſide) maintained the commonwealth vpright; and being now brought into one mans power, there was no poſſibilitie to withſtand it, ſo that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon Cato wiſely told them afterwards, that ſaid, the ciuill warres betwixt Pompey and Cæſar was cauſe of the deſtruction of the commonwealth: that their emnitie and diſcord was not the chiefe originall cauſe of this miſerie, but rather their friendſhip and agreement. For by their friendſhip Cæſar was choſen Conſull, who ſtraight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for the reſtoring of the colonies belonging to ROME and for diſtributing of lands to them that had none, imbaſing the maieſtie and dignity of the chiefe Magiſtrates, and making the Conſulſhip in maner no better then the Tribuneſhip of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellow Conſull, did what he could to reſiſt him, and Cato alſo did aide him to his power, vntil Cæſar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did giue his conſent to the decrees which he did ſet forth. Pompey anſwered him, he did. Why then, ſaid Cæſar, if any man will by force let the paſſing of this law by voices of the people, wilt thou then come to helpe them? Yes that I will indeed, ſaid Pompey: againſt them that threaten with the ſword, I will bring both ſword and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor ſpake thing that men more miſliked, then that which he ſaid at that time. His friends excuſed him, and ſaid it was a word paſſed his mouth before he was aware: but his deeds afterwards ſhewed, that he was altogether at Cæſars commandement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cæſar, which was affianced or made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpioes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whom he had alſo promiſed before vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla: and Cæſar alſo maried Calphurnia the daughter of Piſo. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with ſoldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Conſul Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they ſodainly ſet vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him: and ſome one, what ſoeuer he was, caſt a basket of horſe-dung vpon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were alſo very ſore hurt. By this meanes hauing cleared the market place of all their enemies, they paſſed the law for diuiſion of lands, as they wold themſelues. The people being fleſhed with this bait, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and wold neuer ſtick at any matter that they would haue paſſed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was againſt: and they appointed vnto Cæſar alſo, the gouernmẽt of the GAVLES on this ſide and beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for fiue yeares ſpace, with foure whole legions. The next day following were appointed Conſuls, Piſo Cæſars father in law, and Gabinius the greateſt flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things ſtood in theſe termes, Bibulus though he were Conſull, kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe for 8. moneths ſpace, and only ſent out bils, and ſet them vp on euery poſt in open places, accuſing Pompey and Cæſar. Cato on the other ſide, as if he had been inſpired with the ſpirit of propheſie, told openly in the Senate houſe, what would become of the commonwealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay ſtill and tooke his pleaſure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey ſaid, it was more vnſeaſonable for an old man to follow his pleaſure, then to attend matters of the cõmonwealth. Yet himſelfe ſhortly after was ſo doted of his yong wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the country, and in his gardens, and leaue all affaires of weight aſide. Wherupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, deſpiſed Pompey, and began to enter into ſeditious attempts. For when he had driuen Cicero out of ROME and had ſent away Cato to make warres in CYPRVS, and that Cæſar alſo was occupied in GAVLE, and finding that the people in like caſe were at his commandement, becauſe to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo ſome thing that Pompey had had eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other things, he tooke yong Tigranes out of priſon, & euer carled him vp & down with him whereſoeuer he went, and continually pickt quarels vnto Pompeys friends, to trie what credit he had. In the end Pompey coming abroad one day into the cõmon aſſembly, to heare how a matter of his was handled, this Clodius hauing a company of vagabonds and deſperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he ſitting in a place where he might be ſeene from the reſt, began to aske theſe queſtions out aloud: Who is the licentiouſeſt Captaine in all this city? What man is he that ſeekes for a man? What is he that ſcratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a company of dancers and ſingers, when he ſpake and clapped his hands on his gowne, anſwered him ſtraight aloud to euery queſtion, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys heart, that was not wont to heare himſelfe ſo ill ſpoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any ſuch kind of fight: but yet it made him bite the lippe more, when he ſaw the Senate glad to ſee him thus aſhamed and reproued, as a iuſt reuenge and puniſhment for his vile betraying and forſaking of Cicero. So great ſtirre and vprore being made vpon this in the market place, and many men ſore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken alſo in the preaſſe of the people with a ſword in his hand, very neare vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwiſe fearing Clodius inſolencie and proud words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home ſtill, conſulting with his friends what way he ſhould take to appeaſe the anger of the Senate againſt him. Thereupon, one of his friends called Culeo, perſwaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuſe Cæſars friendſhip, and to ſticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithſtanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counſell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauour with the Senate. Thereupon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to moue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuerſe were ſlaine of either ſide: notwithſtanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauour with the Senate, and ſtanding with the law propounded to giue Pompey authoritie to cauſe corne to be brought to ROME, he once againe made him haue power both by land and ſea ouer all the teritories of the ROMAINES. For all the hauens, marts, and faires, and all ſtore houſes of corne, yea moreouer all the trade of merchandize and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accuſing him, ſaid: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of victuals, but that they made a dearth of victuals, becauſe the law ſhould paſſe, to reuiue Pompeys power and authority againe, that was almoſt vnder foot. Other ſay, that this was a deuice of Lentulus Spinther the Conſull, who gaue Pompey the greater authoritie, becauſe he might be ſent to put king Ptolomy againe into his kingdome. This notwithſtanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred another law to ſend Pompey without an army, with two Sergeants onely to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomie in fauour againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This law ſeemed not to miſlike Pompey: but the Senate with honeſt colour put by this law, as being affraid leſt Pompeys perſon ſhould miſcarrie in ſo doing. Neuertheleſſe, litle papers were found throwne about the market place, and the Senate-houſe, declaring that Ptolomie deſired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers ſtead. Timagenes writeth notwithſtanding, that Ptolomie went to ROME, and left ÆGYPT, without any occaſion giuen him, at the perſwaſion of Theophanes, who perſwaded him to do ſo, becauſe he would giue Pompey occaſion to make new warres. But Theophanes craft and ſubtilty made not this matter ſo credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambition was nothing ſo vile or ill, as that was. So Pompey hauing now full authoritie to cauſe corne to be brought to ROME, he ſent then his Lieutenants and friends abroade, and himſelfe in perſon went into SICILE. Now being ready to returne againe, there aroſe ſuch a ſtorme of wind in the ſea, that the mariners were in doubt to wey their ankers. But himſelfe firſt imbarked, and commanded them ſtraight to hoiſe ſaile, crying out aloud, It is of neceſſity I muſt go, but not to liue. So, through his boldneſſe and good ſpirit, vſing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of mart, and markets with corne, and all the ſea beſides with ſhips: in ſo much, the plenty he brought did not only furniſh the city of ROME, but all their neighbours alſo about them, and came like a liuely ſpring that diſperſed it ſelfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conqueſts that Cæſar made in GAVLE, did ſet him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres far from ROME, with the BELGIANS, SVVISSES, and Engliſhmen, he by ſecret practiſe, was in the middeſt among the people at Rome, and moſt againſt Pompey in the weightieſt affaires of the common wealth. For he had the power of an army about his perſon, which he did harden with paines and continuall practiſe, not with intent to fight only againſt the barbarous people: for the battels he had with them, were in manner but as a hunting ſport, by the which he made himſelfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the world. But furthermore, by the infinite gold and ſiluer, and the incredible ſpoils and treaſure which he wan vpon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by ſending great preſents alſo to Rome, to the Ædiles, Prætors, Conſuls, and their wiues, he purchaſed him many friends. Therfore, after he had paſſed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of Lvca, a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate themſelues almoſt two hundred perſons (and amongſt them, Craſſus & Pompey by name) went out of Rome vnto him. Furthermore, there were ſeene at Cæſars gate, ſixeſcore Sergeants carying axes before Prætors, or Proconſuls. So Cæſar ſent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good words: but with Pompey and Craſſus, he made a match, that they two together ſhould ſue to be Conſuls, and that he himſelfe would ſend them good aide to Rome, at the day of election, to giue their voyces. And if they were choſen, that they ſhould then practiſe by decree of the people, to haue the gouernments of ſome new prouinces and armies aſſigned them: and withall, that they ſhould adiorne the gouernment of thoſe prouinces he had, for fiue yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and ſpread abroad through Rome, the honeſteſt ſort miſliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open aſſembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would ſue for the Conſulſhip at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make anſwer, Pompey ſpake firſt, and ſaid: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Craſſus anſwered more gently, that he would doe that which ſhould be beſt for the commonwealth. Then Marcellinus ſharply inueying againſt Pompey, he angerly againe caſt him in the teeth, and ſaid, that Marcellinus was the rankeſt churle, and the vnthankfulleſt beaſt in the world: for that of a dumb man he had made him eloquent, and being in maner ſtarued & famiſhed, many a time he had filled his belly. This notwithſtanding, diuers that before were determined to ſue for the Conſulſhip, went no further in it, ſauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counſelled and incouraged not to giue it ouer: for, ſaid he, thou doeſt not contend for the Conſulſhip, but to defend the common libertie of thy country againſt two tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, leſt that hauing all the Senates goodwils, he ſhould draw alſo the beſt part of the people after him, thought it not good to ſuffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this end therefore, he ſent men armed againſt him, who at the firſt onſet, ſlue the torch-bearer that caried the torch before him, and made all the reſt to flie: amongſt whom alſo Cato was the laſt man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey & Craſſus being become Cõſuls after this ſort, they ordered themſelues nothing the more temperatly, nor honeſtly. For firſt of all, the people being about to chuſe Cato Prætor, Pompey being at the aſſembly of the election, perceiuing that they would chuſe him, brake vp the aſſembly, falſly alledging that he had noted certaine ill ſignes; and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they choſe Antias and Vatinius Prætors. After that, by Trebonius Tribune of the people, they publiſhed Edicts, authoriſing Cæſars charge for fiue yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæſar. Vnto Craſſus alſo they had appointed Syria, and the warre againſt the Parthians. Vnto Pompey in like caſe, all Africke, and both Spaines, with foure legions beſides: of the which, at Cæſars deſire, he lent him two Legions to helpe him in his warre in Gavle. Theſe things done, Craſſus departed to his prouince, at the going out of his Conſulſhip: and Pompey remained at Rome about the dedicating of his Theater, where he cauſed many goodly playes to be made, both for exerciſe of perſon, as alſo for learning and muſicke, and cauſed wild beaſts alſo to be baited and hunted, and killed fiue hundred Lions. But of all things, there was no ſuch fearfull ſight and terrible fight, as was betweene the Elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to ſhew the people paſtime and pleaſure, made him againe to be very much eſteemed of, and beloued amongſt the people. But on the other ſide, he wan himſelfe as much ill will and enuie, in committing the gouernment of his Prouinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whileſt he himſelfe romed vp and downe the pleaſant places of Italy, with his wife at his pleaſure: either becauſe he was farre in loue with her, or elſe for that ſhe loued him ſo dearly, that he could not find in his hart to leaue her company. It was reported of her (being knowne of many) that this young Lady Iulia loued her her husband more dearly, not for Pompeys flouriſhing age, but for his aſſured continence, knowing no other woman but her: beſides alſo, he was no ſolemne man, but pleaſant of conuerſation, which made women loue him maruellouſly, vnleſſe we will reproue the curtiſan Floraes teſtimony. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, men riſing ſuddenly in hurly burly, drew their ſwords, and many were ſlaine about Pompey: inſomuch as his clothes being bloudied, he ſent his men home in haſte to fetch him other to change him. His young wife that was great with child, ſeeing his clothes bloudie, took ſuch a flight vpon it, that ſhe fell down in a ſwound before them, that they had much ado to recouer her; and yet ſhe fell ſtraight in labour vpon it, and was deliuered. So that they themſelues, which blamed him moſt for his good wil he bare vnto Caſar, could not reproue the loue he bare vnto his wife. Another time after that, ſhe was great with child againe, whereof ſhe died, and the child liued not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carie her into the countrey to be buried, to a houſe he had there neare vnto the city of ALBA, the people by force took her corſe, and caried it into the field of Mars, more for the pitie they tooke of the young Ladie, then to pleaſure either Caſar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæſars ſake being abſent, then for Pompey that was preſent. But ſtraight when his alliance was broken, which rather couered then bridled their ambitious deſire to rule, there aroſe a new ſtirre in ROME immediatly, and euery mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and ſeditious words. Not long after that alſo came newes that Craſſus was ouerthrowne, and ſlaine in PARTHIA: who was a manifeſt ſtay and let to keepe them two from ciuill warres, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themſelues in a reaſonable ſort together. But when fortune had taken away this third champion, who could haue withſtood the better of them both that had ouercome the other, then might haue beene ſaid of theſe two which remained, as the comicall Poet ſaid:

The death of Iulia the daughter of Caſar.

The beginning of the diſſention betwixt Pompey & Caſar.

See how theſe champions purpoſing each others force to trie,
With pointed skin, and duſtie hands, ſtand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile againſt nature, hauing no power to ſtop couetouſneſſe: ſith ſo large and great an Empire, and ſuch a wide countrey beſides, could not containe the couetous deſire of theſe two men. But though they had often both heard and read:

Among the gods themſelues all things by lot diuided are,
And none of them intrudes himſelfe within his neighbours ſhare.

Yet they thought that the Empire of ROME was not inough for them, which were but two. But Pompey ſpake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and alſo left it ſooner then they thought he would haue done: and that he witneſſed by diſcharging his army ſo ſoone. Then thinking that Caſar would not diſcharge his army, he ſought to make himſelf ſtrong againſt him, by procuring offices of the city, without any other alteration. Neither would he ſeeme to miſtruſt him, but he plainly ſhewed that he did deſpiſe and contemne him. But when he ſaw that he could not obtaine the offices of the city as he would, becauſe the citizens that made the elections were bribed with mony, he then left it without a magiſtrate, ſo that there was none either to command, or that the people ſhould obey. Hereupon there ran a bruite ſtraight, that there muſt needs be a Dictator made, and the firſt man that propounded it, was Lucilius Tribune of the people, who perſwaded them to choſe Pompey. But Cato ſtucke ſo ſtoutly againſt it, that the Tribune had like to haue loſt his office, euen in the market place. But then many of Pompeys friends ſtepped vp, and excuſed him, ſaying: that he neither ſought, nor would haue the Dictatorſhip. Then Cato commended him much, and prayed him to ſee good order kept in the common wealth. Pompey being aſhamed to deny ſo reaſonable a requeſt, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Conſuls were choſen, Domitius, and Meſſala: but afterwards when the ſtate began to change againe by the death of one of the Conſuls, and that diuers were more earneſtly bent to haue a Dictator then before, Cato fearing it would breake out with fury, determined to giue Pompey ſome office of reaſonable authoritie, to keep him from the other more tyrannicall. Inſomuch, as Bibulus himſelfe being chiefe of the Senate, & Pompeys enemy, was the firſt that moued Pompey might be choſen Conſull alone: for, ſaid he, by this means, either the common wealth ſhall be rid of the preſent trouble: or elſe it ſhall be in bondage to an honeſt man. This opinion was maruelled at, in reſpect of him that ſpake it. Whereupon, Cato ſtanding vp, it was thought ſtraight he would haue ſpoken againſt him: but ſilence being made him, he plainely told them, that for his owne part he would not haue beene the firſt man to haue propounded that was ſpoken: but ſithence it was ſpoken by another, that he thought it reaſonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, ſaid he, it is better to haue an Officer to command, whatſoeuer he be, rather then none: and that he ſaw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, in ſo troubleſome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey ſhould be choſen ſole Conſull: and that if he ſaw in his diſcretion he ſhould need the aſſiſtance of another companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were paſt. Thus was Pompey made Conſull alone by Sulpitius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made verie friendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honour he had done him, praying him priuately to aſſiſt him with his counſell in the Conſulſhip. Cato anſwered him, that there was no cauſe why he ſhould thanke him, for he had ſpoken nothing for his ſake, but for reſpect of the common wealth only: and for his counſel, if he wold aske it, he ſhould priuatly haue it, if not, yet that he would openly ſay that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the citie, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Craſſus the ſonne, that was ſlaine in PARTHIA, to whom ſhee was maried a maiden. This Ladie had excellent gifts to be beloued beſides her beautie: for ſhe was properly learned, could play well on the harpe, was skilfull in muſicke and Geometrie, and tooke great pleaſure alſo in Philoſophy, and not vainly without ſome profit. For ſhe was very modeſt and ſober of behauior, without brawling and fooliſh curioſity, which commonly young women haue that are indued with ſuch ſingular gifts. Her father alſo, was a noble man, both in bloud and life. Notwithſtanding, theſe vnlike mariages did nothing pleaſe ſome: for Cornelia was young inough to haue beene his ſonnes wife. Now the beſt citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the commonwealth, being in ſuch a troubleſome time, which had choſen him onely, as her remedy to redreſſe the ſame: and that he in the meane time gaue himſelfe ouer to marying & feaſting, where rather he ſhould haue bin careful of his Conſulſhip, which was diſpoſed vpon him againſt the law for cõmon calamities ſake, that otherwiſe he had not come by, if all had been quiet. Furthermore, he ſharply proceeded againſt them which by bribery and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the adminiſtration of iuſtice, otherwiſe he dealt iuſtly and vprightly in all things, giuing ſafety, order, ſilence and grauitie, to matters of iudgement, with force of armes, himſelfe being preſent: ſauing that when his father in law was alſo accuſed among other, he ſent for three hundred and threeſcore Iudges home to his houſe, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuſer ſaw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges themſelues, returning into the market place, he let fal his ſuit. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed alſo more then before, for that he hauing made a law, that no man ſhould praiſe the offenders, whileſt their matter was a hearing, came himſelfe and openly praiſed Plancus being accuſed. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, ſaying: that he might not heare an offender praiſed, ſeeing it was forbidden by law. But therefore he was refuſed for a Iudge, before they gaue ſentence. Notwithſtanding, Plancus was condemned by all the reſt of the Iudges, to Pompeys great ſhame and reproach. Shortly after, Hypſeus, one that had bin Conſull, being likewiſe accuſed, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bath to go to ſupper, vpon his knees he beſought Pompeys fauour and helpe: but he flatly paſſed by him, and gaue him no other anſwer, but told him, he marred his ſupper and ſaid nothing elſe to him. This inconſtancie was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwiſe he ſet all things in good order, and choſe his father in law Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Conſulſhip, for the fiue laſt moneths. After that, he cauſed the gouernment of his Prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeare more, with commiſſion to take yearely out of the treaſure a thouſand talents to defray the charges of his warre. Cæſars friends ſeeing that, ſtepped vp for him, and prayed that there might alſo be had ſome conſideration of him, that had likewiſe great wars for the Empire of ROME: ſaying, that his good ſeruice deſerued, either that they ſhould make him Conſull againe, or elſe that they ſhould prolong his charge and gouernment, ſo as he may yet peaceably enioy the honor to command that which he had conquered, to the end that no other ſucceſſour might reape the fruit of his labour. Much ſtirre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for good will he meant to excuſe the enuie they might haue borne Cæſar, ſaid: that he had receiued letters from him, by the which he requeſted a ſucceſſour, and to be diſcharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they ſhould grant him priuiledge to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip,

Conſulſhip, although he were abſent. Which Cato ſtoutly withſtood, ſaying, that he muſt returne home as a priuate man, and leauing his army, ſhould come in perſon to craue recompence of his countrey. But becauſe Pompey made no reply nor anſwer to the contrary, men ſuſpected ſtraight that he had no great good liking of Cæſar, and the rather, becauſe he had ſent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colour of his warre againſt the PARTHIANS. But Cæſar though he ſmelt him wherefore he ſent for his ſouldiers, returned them home with liberall reward. About that time, Pompey fell ſicke at NAPLES of a dangerous diſeaſe, whereof notwithſtanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS therupon, by perſwaſion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefeſt men of their citie, did ſacrifice to the gods for his recouerie. The like did alſo their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ran ſo generally through all ITALY, that there was no city or towne (great or ſmall) but made open feaſts and reioycing for many daies together. Beſides, the infinite number of people was ſuch, that went to meet him out of all parts, that there was not place inough for them all, but the high waies, cities, townes, and ports of the ſea, were all full of people, feaſting and ſacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouery. Diuers alſo went to meet him, crowned with garlands, and ſo did attend on him, caſting noſegayes and flowers vpon him. Thus was his iourney the nobleſt ſight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought alſo, that this was the chiefeſt cauſe of the beginning of the ciuill warres. For he fell into ſuch a pride, and glorious conceit of himſelfe, with the exceeding ioy he tooke to ſee himſelfe thus honoured: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made al his former doings to proſper, he grew too bold in deſpiſing of Cæſars power, as though he ſtood in no need of other power to care or withſtand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more eaſily, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent vnto Cæſar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giuing out many foule words againſt Cæſar. For he ſaid, that Pompey knew not his owne ſtrength and authoritie, that would ſeeke to make himſelfe ſtrong, by other power againſt him: conſidering that he might ouercome him with his own legions he ſhould bring with him, ſo ſoone as they ſaw but Pompey in the face, ſuch ill will did Cæſars own ſouldiers beare him, and were maruellous deſirous beſides to ſee himſelf. Theſe flattering tales ſo puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into ſuch a ſecuritie and truſt of himſelfe, that he mocked them to ſcorne which were afraid of warres. And to thoſe alſo which ſaid, that if Cæſar came to ROME, they ſaw not how they could reſiſt his power, he ſmileingly anſwered them again, and bad them take no thought for that: for as oft, ſaid he, as I do but ſtampe with my foote vpon the ground of ITALY, I ſhall bring men inough out of euery corner, both footemen and horſemen. In the meane ,ime, Cæſar gathered force ſtil vpon him, and thenceforth drew nearer vnto ITALY, & ſent of his ſoldiers daily to ROME to be preſent at the election of the magiſtrates, and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongſt whom, was Paule, one of the Conſuls, whom he wanne of his ſide, by meanes of a thouſand fiue hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he diſcharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antonie alſo, who for Curioes, ſake, was diſcharged likewiſe for part of the debt which Curio ought, being alſo bound as himſelfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or Centurion ſent from Cæſar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderſtanding that the counſell would not prolong Cæſars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pommell of his ſword: Well ſaid he, this ſhall giue it him. So, to be ſhort, all that was done and ſaid, tended to this end. Notwithſtanding, the petitions and requeſts that Curio made in Cæſars behalfe, ſeemed ſomwhat more reaſonable for the people: for he requeſted one of the two, either to make Pompey to put downe his armie, or elſe to licence Cæſar to haue his army as well as he. For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of themſelues: or elſe being both of like ſtrength, neither of both would ſeeke any alteration, fearing one another, but would content themſelues either of them with their owne. Or otherwiſe, he that ſhould weaken the one, and ſtrengthen the other, ſhould double his power whom he feared. Therto very hotly replied the Conſull Marcellus, calling Cæſar theefe, and ſaid that he ſhould be proclaimed an open enemie to ROME, if he did not diſperſe his army. This notwithſtanding, in fine, Curio, Antony, and Piſo procured that the Senate ſhould decide the matter. For, ſaid he, all thoſe that would haue Cæſar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his, let them ſtand on the one ſide. Thereupon the moſt part of them ſtood at one hand. Then he bad them againe come away from them that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained onely but two and twenty that ſtood for Pompey: and all the reſt went on Curioes ſide. Then Curio looking aloft for ioy of the victorie, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribune faction, with ſhouts of ioy and clapping of hands, and infinite noſegayes and garlands of flowers throwne vpon him. Pompey was not then preſent to ſee the Senators goodwill towards him: becauſe by the law, ſuch as haue commandement ouer ſouldiers, cannot enter into Rome. Notwithſtanding Marcellus ſtanding vp, ſaid: that he would not ſtand trifling, hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that ten legions were already paſſed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes againſt them: and that he would ſend a man vnto them, that ſhould defend their countrey well inough. Straight they changed apparell at Rome, as their manner was in a common calamitie. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went vnto him, and told him openly: Pompey I command thee helpe thy countrey with that army thou haſt already, and alſo to leauie more to aide thee. The like ſpeech did Lentulus vſe vnto him who was appointed one of the Conſuls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leauie ſouldiers in Rome to bill them, ſome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heauie hearts, and the moſt part of them cried, Peace, peace. Antony alſo, againſt the Senates mind, read a letter vnto the people ſent from Cæſar containing certaine offers and reaſonable requeſts, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his requeſt was, that Pompey and he ſhould both of them reſigne their gouernments, and ſhould diſmiſſe their armies to make all well, referring themſelues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Conſulſhip, did not aſſemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of Cilicia, practiſed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cæſar ſhould leaue Gavle, and all the reſt of his armie, reſeruing onely two legions and the gouernement of Illyria, attending his ſecond Conſulſhip. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cæſars friends were contented to grant that he ſhould haue but one of his legions. But Lentulus ſpake againſt it, and Cato cried out on the other ſide alſo, that Pompey was deceiued, and they both. So all treaty of peace was cut off. In the meane time, newes came to Rome that Cæſar had wonne Arminvm, a faire great city of Italy, and that he came directly to Rome with a great power. But that was not true: for he came but with three thouſand horſe, and fiue thouſand footemen, and would not tarrie for the reſt of his army that was yet on the other ſide of the mountaines in Gavle, but made haſte rather to ſurpriſe his enemies vpon the ſudden, being afraid and in garboile, not looking for him ſo ſoone: rather then to giue them time to be prouided, and to fight with them when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuer ſide of Rubicon (which was the vtmoſt confine of the prouince he had in charge towards Italy) he ſtayed ſuddenly, weying with himſelfe the great enterpriſe he tooke in hand. At the laſt, as men that being of a maruellous height from the ground, do headlong throw themſelues downe, cloſing vp their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of the danger: crying out theſe words onely vnto them that were by, in the Greeke tongue, ἀνερίφθω κύβος: in Engliſh, let the die be caſt (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our prouerbe, to ſet all on ſixe and ſeuen) he paſſed ouer with his army. Now, the newes of his coming being caried to Rome, they were in ſuch a maruellous feare, as the like was neuer ſeene. For all the Senate ran immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other Magiſtrates of the city fled vnto him alſo. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to reſiſt them, he anſwered him, faltring ſomewhat in his ſpeech: that he had the two legions readie which Cæſar ſent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leauied in haſte, he ſhould make vp the number of thirty thouſand fighting men. Then Tullus cried out openly: Ah, thou haſt mocked vs Pompey: and thereupon gaue order they ſhould ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Cæſar. There was one Phaonius in the companie, who otherwiſe was no ill man, ſauing that he was ſomwhat too bold, thinking to counterfeit Catoes plain maner of ſpeech: he bad Pompey then ſtampe his foot vpon the ground, & make thoſe ſoldiers come which he had promiſed them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him alſo, what he had prophecied before hand of Cæſar, he anſwered him againe: Indeed thou haſt prophecied more truly then I, but I haue dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they ſhould make him Lieutenant generall of Rome with full and abſolute power to commaund all, ſaying: that the ſelfe ſame men which do the greateſt miſchiefe, know beſt alſo how to remedy the

the ſame. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernment of that countrey: and alſo euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in armes, no man knew what was beſt to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts: and thoſe on the other ſide that were within ROME went out as faſt, and forſook the citie in this trouble and diſorder. That which might ſerue being willing to obey, was found very weake: and that on the other ſide which by diſobedience did hurt, was too ſtrong and ill to be gouerned by the magiſtrates, hauing law to cõmand. For there was no poſſibility to pacifie their feare, neither would they ſuffer Pompey to order things as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancy, euen as he found himſelfe grieued, afraid, or in doubt, and in one day they were in diuers minds. Pompey could heare nothing of certainty of his enemies. For ſome, one while would bring him newes one way, & then againe another way: and thẽ if he wold not credit thẽ, they were angry with him. At the length, when he ſaw the tumult and confuſion ſo great at ROME, as there was no meane to pacifie it, he commanded all the Senators to follow him, telling all thẽ that remained behind, that he wold take thẽ for Cæſars friends; and ſo at night departed out of the citie. Then the two Conſuls fled alſo, without doing any ſacrifice to the gods, as they were wont to do before they went to make any wars. So Pompey, euen in his greateſt trouble and moſt danger, might thinke himſelfe happie to haue euery mans good will as he had. For, though diuerſe miſliked the cauſe of this warre, yet no man hated the Captaine: but there were moe found that could not forſake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæſar was come to ROME, who poſſeſſing the citie, ſpake very gently vnto all them he found there, & pacified their feare ſauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, becauſe he would not ſuffer him to take any of the treaſure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter ſpeech alſo, ſaying: that it was not ſo hard a thing for him to do it, as to ſpeake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to ſerue his turne, he tooke vpon him to follow Pompey, thinking to driue him out of ITALY, before that his army he had in SPAINE ſhould come to him. Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten ſome ſhips together, he made the two Conſuls preſently imbarke with thirty enſignes of footmen, which he ſent beyõd the ſea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he ſent his father in law Scipio, and Cneus Pompey his ſonne, into SYRIA, to prouide him ſhips. Himſelfe on the other ſide, fortified the rampiers of the city, and placed the lighteſt ſouldiers he had vpon the wals, and commanded the BRVNDVSIANS not to ſtirre out of their houſes: and further, he caſt trenches within the city, at the end of the ſtreetes in diuerſe places, and filled thoſe trenches with ſharpe pointed ſtakes ſauing two ſtreets onely, which went vnto the hauen. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the reſt of his ſouldiers at his pleaſure, he ſuddenly lifting vp a ſigne into the aire, to giue them warning which he had left to guard the rampiers, they ſtraight ran to him with ſpeed, and quickly receiuing thẽ into his ſhips, he weyed anker, and hoiſed ſaile. Cæſar perceiuing the wals naked without ward, he ſtraight miſtruſted that Pompey was fled: who haſting after him, had almoſt runne vpon the ſharpe ſtakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSIANS giuen him warning of them. So he ſtayed, and ranne not ouerthwart the citie, but fetched a compaſſe about to go to the hauen: where he found that all the ſhips were vnder ſaile, two ſhips onely excepted, vpon the which were left a few ſouldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the beſt ſtratagemes of warre that euer he vſed. Notwithſtanding, Cæſar maruelled much, that he being in a ſtrong citie, and looking for his army to come out of SPAINE, and being maiſter of the ſea, beſides, that he would euer forſake ITALIE. Cicero alſo reproued him, for that he rather followed Themiſtocles counſell, then Pericles: conſidering that the troubleſome time was rather to be likened vnto Pericles then Themiſtocles time. Yea Cæſar himſelfe ſhewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeys friends, he ſent him vnto Pompey at BRVNDVSIVM, to offer him reaſonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, and ſailed away with him. By this meanes, Cæſar in threeſcore daies being Lord of all ITALY without any bloud ſhed, he was very deſirous to follow with ſpeed after Pompey. But becauſe he had no ſhips ready, he let him go, and haſted towards SPAINE, to ioyne Pompeys armie there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane ſpace, had gotten a maruellous great power together both by ſea and by land. His army by ſea was wonderful. For he had fiue hundred good ſhips of warre, and of galliots, foists, and pinnaces, an infinit number. By land, he had all the flower of the horsemen of Rome, & of al Italy, to the number of seuen thousand horse, all rich men of great houses, and valiant minds. But his footmen, they were men of all sorts, and raw souldiers vntrained, whom Pompey cõtinually exercised, lying at the city of Berroea, not sitting idly, but taking pains, as if he had bin in the prime of his youth. Which was to great purpose to incourage others seeing Pompey, being eight and fifty yeares old, fight on foot, armed at all peeces; & then on horsbacke, quickly to draw out his sword while his horse was in his full carier, and easily to put it vp againe; & to throw his dart from him, not only with such agility to hit point blank, but also with strẽgth to cast it such a way from him, that few yong men could do the like. Thither came diuers kings, princes, & great Lords of countries, and yeelded themselues vnto him, and of Romaine Captaines that had borne office, he had of thẽ about him the nũber of a whole Senate. Amongst them came vnto him Labienus also, who before was Cæsars friend, & had alwaies been with him in his warres in Gavle. There came vnto him also Brutus, the sonne of that Brutus which was slaine in Gavle, a valiant man, and which had neuer spoken vnto Pompey vntill that day, because he tooke him for a murtherer of his father: but then willingly followed him as defender of the liberty of Rome. Cicero himselfe also, though he had both written and giuen counsell to the contrary, thought it a shame to him not to be amongst the number of them that would hazard their liues for defence of their countrey. There came vnto him also Tidius Sextius euen into Macedon, notwithstanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pompey saw him, he rose and went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their good wils vnto him whẽ such old men as he, chose rather to be with him in danger, then at home with safety. Hereupon they sate in councell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they should put no citizen of Rome to death but in battell, and should sacke no citie that was subiect to the Empire of Rome; the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the warres, either because they dwelt farre off, or else for that they were so poore, as otherwise they were not regarded, did yet both in deed and word fauour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemie both to the gods and men, that wished not Pompey victorie. Cæsar also shewed himselfe very mercifull and courteous, where he ouercame. For when he had wonne all Pompeys army that was in Spaine, he suffered the Captaines that were taken to go at liberty, and onely reserued the souldiers. Then coming ouer the Alpes againe, he passed through all Italie, and came to the citie of Brvndvsivm in the winter quarter: and there passing ouer the sea, he went vnto the citie of Oricvm, and landed there. Now Cæsar hauing Vibius, one of Pompeys familiar friends with him, whom he had taken prisoner, he sent him vnto Pompey, to pray againe that they might meete, and both of them disperse their armes within three dayes, and being reconciled (giuing their faith one to another) so to returne into Italy like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that these were new deuices to entrap him. Thereupon he suddenly went downe to the sea, and tooke all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his campe in, and all the ports, creekes, and harbors for ships to lie in rode: so that what wind soeuer blew on the sky, it serued his turne, to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Cæsar on the other side was so distressed both by sea and by land, that he was driuen to procure battell, and to assaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom most times he euer had the better in all skirmishes, sauing once, when he was in danger to haue lost al his army. For Pompey had valiantly repulsed his men, and made them flie, and had slaine two thousand of them in the field: but he durst not enter pell mell with them into their campe, as they fled. Wherupon Cæsar sayd to his friends, that his enemie had won the victorie that day, if he had knowne how to ouercome. This victorie put Pompeys men in such courage, that they wold needs hazard battell. And Pompey himselfe also though he wrote letters vnto strãge kings, captaines, & cities of his confederacy as if he had already won all, was yet afraid to fight another battell, thinking it better by tract of time, and distresse of victuals, to ouercome him. For Cæsars men being old and expert souldiers, and wont euer to haue the victorie when they fought together, he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kind of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and still to fortifie and intrench themselues; and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hand, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to stirre, perceiuing that after this last bickering, Cæsar being scanted with victuals victuals, raised his campe, and departed thence to go into THESSALY, through the countrey of the ATHAMANIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Cæsar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, Let vs returne home againe into ITALY. And others also sent thier friends and seruants before to ROME, to hire them houses neere the market place: intending when they came thither to sue for offices in the common wealth. Some there were also that in a iollity would needs take ship, and saile into the Ile of LESBOS, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had sent thither) to carie her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon assembling the councell, Africanus thought it best to winne ITALY, for that was the chiefest marke to be shot at in this warre: for whosoeuer obtained that, had straight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAINE, and GAVLE at commandement. Furthermore, that it was a dishonour to Pompey (which in reason should touch him aboue all things) to suffer their countrey to be in such cruell bondage and subiection vnto slaues and flatterers of tyrants, offering it selfe as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honourable for him, once againe to flie from Cæsar, and to make him follow him, sith fortune had giuen him oportunitie to haue Cæsar in chase: nor lawfull also before the gods, to forsake his father in law Scipio, and many other also that had been Consuls, dispersed abroad in GREECE and THESSALIE which should immediatly fall into Cæsars hands, with al their riches & armies they had. Furthermore, he said, that they had care enough for the citie of ROME, which drew the warres farthest off from them: so as, they remaining safe and quiet at home (neither hearing nor feeling the miserie of warres) might in the end peaceably receiue and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cæsar, being determined not to giue him battell, but to besiege him, and onely to compasse him in still being neare vnto him, and so to cut him off from victuals. There was also another reason that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech giuē out among the ROMAINE knights, that so soone as euer they had ouercome Cæsar, they must also bring Pompey to be a priuate man againe. Some say therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwards imploy Cato in any great matters of weight in all this war: for when he followed Cæsar, he left him to keepe his cariage by the sea side, fearing that so soone as Cæsar were once ouercome, he would make him straight also resigne his authority. Pompey following Cæsar in this maner faire and softly, they cried out vpon him, that he made no warre with Cæsar, but against his countrey and the Senate, becausse he might be still in authoritie: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his seruants and guard about him, which should rule & command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Ænobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kings, made him much to be enuied. Phaonius also mocked him as much as the other that spake most boldly: for he went crying vp and downe, My maisters, I giue you warning, you are like to eate no THVSCVLAN figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius also, he that had lost the army which he had in SPAINE, and was also suspected for a traytor, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I maruell, said he, that they which accuse me, do not lustily go to find him out, whom they call the merchant and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him presently? With these and many such other lewd speeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not denie his friends any thing) to follow their vaine hope and desires, and to forsake his owne wise determination: the which thing, no good ship-master, and much lesse a chiefe and soueraigne Captaine, ouer so many nations and so great armies, should haue suffered and consented vnto. Now, he that did alwaies commend the Physitians, that would not follow the fond desire of the sicke patients, was himself contented to obey the worst part of his armie, fearing their displeasure, where their life or health stood in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wise men, and in their wits, who walking vp and downe their campe, did already sue to be Consuls and Prætors? considering that Spinther, Domitius and Scipio, were at strife together, making friends to be high Bishop (which office Cæsar had,) as if they should haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cæsar and his army: who had taken a thousand townes by assault, had subdued aboue three hundred seuerall nations, and had wonne infinite battels of the GERMAINES and GAVLES, and was neuer ouercome: had also taken a million of men prisoners, and had likewise slaine so many at diuerse battels. All this notwithstanding, they of Pompeys side still being importunate on him, and troubling him in this sort, in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a councell. There Labienus, Generall of the horſemen, ſtanding vp, ſware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like oath all the reſt did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honour him, made a maruellous great clapping of their hands: and that he himſelfe did ſet foorth the temple of Venus the conquerour with many ſpoiles. This viſion partly put him in good courage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraid, becauſe Cæſars family was deſcended from this goddeſſe Venus, that his dreame did ſignifie, that he ſhould haue the honour of the victorie, with the ſpoiles he ſhould winne of him. Beſides all this, there were ſudden and fearefull noiſes heard in his campe, without any apparant cauſe, that waked all the campe vpon it. At the fourth watch, when the watch is renewed in the morning, there was ſeene a maruellous great light ouer Cæſars campe, and they were all at reſt, which flamed like a burning torch, and fell into Pompeys campe. The which Cæſar himſelfe ſayd he ſaw, when he went to viſit the watch. At the breake of the day, Cæſar being determined to raiſe his campe, and to go to the citie of SCOTVSA, as his ſouldiers were buſie about ouerthrowing of their tents, and ſending away their bagge and baggage before, there came ſcours vnto him, that brought him word; they ſaw a great deale of armour and weapon caried too and fro in their enemies campe, and heard a noiſe and buſtling beſides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After theſe came in other ſcouts, that brought word alſo that their voward was already ſet in battell ray. Then Cæſar ſayd, that the day was now come they had longed for ſo ſore, and that they ſhould now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gaue order preſently that they ſhould put out the red coate of armes vpon his tent, which was the ſigne all the ROMAINES vſed to ſhew that they would fight. The ſouldiers ſeeing that out, left their cariage and tents, and with great ſhouts of ioy ranne to arme themſelues. The Captaines of euerie band alſo, beſtowed euery man in ſuch place as he ſhould fight, and ſo they conueyed themſelues into battell ray, without any tumult or diſorder, as quietly, as if they ſhould haue entred into a dance. Pompey himſelfe led the right wing of his army againſt Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in law, being right againſt Domitius Caluinus. The left wing alſo was led by Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes; for all the horſmen were placed on that ſide, to diſtreſſe Cæſar if they could, that was directly againſt them: and to ouerthrow the tenth legion that was ſo much accounted of being the valianteſt ſouldiers the enemie had in all his armie, amongſt the which Cæſar did euer vſe to fight in perſon. Cæſar then ſeeing the left wing of his enemies ſo ſtrong with the gard of the horſemen, and being afraid of the brightneſſe of their armour, brought forward ſixe enſignes for ſupply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion, commanding them that no man ſhould ſtirre, leſt their enemies ſhould diſcouer them. And furthermore, when the horſemen of the enemies ſhould come to giue charge vpon them, that then they ſhould runne with ſpeed on the one ſide of the formoſt ranks, and not to throw their darts farre from them, as the valianteſt ſouldiers are wont to do, to come to the ſword the ſooner: but to throw them vpwards into their enemies eyes and faces. For ſaid he, theſe braue fellowes and fine dancers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cæſars deuice at that time. Pompey being on horſeback, rode vp and downe to conſider the ordinance of both battels: and perceiuing that his enemies ſtood ſtill in their rankes, looking for the ſignall of battell, & that his owne battell on the other ſide waued vp and downe diſorderly, as men vnskilfull in warres: he was afraid they would flie before they were charged. Thereupon he ſtraightly commanded them in the voward, that they ſhould ſteadily keepe their rankes, and ſtanding cloſe together ſhold ſo defend themſelues, receiuing the charge of the enemie. But Cæſar diſliked of that deuice, for thereby, ſaid he, the force of their blowes was leſſened; and in withholding them from giuing the charge, he not onely tooke away that courage, which the aſſailant carieth with him coming with fury: but made them moreouer faint hearted, in receiuing the charge of the enemies. In Cæſars army, there were about two and twentie thouſand fighting men: and in Pompeys army, ſomewhat aboue twiſe as many. Now; when the word of battell was giuen on either ſide, and that the trumpets did ſound the allarme, euery man began to looke to himſelfe. But a few of the chiefeſt of the ROMAINES, and certaine GRECIANS that were there alſo out of the ſet battell, perceiuing the imminent danger, began to bethinke them, to what paſſe

the ambition and wilfull contention betweene theſe two men, had brought the ſtate of ROME. For the weapons of kinſmen, the bands of brethren, the enſignes all alike, the flower of ſo many valiant men of one citie, did ſerue for a notable example, to ſhew how mans nature prickt forward with couetouſneſſe, is quite blind and without reaſon. For if they could haue been contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered, the greateſt and beſt part of the world, both by ſea and by land was ſubiect vnto them. Or otherwiſe if they could not haue quẽched their vnſatiable deſire of victorie and triumph, they had occaſion of warre inough offered them againſt the PARTHIANS and GERMAINS. Furthermore they had inough to do beſides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and withal, they had had an honeſt colour to haue cloaked their ambitious deſires, if it had beene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horſmen of SCYTHIA, or arrowes of PARTHIA, or riches of Indiãs, could haue abidden the power of threeſcore and ten thouſand ROMAINE ſouldiers, and ſpecially being led by two ſo famouus Captaines, as Pompey, and Cæſar? whoſe names, theſe ſtrange & far nations vnderſtood long before the name of the ROMAINS: ſo great were their victories, hauing conquered ſo many wild and barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one againſt the other, not regarding their honour which made them ſo ambitious, did not ſpare their owne countrey, who had vntil that time remained vnuincible, both in fame & prowetſe. For, the alliãce that was made between them, the loue of Iulia, and marying with her, was ſuſpected from the beginning to be but a deceit, and a pledge as it were of a conſpiracy made betweene them, for a priuat benefit, more then for any true friendſhip. Now when the fields of PHARSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horſe and armor, and that the ſignall of battell was giuen on either ſide, the firſt man of Cæſars army that aduãced forward to giue charge, was Caius Creſſinius, Captaine of ſixſcore and fiue men, to performe a great promiſe which he had made vnto Cæſar. For Cæſar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, ſeeing him, called him to him by his name, & asked him what he thought of the ſucceſſe of this battell? Craſinius holding out his right hand vnto him, couragiouſly cried: Oh Cæſar, thine is the victorie, and this day thou ſhalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remembring theſe words, he brake out of the ranks, and many following after him, ran amongſt the middeſt of his enemies. Straight they came to the ſword, & made great ſlaughter. But he preſſing forward ſtill, one with a thruſt ran him through the mouth, that the ſwords point came through at his necke. Therupon Craſſivius being ſlaine, the battel was equal. Pompey did not make his left wing march ouer ſuddenly, but ſtayed, & caſt his eyes abroad to ſee what his horſemen would do, the which had already deuided their companies, meaning to compaſſe in Cæſar, and to make the ſmall number of horſmen which he had before him, to giue back vpon the ſquadron of his footmen. On the other ſide, as ſoone as Cæſar had giuen the ſignall of battell, his horſemen retired backe a litle, and the ſixe enſignes which he had placed ſecretly behind them (being three thouſand fighting men) ran ſuddenly to aſſaile the enemie vpon the flancke; and when they came neare vnto the horſemen, they threw the points of their darts vpwards, according to Cæſars commandement, and hit the yong gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfull to fight, and leaſt of all looking for ſuch manner of fight, had not the hearts to defend themſelues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, and clapping their hands on their faces, ſhamefully fled. They being ouerthrowne, Cæſars men made no account to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battel of footmen, in that place ſpecially where they had no gard of horſmen, wherby they might the eaſilier be compaſſed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the voward alſo by the tenth legion, perceiuing themſelues (contrary to their expectation) compaſſed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue enuironed them: they could make no longer reſiſtance. They alſo being likewiſe driuen to flie, when Pompey ſaw the duſt in the element, and coniectured the flying of his horſemen, what mind he was of then, it was hard to ſay. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went ſtraight into his campe, and ſpake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verſes to this effect:

Caius Craſſinius giueth the onſet of Cæſars ſide.

Craſſinius ſlaine.

Pompeys horſmen put to flight by Cæſar.

But mighty Ioue who ſits aloft in youorie chariot hie, Strake Aiax with ſo great a feare, that Aiax by and by Let fall his leatherne target: made of tough oxe hide ſeuen fold,
And ranne away, not looking backe, for all he was ſo bold.

In this estate Pompey entred into his tent, and sate him downe there a great while, and spake neuer a word: vntill such time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he said no more, but, What, euen into our campe? and so rising vp, he put a gowne on his backe euen fit for his misfortune, and secretly stole out of the campe: The other legions also fled: and great slaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their seruants that garded the campe. For Asinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæsars side) that there were slaine onely but sixe thousand souldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Cæsars souldiers then found plainely the madnesse and vanitie of Pompeys men. For, all their tents and pauilions were full of nosegayes and garlands of mirtle, and their couches all couered with flowers, their tables full of bolles of wine, and men prepared ready to do sacrifice for ioy, rather then to arme themselues to fight. Thus went they to battell, caried away with this vaine and fooliſh hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way from his campe, he forsooke his horse, hauing a very few with him: and perceiuing that no man pursued him, he went on foot faire and softly, his head full of such thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure and thirty yeares space together, was wont continually to cary victory away, and began then euen in his last cast, to proue what it was to flie, & to be ouercome: and who thought then with himselfe, how in one houres space he had left the honor and riches which he had gotten in so many foughten fields and battels, whereby he was not long before followed and obeyed of so many thousand men of warre, of so many horsmen, and of such a great fleete of ships on the sea; and then to go as he did in such poore estate, and with so small a traine, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the citie of Larissa, and coming to the vallie of Tempé, there being a thirst, he fell downe on his belly, and dranke of the riuer. Then rising vp againe, he went his way thence, and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle boat vpon the riuer, and tooke the free men with him that were about him: and as for the slaues, he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to go to Cæsar, and not to be afraid. Thus rowing vp and downe the shore side, in this litle boat, he spied a great ship of burden in the maine sea, riding at anker, which was ready to weigh anker, and to saile away. The master of the ship was a Romaine, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he saw Pompey speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in misery. So, he had told this dreame vnto the mariners which sailed with him (as men commonly vse to doe, specially when they dreame of such weighty matters, and being at leisure withall) and at the very instant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he saw a litle boat on the riuer rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shoke their cloakes at them, and held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commanded his mariners to let downe his boate, and gaue him his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he receiued him into his ship, and all those he would haue with him, and then hoisted saile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceiued king Deiotarus coming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made signes to receiue him: which they did. At supper time, the master of the ship, made readie such meate as he had aboord. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of himselfe, ran vnto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwards continued still to waite vpon him, and to do such seruice about him, as seruants doe to their maisters, euen to the washing of his feete, and making ready of his supper. When a simple man saw him, that could no skill of seruice, he sayd:

Pompey passing then by the citie of Amphipolis, coasted from thence into the Ile of Lesbos, to go fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne being then in the citie of Mitylene. There, hauing cast out his anker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore, and sent him into the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the citie of Dyrrachivm. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the heart so much much as to salute her, but letting her vnderstand rather by his teares then words, the great misfortune Pompey had, told her, she must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one shippe onely, and none of his, but borrowed. The young Ladie hearing these newes, fell downe in a swound before him, & neither spake nor stirred of long time: but after she was come to her selfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, she went with speed through the city vnto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, and embraced her. But she sinking vnder him, fell downe, and said: Out alas, wo worth my hard fortune, not thine (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poore ship, who before thou mariedst thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wast wont to saile these seas with fiue hundred shippes. Alas, why art thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leaue me to cursed fate and my wicked destinie: sith my selfe is cause of all this thy euill? Alas, how happie a woman had I been, if I had been dead before I heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS slue? And how wise a woman had I been, if (according to my determination) I had killed my selfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto Pompey the Great? It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou hast knowne a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, because she hath continued longer with me thē her maner is. But since we are borne men, we must patiently beare these troubles, & proue fortūe, againe. For it is no impossible matter for vs again to come into prosperty out of this presēt misery, as to fal out of late prosperity into present calamity. Whē Cornelia heard him say so, she sent back into the city for her stuffe & family. The MITYLENIANS also came openly to salute Pompey, & prayed him to come into the city, & to refresh himselfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counsel to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Cæsar was a iust man, & of a courteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came among the citizens also to see him, made his complaint vnto him, & reasoned a litle with him about diuine prouidence. Cratippus courteously yeelded vnto him, putting him still in better hope, fearing lest he would haue growne too hote & troublesome, if he should haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had been in his doings? And Cratippus might haue answered him, that for the ill gouernment of the commonwealth at ROME, it was of necessity that it should fall into the hands of a soueraigne Prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might thē haue asked him: how & wherby Pompey wouldest thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadst ouercome Cæsar, that thou wouldest haue vsed thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, refer them to the gods as it pleaseth thē. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoisted saile, and landed no where, but compelled to take fresh acates and water. The first citie he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the coūtry of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certaine gallies out of CILICIA, and many souldiers also, insomuch as he had threescore Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then vnderstanding that his army by sea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his souldiers after the ouerthrow, whom he had transported with him into AFRICKE he lamented, & complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, and not suffer him to helpe himselfe with his other force wherin he was the stronger: and that he kept not stil neare vnto his army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet presently haue repaired to his power ready by sea to haue resisted his enemy. To confesse a truth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all this war, neither did Cæsar put forth a better deuice, then to make his enemy fight farre from his army by sea. Thus Pompey being driuen to attempt somewhat according to his final abilitie, he sent Ambassadors vnto the cities. To others, he went himselfe in person also to require money, wherewith he manned and armed some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the sodaine approach of his enemie, lest he should preuent him before he could put any reasonable force in readines for to resist him, he bethought himself what place he might best retire vnto for his most safety. When he had considered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the ROMAINES that could saue and defend them. And for other strange realmes, he thought PARTHIA aboue all other, was the best place to receiue them into at that present (hauing so small power as they had,) and that it was best able to helpe and aide them. Other of his counsel were of mind to go into AFRICKE, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN said, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three dayes sailing from thence, and king Ptolomie, (being but lately come to mans state, & bound vnto Pompey for the late friendship and fauour his father found of him) and to go put himselfe into the hands of the PARTHIANS, the vilest and vnfaithfullest nation in the world; and not to proue the modestie of a ROMAINE, that had been his father in law, whose prosperitie if he could haue endured, he might haue beene the chiefest man: and now to put himselfe to Arsaces good will, who could not away with Crassus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill part also, for him to go carie his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for them to vse what villany and insolencie they list to any. For, admit she haue no villany offered her by them, yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke she might haue beene dishonoured, they hauing her in their power to do it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this onely that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it seemeth that Pompeys counsell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therfore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SELEVCIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his traine imbarked also, some into gallies, and others into merchants ships of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without danger. When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolemie was in the citie of PELVSIVM with his army, making warre against his sister, he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arriuall, and to intreate him to receiue him. King Ptolomie was then but a young man, insomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He assembled a councell of the chiefest and wisest men of the court, who had such credit and authority as it pleased him to giue them. They being assembled, he cõmanded euery man in the kings name to say his mind touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king should receiue him or not. It was a miserable thing to see Pothinus an Eunuch of the kings, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hired schoolemaster to teach the young king Rhetoricke, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN, to consult among themselues what they should doe with Pompey the Great. These were the chiefest counsellers of all his Eunuchs, and of those that had brought him vp. Now did Pompey ride at anker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolutiõ of this councell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for some would not haue receiued him: other would that he should be receiued. But the Rhetoritian Theodotus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, said he, if we receiue him, we shall haue Cæsar our enemie, and Pompey our Lord: and if we doe deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame vs for refusing of him, and Cæsar for not keeping of him. Therefore this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby we should win the goodwill of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other: and some say moreouer, that he added this mocke withall: A dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselues, gaue Achillas commission to do it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge aforetime vnder Pompey) and Saluius another Centurion also, with three or foure souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys gallie, about whom were at that time the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in princely shew and maner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing so few men come to them in a fisher boate: they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, and counselled Pompey to returne backe, & to launch againe into the sea, being out of the danger of the hurling of a dart. In the meane time, the fisher boate drew neare, and Septimius arose and saluted Pompey in the ROMAINE tõgue, by the name of Imperator, as much as soueraigne Captaine: and Achillas also spake to him in the Greeke tong, and bade him come into his boate, because that by the shore side, there was a great deale of mud and sand banckes, so that his gallie should haue no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies, which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shore besides full of soldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company would haue altered their minds, they could not haue told how to haue escaped: and furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had giuen the murtherer occasion to haue executed his cruelty. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end, he commanded two Centurions to go downe before him into the ÆGYPTIANS boate, and Philip one of his slaues infranchised, with another slaue called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receiue him into his boat, he turned him to his wife and sonne, and said these verses of Sophocles vnto them:

Pompey arriued in Egypt and goeth to Peluſium Pothinus an Eunuch, & groome of the chamber to king Ptolomie, ruleth all Egypt.

These were the last words he spake vnto his people, whē he had left his owne gallie, & went into the Ægyptians boat. The land being a great way off from his gallie, and when he saw neuer a man in the boate spake friendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he said vnto him: Me thinks my friend I should know thee, for that thou hast serued me with hertofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no answer, nor shewed him any courtesie. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, tooke a little booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he meant to make vnto king Ptolomie, and began to read it. When they came neare the shore, Cornelia with her seruants and friends about her, stood vp in her ship in great feare, to see what should become of Pompey. So she hoped well, when she saw many of the kings people on the shore, coming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honour him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philip his hand to arise more easily, Septimius came first behind him, and thrust him through with his sword. Next vnto him also, Saluius and Achillas drew out their swords in like manner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his hands, and hid his face. and manly abid the wounds they gaue him, onely sighing a litle. Thus being nine & fifty yeares old, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at anker in their ships, when they saw him murthered, gaue such a fearful cry, that it was heard to the shore: then weying vp their ankers with speed, they hoisted saile, and departed their way, hauing wind at wil that blew a lustie gale, as soone as they had gotten the maine sea. The Egyptians which prepared to row after them, when they saw they were past their reach, & vnpossible to be ouertaken, they let them go. Then hauing strickē off Pompeys head, they threw his body ouer boord, for a miserable spectacle to all those that were desirous to see him. Philip his infranchised bondman remained euer by it, vntil such time as the Ægyptians had seene it their bellies full. Then hauing washed his bodie with salt water, and wrapped it vp in an old shirt of his, because he had no other shift to lay it in: he sought vpon the sands, and found at the length a peece of an old fisher boate, enough to serue to burne his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was busie gathering the broken peeces of this boate together, thither came vnto him an old Romaine, who in his youth had serued vnder Pompey, and said vnto him: O friend, what art thou that prepares the funerals of Pompey the great? Philip answered, that he was a bondman of his infranchised. Wel, said he, thou shalt not haue all this honour alone, I pray thee let me accompany thee in so deuout a deed, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt so long in a strange countrie, where I haue abidden such miserie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good hap, with mine hands to touch Pompeys bodie, and to helpe to bury the only and most famous Captaine of the Romaines. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had passed, coming out of Cyprvs, sailed by the shore side, and perceiued a fire made for funerals, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But straight fetching a great sigh, Alas said, he, perhaps it is Pompey the Great. Then he landed a litle, and was straight taken and slaine. This was the end of Pompey the Great. Not long after, Cæsar also came into Ægypt that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was presented vnto him: but he turned his head aside, and would not see it; and abhorred him that brought it, as a detestable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he sealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lion holding a sword, he burst out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolomie himselfe also, being ouerthrowne in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vanished away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rhetoritian escaped Cæsars hands, and wandred vp and downe Ægypt in great miserie, despised of euery man. Afterwards Marcus Brutus (who slue Cæsar) conquering Asia, met with him by chance, and putting him to all the torments he could possibly deuise, at the length slue him. The ashes of Pompeys bodie were afterwards brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the citie of Alba.

THE COMPARISON OF Pompey with Ageſilaus.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you the liues of Ageſilaus and Pompey, let vs compare their manners and conditions together, which are theſe. Firſt, Pompey came to his honour and greatneſſe by his integritie, and ſo aduanced himſelfe, and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid thoſe tyrants out of ITALY, who held it in bondage. But Ageſilaus vſurped the kingdome of LACEDÆMON, againſt the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a baſtard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull ſonne: and contemned beſides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore, Pompey did honour Sylla while he liued, and when he was dead, gaue his bodie honourable buriall in deſpite of Lepidus: and maried his daughter vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. Ageſilaus contrarily did diſhonour Lyſander vpon light occaſion: but Pompey had done no leſſe for Sylla, then Sylla had done for him. Lyſander on the other ſide, had made Ageſilaus king of LACEDÆMON, and Lieutenant generall of al GREECE. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of neceſſitie to pleaſe Cæſar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Ageſilaus alſo, to ſatisfie his ſonnes loue, ſaued Sphodrias life, that had deſerued death, for the miſchiefe he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly alſo tooke part with Phœbidas, not ſecretly, but openly, becauſe he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the ROMAINES, either through ignorance, or to pleaſure his friends: the ſame did Ageſilaus vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, through anger and ſelfe-will, in renewing warre with the BOEOTIANS, vpon a full peace concluded. If we ſhall recken of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed, Pompeys fortune vnto the ROMAINS was vnlooked for: but Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to auoide the lame kingdome, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had been proued a baſtard ten thouſand times, yet had not the race of the Eurityontides failed, but they could haue found another lawfull king among them, that ſhould haue gone vpright: had not Lyſander, fauouring Ageſilaus kept the true meaning of the oracle from the LACEDÆMONIANS. On the other ſide againe for matters of gouernement, there was neuer ſuch an excellent deuice found out, as was done by Ageſilaus, to helpe the feare and danger the LACEDÆMONIANS were in, for thoſe that fled at the battell of LEVCTRES, when he counſelled them to let the law ſleepe for that day. Neither can any man match Pompeys with the like: who, to ſhew his friends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which himſelf had made. For Ageſilaus being driuen of neceſſitie to aboliſh the law, to ſaue the life of his citizens, found ſuch a deuice that the law was not hurtfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it ſhould do hurt. I muſt needs commend this for a great vertue and ciuilitie in Ageſilaus, who ſo ſoone as he receiued the Scytala, (or ſcrole of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his countrey: and left the warre of ASIA. He did not as Pompey, who made himſelfe great to the benefite of the common wealth, and for the commonwealths ſake did forſake ſuch honour and ſo great authoritie as neuer Captaine before him but Alexander the Great, had the like in thoſe parts. But now to other matter. Touching their battels and exploits in warres, the multitudes of victories and triumphs that Pompey obtained, and the greate armies that he led, Xenophon himſelfe, if he were aliue, could not compare Ageſilaus victories vnto his: although for the ſingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had libertie granted him; to write and ſpeake of Ageſilaus what he thought good. Me thinkes alſo, there was great difference betwixt Pompey and Ageſilaus, in their equity and clemencie towards their enemies. For, whileſt Ageſilaus went about to conquer THEBES, and vtterly to race and deſtroy the citie of MESSINA, the one being an ancient citie of his countrey, and the other the capitall city of BOEOTIA, he had almoſt loſt his owne citie of SPARTA: for at the leaſt he loſt the commandement and rule he had ouer the reſt of GREECE. The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pirats to dwell in, which were willing to change their trade and manner of life: and when it was in his choiſe to leade Tigranes king of ARMENIA in triumph at ROME, he choſe rather to make him a confederate of the ROMAINES, ſaying, that he preferred perpetuall honour before one daies glorie. But ſince it is reaſon we ſhould giue the firſt place and honour of the diſcipline of wars, vnto a Captaine of the greateſt skill and experience in wars, the LACEDÆMONIAN then leaueth the ROMAINE farre behind. For firſt of all Ageſilaus neuer forſooke his citie, though it was beſieged with threeſcore and ten thouſand men, and that there were verie few within the ſame to defend it, the which alſo a litle before had bene ouerthrowne at the battell of LEVCTRES. And Pompey on the other ſide, heating that Cæſar with fiue thouſand footmen only had taken a towne in ITALIE, fled from ROME in very great feare. And therein he cannot be excuſed of one of theſe two: either that he fled cowardly from ſo few men, or elſe that he had a falſe imagination of more. For he conueied his wife and children away, but he left all the reſt without defence, and fled: where indeed he ſhould either haue ouercome, valiantly fighting for defence, of his country, or elſe haue receiued the conditiõs of peace which the conquerors ſhould haue offered him. For he was a citizen, and allied vnto him. And he that thought it an vntollerable thing, to prolong the terme of his gouernment, or to grant him a ſecond Conſulſhip, did now giue him oportunitie, ſuffering him to take the citie of ROME, to ſay vnto Metellus the Tribune, and the reſt, that they were all his priſoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefeſt point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth himſelfe the ſtronger, and alſo to keepe himſelfe from compulſion of fight when he is the weaker: Ageſilaus excelling in that, did euer keepe himſelfe inuincible. Cæſar alſo had great skill therein, to keepe himſelfe from danger being the weaker, and againe could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter deſtruction, by land, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made himſelfe Lord of the treaſure, victuals, and alſo of the ſea, which his enemies had in their hands, without fighting. That which they alledge in his excuſe, is that which moſt doth condemne him, ſpecially for ſo great and skilfull a Captaine. For, as it is likely enough, that a yong Generall of an armie may eaſily be brought from his wiſe and ſafe counſell, with rumor and tumult of a few fearefull men, that ſhould perſwade him it were a ſhame and diſhonour for him if he did otherwiſe: yet were this no ſtrange matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the Great, whoſe campe the ROMAINES called their countrey, and his tent their Senate, and called all the Prætors and Conſuls that gouerned at ROME, rebels and traitours to the commonwealth of ROME: who could excuſe him (who was neuer ſeene commaunded by other then himſelfe, but had bene alwaies chiefe Captaine and Generall in any war he made, and euer had the vpper hand) but that he was drawne on by the ſcoffes of Faonius and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endanger the whole Empire and libertie of ROME, only for feare they ſhould call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had ſo much regarded preſent infamie, he ſhold haue fought from the beginning for the defence of the citie of ROME. & not to haue taken example of Themiſtocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a ſhame as he did, to lie in THESSALY a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharſalia for a Theater, or cloſe camp of neceſſitie to fight which of them ſhould haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to ſummon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he muſt anſwer to his name, and come and fight, or elſe to loſe the honour of the crowne vnto another. But there were infinite other fields and townes (and as a man would ſay, the whole earth) which the commoditie moditie of his army by ſea gaue him choice to conquer, if he would rather haue followed the ſteppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Ageſilaus himſelfe: who did patiently abide no leſſe tumults within the citie ſelfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to ſummon him to come out to fight for all the reſt of his countrey. And in ÆGYPT alſo he did abide many falſe accuſations againſt him, wherewith the king himſelfe did burthen him, praying him alwaies to haue a litle patience. In fine, hauing followed the beſt counſel which he had determined with himſelfe from the beginning, he ſaued the ÆGYPTIANS againſt their wils: and furthermore, he did not onely keepe the citie of SPARTA, from ſo great a danger, but did alſo ſet vp tokens of triumph in the ſame againſt the THEBANS, whereby he was not compelled at that time to leade them out to the ſlaughter; and beſides that, gaue his citizens occaſion to obtaine victorie afterwards. Hereupon Ageſilaus was highly praiſed of them, whoſe liues he had ſaued againſt their wils. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themſelues through whom he had offended: yet ſome ſay, that he was deceiued by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the moſt part of the money to himſelfe which he had brought out of ASIA, did haſten and perſwade Pompey to giue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true, a worthy Captaine ſhould not ſo lightly haue bene brought into errour, vpon a falſe account, to hazard himſelfe to looſe all. Thus may we ſee what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore, for their iourney into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force, the other willingly went thither with ſmall honour, for moneys ſake to ſerue the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the GRECIANS. Laſtly, in that which we accuſe the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompeys ſake, for the like matter doe they againe accuſe Ageſilaus. For the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he truſted: and Ageſilaus forſooke them which truſted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight againſt them.

HAuing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander; and of Iulius Cæsar, that ouercame Pompey; and being to speake of many things, I will vse none other preface, but onely desire the readers not to blame me though I doe not declare all things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in those, their noblest acts and most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intẽt is not to write histories, but onely liues. For the noblest deeds do not alwaies shew mens vertues and vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport makes mens naturall dispositions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battels won, wherein are slaine ten thousand men; or the great armies, or cities won by siege, or assault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other parts of the body, do take the resemblances of the face and fauor of the countenance, in the which consisteth the iudgement of their maners and disposition: euen so they must giue vs leaue to seeke out the signes and tokens of the mind onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to write the wars, battels, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was descended from Hercules by Caranus, and that by his mothers side, he came of the bloud of the Æacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancy with his mother Olympias, which at that time also was a young maiden, and an orphã without father or mother, in the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the mistery and fraternity of the house of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whose consent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, & that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about in diuers flames. King Philip her husband also, shortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did seale his wiues belly, and that the seale where with he sealed, left behind the print of a Lion. Certaine wisards and soothsayers told Philip, that this dreame gaue him warning to looke straightly to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceiued with child; for that they do not seale a vessell that hath nothing in it: and that she was with child with a boy, which should haue a Lions heart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay asleepe in her bed, there was seene a serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefest cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips loue & kindnes from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared ſome charme or enchantmẽt, or elſe for that he thought himſelfe vnmeete for her companie, ſuppoſing her to be beloued of ſome god. Some do alſo report this after another ſort: as in this maner. That the women in thoſe parts of long time, haue been comonly poſſeſt with the ſpirit of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Cleodones, & Mimallones (as much as warlike and fierce) & do many things like vnto the women of EDONIA & THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Treskeuin (ſignifying in the Greek tong, too ſuperſtitiouſly giuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other women, louing to be inſpired with ſuch diuine madnes & fury, did celebrate her ſolemne ſacrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous maner. For in theſe dances to Bacchus, ſhe caried a great number of tame ſnakes about her, the which gliding vpon the Iuie wherewith the women were dreſſed in thoſe ceremonies, & winding themſelues about the litle iauelins they had in their hands, and the garlands about their heads, thereby they made men the more afraid of them. Wherupon Philip after this dreame, ſent Charo MEGALIPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to enquire what it ſignified. Anſwer was giuen him, that he ſhould doe ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammõ, & honor him aboue al gods: & that he had loſt one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber doore, ſaw the god in forme of a ſnake lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratoſthenes writeth) bidding her ſon farwel when he went to conquer ASIA, after ſhe had ſecretly told him alone, by whom he was begotten, ſhe prayed him to be valiant, and to ſhew himſelfe worthy his ſonne that begate him. Others tell alſo, that ſhe was angry with this report, ſaying: Will Alexander neuer leaue to make me ſuſpected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the ſixth day of the moneth of Hecatombœon, (in Engliſh, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very ſame day, the temple of Diana in the citie of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegeſias MAGNESIAN doth witnes, whoſe crie and exclamatiõ was ſo terrible and cold, that it was enough to haue quẽched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana ſuffered her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, buſie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the Prieſts, Magitians and ſoothſayers, which were at that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognoſticate ſome maruellous great misfortune to come, like men beſtraught of their wits, they ran vp and downe the city ſmiting of their faces, and crying, that ſome great plague and miſchiefe was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had won ỹ city of POTIDÆA, three meſſengers came to him the ſame day that brought him great newes: The firſt, that Parmenio had won a notable battel of the ILLYRIANS: the ſecond, that his horſe onely wan the bel and prize at the Olympian games: and the third, that his wife had brought him a ſonne called Alexander. Philip being maruellous glad to heare theſe newes, the ſoothſayers did make his ioy yet greater: aſſuring him, that his ſonne which was borne with three victories altogether, ſhould be inuincible. Now for his ſtature and perſonage, the ſtatues and images made of him by Lyſippus do beſt declare it, for that he would be drawne of no man but him onely. Diuerſe of his ſucceſſours and friends did afterwards counterfeit his image, but that excellent workeman Lyſippus onely, of all other the chiefeſt, hath perfectly drawne and reſembled Alexanders manner of holding his necke, ſomewhat hanging downe towards the left ſide, and alſo the ſweet looke and caſt of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not ſhew his freſh colour, but made him ſomewhat blacke, and ſwarter then his face indeede was: for naturally he had a very faire white colour mingled alſo with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breaſt. I remember I read alſo in the commentaries of Ariſtoxenus, that his skin had a maruellous good ſauour, and that his breath was very ſweet: inſomuch that his bodie had ſo ſweet a ſmell, of it ſelfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a paſſing delightfull ſauour, as if it had been perfumed. And the cauſe hereof paraduenture might be the very temperature & conſtitution of his body, which was hote and burning like fire. For Theophraſtus is of opinion, that the ſweet ſauor cometh by meanes of the heat that drieth vp the moiſture of the body. By which reaſon alſo it appeareth, that the dry and hote countries parched with heat of the Sun, are thoſe that deliuer vnto vs the beſt ſpices: becauſe that the Sunne drieth vp the moiſture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, and to be haſty. Euen from his childhood they ſaw that he was giuen to be chaſt, For though otherwiſe he was very hot & haſty, yet was he hardly moued with luſt or pleaſure of the body, & wold moderatly vſe it. But on the other ſide, the ambitiõ & deſire he

he had of honor, ſhewed a certaine greatneſſe of mind and noble courage, paſſing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) deſirous of al kind of glorie: who like a Rhetoritian had a delight to vtter his eloquence, and ſtamped in his coines, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games, by the ſwift running of his horſe and coaches. For when he was asked one day (becauſe he was ſwift of foot) whether he would aſſay to run for victorie at the Olympian games: I could be content, ſaid he, ſo I might run with kings. And yet to ſpeak generally, he miſliked all ſuch cõtention for games. For it ſeemeth that he vtterly miſliked all wreſtling & other exerciſe for priſe where men did vſe all their ſtrength: but otherwiſe he himſelfe made certaine feſtiuall daies and games of priſe for common ſtageplayers, muſitians and ſingers, and for the very Poets alſo. He delighted alſo in hunting of diuers kinds of beaſts, & playing at the ſtaffe. Ambaſſadors being ſẽt on a time from the king of PERSIA; whileſt his father was in ſome iourney out of his realme: Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, ſo wan them with his courteous entertainment (for that he vſed no childiſh queſtions vnto them, nor asked thẽ trifling matters, but what diſtance it was from one place to another, and which way they went into the high countries of ASIA, & of the king of PERSIA himſelfe, how he was towards his enemies, and what power he had) that he did rauiſh them with delight to heare him, inſomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence and ſharpe wit, in reſpect of his ſons courage and noble mind, to attempt great enterpriſes. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken ſome famous citie, or had won ſome great battel, he was nothing glad to heare it, but wold ſay to his play-fellowes: Sirs, my father will haue al, I ſhall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that ſhall be ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleaſure nor riches, but only in valiantnes and honour, thought that the greater conqueſts and realmes his father ſhould leaue him, the leſſe he ſhold haue to do for himſelfe. And therfore, ſeeing that his fathers dominions and Empire increaſed daily more & more, perceiuing all occaſion taken from him to doe any great attempt, he deſired no riches nor pleaſure, but wars & battels, and aſpired to a ſigniorie where he might win honor. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be ſuppoſed) to bring him vp: as ſchoolemaſters, gouernors, & grooms of his chamber to attend vpon him: and among thoſe, Leonidas was the chiefeſt man that had the gouernment and charge of him, a man of a ſeuere diſpoſition, & a kinſman alſo vnto the queene Olympias. He miſliked to be called a maſter or tutor, though it be an office of good charge; wherupon others called him Alexanders gouernour, becauſe he was a noble man, and allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his ſchoolmaſter, was Lyſimachus an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other maner of ciuility in him, ſauing that he called himſelfe Phœnix, Alexander Achilles, and Philip Peleus: and therefore he was well thought of, and was the ſecond perſon next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephall the horſe to ſel vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talents, they went into the field to ride him. The horſe was found ſo rough and churliſh, that the riders ſaid he would neuer do ſeruice; for he would let no man get vpon his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voices about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon Philip being afraid commanded them to cary him away as a wild beaſt, and altogether vnprofitable: the which they had done, had not Alexander that ſtood by ſaid: O gods, what a horſe do they turne away, for lacke of skill and heart to handle him? Philip heard what he ſaid, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his words, ſeeming to be ſorry that they ſhould ſend the horſe backe againe: why, ſaid Philip, doſt thou controle them that haue more experience then thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horſe? Alexander anſwered, and yet me thinkes I ſhould handle him better then all they haue done. But if thou canſt not, no more then they, replied Philip, what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly? I am content (quoth Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horſe. Euery man laughed to heare his anſwer and the wager was laid between them. Then ran Alexander to the horſe, & took him by the bridle: and turned him towards the Sun. It ſeemed that he had marked (as I ſuppoſe) how mad the horſe was to ſee his owne ſhadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he ſtirred too and fro. Then Alexander ſpeaking gently to the horſe, and clapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his furie and ſnorting, ſofily let fall his cloake from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any danger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without ſtriking or ſtirring the horſe, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he ſaw that the fury of the horſe was paſt, and that he began to gallop, he put him to his full career, and laid on ſpurs and voice a good. Philip at the firſt with feare beholding his ſons agilitie, leſt he ſhould take ſome hurt, ſaid neuer a word: but when he ſaw him readily turne the horſe at the end of his career, in a brauery for that he had done, all the lookers on gaue a ſhout for ioy. The father on the other ſide (as they ſay) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horſe, he ſaid vnto him kiſſing his head: O ſonne, thou muſt needs haue a realme that is meet for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, conſidering that of nature he was not to be won by extreamitie, and that by gentle meanes and perſwaſion he could make him doe what he would, he euer ſought rather to perſwade then command him in any thing he had to doe. Now Philip putting no great affiance in his ſchoolemaſters of muſicke and humanitie, for the inſtruction and education of his ſonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of greater learning then their capacities would reach vnto: and that as Sophocles ſaith,

Philip prophecieth of his ſonne Alexander.

He needed many reines, and many bits at once:

Ariſtotle was Alexanders ſchoolemaſter. Ariſtotle borne in the citie of Stagira.

He ſent for Ariſtotle (the greateſt Philoſopher in his time and beſt learned) to teach his ſon, vnto whom he gaue honorable ſtipend. For Philip hauing wonne & taken before, the city of STAGIRA, where Ariſtotle was borne, for his ſake he built it again, and repleniſhed it with inhabitants which fled away, or otherwiſe were in bondage. He appointed thē for a ſchoolehouſe and dwelling place, the pleaſāt houſe that is by the citie of MIEZA. In that place are yet ſeene ſeats of ſtone which Ariſtotle cauſed to be made, & cloſe walks to walke in the ſhadow. It is thought alſo, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariſtotle morall Philoſophy and humanity, but alſo he heard of him, other more ſecret, hard, and graue doctrine, which Ariſtotles ſcholers do properly cal Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things ſpeculatiue, which requireth the maſters teaching to vnderſtand them, or elſe are kept frō cōmon knowledge: which ſciences, they did not comonly teach. Alexander being paſſed into ASIA, and hearing that Ariſtotle had put out certaine books of that matter, for the honors ſake of Philoſophy: he wrote a letter vnto him, ſomewhat too plaine, and of this effect. Alexander vnto Ariſtotle greeting, Thou haſt not done wel to put forth the Acroamaticall ſciences. For wherein ſhall we excell other, if thoſe things which thou haſt ſecretly taught vs, be made common to all? I do thee to vnderſtand, that I had rather excell others in excellencie of knowledge then in greatnes of power. Farwell. Whereunto Ariſtotle to pacifie this his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that theſe bookes were publiſhed, and not publiſhed. For to ſay truly, in al his treatiſes which he called μετὰ τὰ φυσικά there is no plain inſtruction profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himſelf, nor yet to be taught by any other then Ariſtotole himſelf, or his ſcholers. So that it is written as a memorial for thē that haue bin entred & brought vp in the Peripateticke ſect & doctrine. It ſeemeth alſo, that it was Ariſtotle aboue al other, that made Alexander take delight to ſtudy Phyſicke. For Alexander did not only like the knowledge of ſpeculation, but wold exerciſe practiſe alſo, and helpe his friends when they were ſicke: & made beſides certaine remedies, & rules to liue by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his owne nature he was much giuen to his booke & deſired to reade much. He learned alſo the Iliades of Homer of Ariſtotoles correctiō, which they cal τὴν ἐκ τοῦ πάρδικος the corrected, as hauing paſſed vnder the rule: & laid it euery night vnder his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Oneſicrates writeth) the inſtitution of martiall diſcipline, And when he was in the high countries of ASIA, where he could not readily come by other books, he wrote vnto Harpalus to ſend thē to him. Harpalus ſent him the hiſtories of Philiſtus, with diuers tragedies of Eurypides, Sophocles, and Æſchylus: & certaine hymnes of Teleſtus & Philoxenus. Alexander did reuerence Ariſtotle at the firſt, as his father, & ſo he tearmed him: becauſe from his natural father he had life, but frō him, the knowledge to liue. But afterwards he ſuſpected him ſomewhat; yet he did him no hurt, neither was he ſo friendly to him as he had been: whereby men perceiued that he did not beare him the goodwill he was wont to do. This notwithſtanding, he left not that zeale and deſire he had to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he had learned from his youth, and ſtill continued with him. For he ſhewed diuerſe teſtimonies thereof. As the honour he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philoſopher. The fiftie talents which he ſent vnto Xenocrates, Damdamis, and Calanus: of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but ſixteene yeares old, was left his Lieutenant in MACEDON, with the cuſtodie and charge of his great ſeale: at what time he alſo ſubdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled againſt him; and hauing won their city by aſſault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it, of ſundry nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to ſay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his father at the battell of CHÆRONEA againſt the GRECIANS, where it was reported reported, that it was he that gaue charge first of all vpon the holy band of the THEBANES. Furthermore, there was an old oke seene in my time, which the countrimen commonly call Alexanders oke, because his tent or pauilion was fastned to it: and not farre from thence is the charnell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were slaine at the battel. For these causes, his father Philip loued him very dearely, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander king, and himself their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fel out in his court afterwards by reason of Philips new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and strife amongst the women: for the mischiefe of dissention & iealousie of women, doth separate the harts of kings one from another, whereof was chiefest cause, the sharpenesse of Olympias, who being a iealous woman, fretting, and of a reuenging mind, did incense Alexander against his father. But the chiefe cause that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus, at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, falling in fancy with her when himselfe was past mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and hauing in his cups, he perswaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feast, to pray to the gods, that they might haue a lawfull heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to succeed him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith, threw a cup at his head, and said vnto him: Why, traitor, what am I? dost thou take me for a bastard? Philip seeing that, rose from the boord, and drew out his sword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, said he to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPE into ASIA, and stepping onely from one bed to another, ye see him laid along on the ground. After this great insolencie, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, and carying her into his country of EPIRVS, he left her there, and himself afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demaratus CORINTHIAN, a friend of king Philips, and very familiar with him, came to see him. Philip when he had courteously welcomed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agree together. Truly, O king, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is so full of quarell and contention. These words nipped Philip in such sort, and caused him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he sent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come back againe. Now when Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (desiring for necessities sake, to enter in league and friendship with Philip) offered his eldest daughter in mariage vnto Aridæus king Philips son, and had sent Aristocritus ambassador into MACEDON for that purpose: the friends of Alexander and his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports & suspitions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduance Aridæus, to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire in the kingdome. Alexander being netled therewith, sent one Thessalus a player of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus, to perswade him to leaue Aridæus, that was a bastard and a foole, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleased Pexodorus far better, to haue Alexander his son in law, then Aridæus. Philip vnderstanding this, went himselfe into Alexanders chamber, taking Philotas with him (the son of Parmenio) one of his familiars, and bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a base mind, & was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would cast himselfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a slaue and subiect of a barbarous king. Thereupon he wrote letters vnto CORINTH, that they should send Thessalus bound vnto him. And furthermore, he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius and Ptolomie, his sonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, and placed thē in great authoritie about him. Shortly after, Pausanias sustaining villanie by the counsel and commandement of Attalus and Cleopatra, craning iustice of Philip, & finding no amends, he conuerted all his anger against him, and for spite slue him himself. Of this murther, most men accused Queene Olympias, who (as it is reported) alluring this yong man, hauing iust cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspition of this murther. For some say that Pausanias after this villany was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had been abused: who recited these verses of Euripides to him, in the tragedie of Medea, where she said in anger, that she would be reuenged:

Both of the bridegroome, and the bride,
And of the father in law.

Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent search to be made, and all them to be seuerely punished that were of the conspiracie: and was angry also that his mother Olympias had cruelly

The beginning of Alexanders reigne.

ſlaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuied and hated of dangerous enemies, and euery way full of danger. For the barbarous nations that were neare neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of ſtrangers, but deſired to haue their naturall kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GREECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing a litle altered ỹ gouernments, had through his inſolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long been acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders councell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troubleſome time, were of opinion, that Alexander ſhould vtterly forſake the affaires of GREECE, and not to follow them with extremity, but that he ſhold ſeeke to win the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled againſt him, & wiſely to remedy theſe new ſtirs. But he far otherwiſe determined to ſtabliſh his ſafety by courage and magnanimity: perſwading himſelfe, that if they ſaw him ſtoope and yeeld at the beginning, how litle ſo euer it were, euery one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he ſtraight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them ſodainely with his army, by the riuer of DANVBY, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that ỹ THEBANS were reuolted, and that the ATHENIANS alſo were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his army towards the ſtraight of Thermopiles, ſaying that he wold make Demoſthenes the Orator ſee (who in his orations, whileſt he was in ILLYRIA, and in the countrey of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was growne a ſtripling paſſing through THESSALIE, and ſhould find him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his army vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to giue them of the city occaſion to repent them: and therefore onely demanded Phœnix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and ſafety vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The THEBANS on the other ſide, demanded of him Philotas and Antipater, two of his chiefeſt ſeruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that all ſuch as would defend the liberty of GREECE ſhould ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make war with all cruelty. The THEBANS alſo fought with greater courage and deſire then they were able, conſidering that their enemies were many againſt one. And on the other ſide alſo, when the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS which were within the caſtle of CADMÆA, made a ſallie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironed of all ſides, were ſlaine in maner euery one of them, their city taken, deſtroyed, and razed euen to the hard ground. This he did, ſpecially to make all the reſt of the people of GREECE afraid by example of this great calamity & miſerie of the THEBANS, to the end none of thē ſhould dare from thence-foorth once to riſe againſt him. He would cloke this cruelty of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the PHOCIANS & PLATEIANS: who complaining to him of the iniuries the THEBANS had offered, could not deny them iuſtice. Notwithſtanding, excepting the prieſts, and the religious, and all ſuch as were friends vnto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the friends and kinſmen of the poet Pindarus, & all thoſe that had diſſwaded them which were the rebels, he ſold all the reſt of the citie of THEBES for ſlaues, which amounted to the number of thirty thouſand perſons beſides thē that were ſlaine at the battel, which were ſixe thouſand moe. Now amongſt the other miſeries & calamities of the poore city of THEBES, there were certain THRACIAN ſoldiers, who hauing ſpoiled and defaced the houſe of Timoclea, a vertuous lady, & of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their Captaine hauing rauiſhed her by force, aſked her, whether ſhe had any where hidden any gold or ſiluer. The lady told him ſhe had. Then leading him into her garden, ſhe brought him vnto a wel: where ſhe ſaid ſhe had caſt al her iewels and precious things, when ſhe heard the city was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN ſtooped to looke into the wel: ſhe ſtanding behind him, thruſt him in, & then threw ſtones enough on him, and ſo killed him. The ſouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and ſo caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander ſaw her countenance, & marked her gate, he ſuppoſed her at the firſt to be ſome great lady ſhe followed the ſouldiers with ſuch a maieſtie and boldneſſe. Alexander then asking her what ſhe was: ſhe anſwered, that ſhe was the ſiſter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHÆRONEA, where being generall he was ſlaine, valiantly fighting for the defence of the liberty of GREECE. Alexander wondering at her noble anſwer and couragious deed, commanded no man ſhould touch her nor her children, and ſo freely let her go whither ſhe wold. He made league alſo with the ATHENIANS, though they were very ſory ſory for their miſerable fortune. For the day of the ſolemne feaſts of their myſteries being come they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteouſly entertaining all thoſe, that flying from THEBES came to thē for ſuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was paſt him, following therein the nature of Lyons: or becauſe that after ſo great an example of cruelty, he would ſhew a ſingular clemency againe: he did not onely pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults commited, but did alſo counſell them to looke wiſely to their doings, for their citie one day ſhould command all GREECE, if he chanced to dye. Men report, that certainely he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt ſo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cauſe that he afterwards ſhewed himſelfe more mercifull vnto diuerſe others. Afterwards alſo he did blame the fury of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being drunke, and the MACEDONIANS alſo to refuſe him to go any further to conquer the INDIANS, which was an imperfection of his enterpriſe, and a miniſhing alſo of his honour. Beſides, there was neuer THEBAN afterwards, that had eſcaped the fury of his victory, and did make any petition to him, but he had his ſuite. Thus was the eſtate of THEBES as you haue heard. Then the GRECIANS hauing aſſembled a generall councell of all the ſtates of GREECE within the ſtraights of PELOPONNESVS, there it was determined that they would make warre with the PERSIANS. Whereupon they choſe Alexander Generall of all GREECE. Then diuerſe men coming to viſite Alexander, as well philoſophers, as gouernours of ſtates, to congratulate with him for his election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at CORINTH) wold likewiſe come as the reſt had done: but when he ſaw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept ſtill in the ſuburbes of CORINTH, at a place called CRANIVM, he went himſelfe vnto him, and found him laid all along in the Sunne. When Diogenes ſaw ſo many coming towards him, he ſate vp a litle, and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteouſly ſpake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea ſaid he, that I do: that thou ſtand out of my Sunne a litle. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this anſwer, and maruelled ſo much at that great boldneſſe of this man, to ſee how ſmall account he made of him: that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, and mocking him, he told them: Maſters ſay what you liſt, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being deſirous to heare what the Oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN would ſay vnto him touching the ſucceſſe of his iourney into ASIA, he went vnto the citie of DELPHES. It chanced ſo that he came thither in the daies which they call vnfortunate, on which daies no man vſed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithſtanding, he ſent firſt vnto the Nunne which pronounced the Oracles to pray her to come vnto him. But ſhe refuſed to come, alleadging the cuſtome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander, went thither himſelfe in perſon, and brought her out by force into the temple. She ſeeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will, told him: My ſonne, for that I ſee thou art inuincible. Alexander hearing that, ſayd, he deſired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to goe on with his voyage, he had diuerſe ſignes and tokens from the gods: and amongſt other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cyprus, in the city of LEBETHRES, in thoſe daies did ſweate maruellouſly. Many men fearing that ſigne, Ariſtander the ſoothſayer bad Alexander be of good cheare, and hope well; for he ſhould obtaine noble victories that ſhould neuer be forgotten, the which ſhould make the poets and muſitians ſweate to write and ſing them. Then, for his army which he led with him, they that do ſet downe the leaſt number, ſay, that they were thirty thouſand footmen, and fiue thouſand horſmen: & they that ſay more, do write, foure and thirty thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand horſemen. Ariſtobulus writeth, that Alexander had no more but threeſcore and ten talents to pay his ſouldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouiſion of victuals, then for thirty daies only. And Oneſicritus ſayeth moreouer, that he did owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithſtanding that he began this warre with ſo ſmall ability to maintaine it, he would neuer take ſhip before he vnderſtood the ſtate of his friends, to know what ability they had to go with him, and before he had giuen vnto ſome, lands; and vnto others, a towne; and to others againe, the cuſtome of ſome hauen. Thus by his bounty, hauing in maner ſpent almoſt the reuenues of the crowne of MACEDON, Perdiccas asked him: My Lord, what will you keepe for your ſelfe? Hope, ſayd he. Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will alſo haue ſome part, ſince we go with you: and ſo refuſed the reuenew which the king had giuen him for his penſion. Many others did alſo the like. But ſuch as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very frankly, and in such liberalitie spent all the reuenew he had. With this desire and determination, he went on to the straight of HELLESPONT, and going to the citie of ILIVM he did sacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially vnto Achilles, whose graue he anointed with oile, and ranne naked round about it with his familiars, according to the ancient custome of funerals. Then he couered it with nosegaies and flowers, saying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent herauld to sing his praise. When he had done, and went vp and downe the citie to see all the monuments and notable things there, one asked him, if he would see Paris harpe. He answered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who played and sung vpon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of PERSIA, hauing leauied a great army, sent his Captaines and Lieutenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely barre to stop his entry into ASIA. Moreouer, the Captaines of the councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the banke on the other side, which was very high and steepe, and could not be won without fighting. And some sayd also that he should haue speciall care of the ancient regard of the moneth: because the kings of MACEDON did neuer vse to put the army into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is Iune. For that, sayd Alexander, we will remedy soone: let them call it the second moneth, Artemisium, which is May. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he shold not meddle the first day, because it was very late. Alexander made answer againe, that HELLESPONT wold blush for shame, if he were now afraid to passe ouer the riuer, since he had already come ouer an arme of the sea. Thereupon he himselfe first entred the riuer with thirteene guidons of horsemen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies shot at him, as he was coming vp the other banke, which was very high and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which staied to receiue him in battell ray, thrusting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne so swift, that it almost caried them downe the streame: insomuch that men thought him more rash then wise, to leade his men with such danger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great ado recouered the other side, specially because the earth slidde away, by reason of the mudde. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight pell mell man to man, because his enemies did set vpon the first that were passed ouer, before they could put themselues into battell ray, with great cries, keeping their horses very close together; and fought first with their darts, and afterwards came to the sword when their darts were broken. Then many of them set vpon him alone, for he was easilie to be knowne aboue the rest by his shield, and the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung from the one side to the other, a maruellous faire white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roesaces and Spithridates, both two chiefe Captaines of the PERSIANS, setting vpon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Roesaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him such a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his sword. But so soone as they two had closed together, Spithridates comming at the one side of him, raised himselfe vpon his stirrops, and gaue Alexander with all his might such a blow on his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creast off his helmet, and one of the sides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to strike Alexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thrust him through with a partisan; and at the very same instant, Roesaces fell dead from his horse with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his sword. Now whilest the horsemen fought with such furie, the squadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS footmen had passed the riuer, and both the battels began to march one against the other. The PERSIANS stucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight turned their backes and fled, sauing the GRECIANS which tooke pay of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horse killed vnder him, being thrust through the flanke with a sword. This was not Bucephall, but another horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurt amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were slaine at this first battell, twenty thousand footmen of these barbarous people, and

and two thousand fiue hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were slaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantnesse, caused euery one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targets, which he had won at the battell; and generally vpon all the other spoiles he put this honorable inscription: Alexander the sonne of Philip, & the Grecians, excepting the Lacedæmonians, haue wonne this spoile vpon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of gold or siluer, also purple silkes, or other such precious things which he got among ỹ PERSIANS, he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victorie of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the city selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the lest through all the low countries and coasts vpon the sea, yeelded straight vnto him; and the rest also, sauing HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did still resist him: howbeit at length, he tooke them by force. When he had so conquered all there about, he stood in doubt afterwards what were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruellous desire, hotly to follow Darius whersoeuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. Another time againe, he thought it better first to occupie himselfe in conquering these low countries, and to make himselfe strong with the money and riches he should find among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the country of LYDIA neare vnto the city XANTHVM, they say, there is a spring that brake of it self, & ouerflowing the banks about it, cast out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which said: that the kingdome of the PERSIANS should be destroyed by the GRECIANS. This did further so encourage Alexander, that he made hast to cleare all the sea coast, euen as far as CILICIA & PHOENICIA. But the wonderful good successe he had, running along all the coast of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuerse historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying: that it was one of the wonders of the world, that the fury of the sea, which vnto all other was extreme rough, and many times would swell ouer the tops of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Menander himselfe in a comedy of his, doth witnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merily he sayth:

O great Alexander, how great is thy state?
For thou with thy selfe mayest thus iustly debate:
If any man liuing I list for to call,
He cometh, and humbly before me doth fall.
And if through the surges my iourney do ly,
The waues giue me way, and the sea becomes dry.

Yet Alexander himselfe simply writeth in his epistles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passed a place called the ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke ship in the citie of PHASELIDES. There he remained many daies: and when he saw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN, standing in the market place, he went in a daunce thither one euening after supper, and cast flowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memory of the dead, though it seemed but in sport; for that he was his companion when he liued, by meanes of Aristotle and his philosophy. After that he ouercame also the PISIDIANS, who thought to haue resisted him; and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the city of GORDIVS, which is said to be the anciẽt seat of king Midas, he saw the charret that is so much spoken of, which is bound with the barke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: that whosoeuer could vndoe the band of that barke, was certainly ordained to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing to vndoe the band, and finding no ends to vndoe it by, they were so many fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his sword, and cut the knot in the middest: so that then many ends appeared. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret, and so seuered them asunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS and CAPPADOCIANS; and vnderstood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius Generall of his army by sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination, to leade his army into the high countries of Asia. Then did king Darius himselfe come against Alexander, hauing leauied a great power at Svsa, of sixe hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wisards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he saw all the army of the Macedonians on a fire, and Alexander seruing of him in the selfe same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predecessor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he suddenly vanished from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that the Macedonians should haue noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all Asia, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Artgandes vnto the king: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in Cilicia, supposing it had been for that he was affraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sickenesse he had, the which some say he got by extreme paines and trauell, & others also, because he washed himself in the riuer Cydnus, which was cold as Ice. Howsoeuer it came, there was none of the other physitians that durst vndertake to cure him, thinking his disease vncurable, and no medicins to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing also that the Macedonians would lay it to their charge, if Alexander miscaried. But Philip Acarnanian, considering his master was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his loue and good will towards him, thought he should not do that became him, if he did not proue (seeing him in extremity & danger of life) the vtmost remedies of phisicke, what danger soeuer he put himselfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to minister vnto Alexander, and perswaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrot him a letter from the campe, aduertising him, that he should beware of Philip his physitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches that he would giue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his master Alexander when he had read this letter, laid it vnder his beds head, and made none of his neareſt familiars acquainted therewith. When the houre came that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he should drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, and withall, chearfully tooke the cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the sight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one instant, they looked one vpon another, howbeit not both with like chearefull countenance. For Alexander looked merily vpon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his physitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the physitian also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be so falsly accused; and straight lift vp his hands to heauen, calling the gods to witnesse, that he was innocent; and then came to Alexanders bed side, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to do as he would aduise him. The medicine beginning to worke ouercame the disease, and draue for the time, all his naturall strength and powers to the lowest parts of his bodie: in so much as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weakenesse, and almost swounding, that his pulse did scant beate, and his sences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few daies recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himselfe openly vnto the Macedonians: for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health vntill they had seene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a Macedonian, and banisht out of his countrey, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Darius meant to meete with Alexander within the straights and vallies of the mountaines, besought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him; considering that he had a great hoast of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was most for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius answered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replyed: For that O king, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he wil come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way coming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntas could not turne Darius from making his camp to march towards Cilicia. At the selfe same time also, Alexander went towards Syria to meet with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them missed the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this hap, and making hast to meet with his enemie within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the ſtraights, began then to find the fault and error committed: for that he had ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraights (holden in on the one ſide with the mountaine, and on the other with the ſea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ranne betweene both) and that he was driuen to diſperſe his army into diuerſe companies, in a ſtony and ill fauored country, ill for horſemen to trauel; being on the contrary ſide a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footmen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wiſh it to fight for his aduantage, ſo could he tell excellently well how to ſet his men in battell ray to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leſſe number by many then his enemie, yet he had ſuch policy and caſt with him, that he foreſaw all, and would not be enuironed. For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further then he did his left wing, and fighting himſelfe in the left wing in the formoſt rankes, he made al the barbarous people flie that ſtood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a ſword. Chares writeth, that Darius ſelfe did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithſtanding Alexander ſelfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater, ſayth, that indeed he was hurt on the thigh with a ſword, howbeit it put him to no danger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurt him. Thus hauing won a famous victory, and ſlaine aboue a hundred and ten thouſand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius, becauſe he fled, hauing ſtill foure or fiue furlongs vantage before him: howbeit he tooke his charret of battell wherein he fought, and his bow alſo. Then he returned from the chaſe, and found the MACEDONIANS ſacking and ſpoiling all the reſt of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches, (although they had left the moſt part of their cariage behind them in the citie of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battel) but yet reſerued for himſelfe all king Darius tent, which was full of great number of officers, of rich moueables, and of gold and ſiluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bath and ſayd: Come on, let vs go and and waſh off the ſweate of the battel in Darius owne bath. Nay, replyed one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath: for the goods of the vanquiſhed are rightly the vanquiſhers. When he came into the bath, and ſaw the baſons and cures, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chambers perfumed paſſing ſweetly, that it was like a paradiſe: then going out of his bath, and coming into his tent, ſeeing it ſo ſtately and large, his bed, the table, and ſupper, and all ready in ſuch ſumptuous ſort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and ſayd: This was a king indeed, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to go to his ſupper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongſt other Ladies taken priſoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried: who hauing ſeene his charret and bow, burſt out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themſelues, thinking Darius had been ſlaine, Alexander pawſed a good while and gaue no anſwer, pitying more their misfortune, then reioycing at his owne good hap. Then he preſently ſent one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderſtand, that Darius was aliue, and that they ſhould not neede to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they ſhould haue at his hands all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his hands. As theſe words pleaſed the captiue Ladies, ſo the deeds that followed, made them finde his clemency to be no leſſe. For firſt, he ſuffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they would, euen of them that had been ſlaine in the battell, and to take as much ſilkes of the ſpoiles, iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honour their funerals with: and alſo did leſſen no part of their honour, nor of the number of their officers and ſeruants, nor of any iot of their eſtate which they had before, but did alow them alſo greater penſions then they had before. But aboue all, the princelieſt grace, and moſt noble fauour that Alexander ſhewed vnto theſe captiue Princeſſes, which had alwaies liued in honourable fame and chaſtitie, was this: That they neuer heard word, or ſo much as any ſuſpition that ſhould make them afraid to be diſhonoured or deflowred: but were priuately amongſt themſelues, vnuiſited or repaired vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had been in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had been kept in ſome cloſe monaſtery: although Darius wife (as it is written) was paſſing faire, as Darius alſo was a goodly Prince, and that his daughters likewiſe did reſemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I ſuppoſe, to conquer himſelfe, then to ouercome his enemies, did neither touch them, nor any other maide or wife, before he maried them, Barſine onely excepted; who being left Memnons widow (Generall of king Darius by ſea) was taken by the citie of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kings daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenioes procurement (as Ariſtobulus writeth) who intiſed him to imbrace the company of ſo excellent a woman, and paſſing faire beſides. Furthermore, beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies beſide which were priſoners, what goodly faire women they were, he ſpake it pleaſantly, that the Ladies of PERSIA made mens eyes ſore to behold them. Notwithſtanding, preferring the beautie of his continency before their ſweete faire faces, he paſſed by without any ſparke of affection towards them, more then if they had been images of ſtone without life. To confirme this; Philoxenus whom he had left his Lieutenant in the low countries vpon the ſea coaſt, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a merchant of TARENTVM, had to ſell two goodly yong boyes, maruellous faire: and therefore that he ſent vnto him to know his pleaſure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was ſo offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O my friends, what villany hath euer Philoxenus ſeene in me, that he ſhould deuiſe (hauing nothing to do there) to purchaſe me ſuch infamy? whereupon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull words, that he ſhould ſend that vile TARENTINE merchant Theodorus and his merchandiſe to the Deuill. He ſharply puniſhed alſo one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beautie bare the onely name in CORINTH) and bring him to him. Another time alſo, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowred two of the ſouldiers wiues that were ſtrangers, and waged of him, he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter: and if he found them guiltie of the rape, that then he ſhould put them both to death, as bruit beaſts borne to deſtroy mankind. And in that letter he wrote thus of himſelfe: For my ſelfe, ſaid he, I haue neither ſeene, nor deſired to ſee Darius wife: neither haue I ſuffered any ſpeech of her beautie before me. Moreouer he ſaid, that he did vnderſtand that he was mortall by theſe two things: to wit, ſleepe, and luſt: for, from the weakneſſe of our nature proceedeth ſleepe, and ſenſuallity. He was alſo no greedy-gut, but temperate in eating, as he ſhewed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he ſayd vnto the princeſſe Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For when (for the loue ſhe bare him) ſhe daily ſent him ſundry delicate diſhes of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and beſides the meate it ſelfe, the paſtlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he anſwered that he could not tell what to do with them, for he had better cookes then thoſe, appointed him by his gouernour Leonydas, to wit: for his dinner, to riſe before day, and to march by night: and for his ſupper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, ſayd he, would oftentimes open the cheſts where my bedding and apparrell lay, to ſee if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceipts among them. Furthermore, he was leſſe giuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, becauſe he ſate long at the boord, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound ſometedious matter, and yet but when he was at leiſure. For hauing matters to do, there was neither feaſt, banket, play, marriage, nor any paſtime that could ſtay him: as they had done other Captaines, The which appeareth plainely by the ſhortneſſe of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deeds he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leyſure, after he was vp in the morning, firſt of all he would do ſacrifice to the gods, and then would go to dinner, paſſing away all the reſt of the day, in hunting, writing ſomething, taking vp ſome quarrell betweene ſouldiers, or elſe in ſtudying. If he went any iourney of no haſtie buſineſſe, he would exerciſe himſelfe by the way as he went, ſhooting in his bow, or learning to get vp or out of his charret ſuddenly as it ranne. Oftentimes alſo for his paſtime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birds, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances of euery day. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and annoint himſelfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers, if his ſupper were ready. He would euer ſuppe late, and was very curious to ſee, that euerie man at his boord were alike ſerued; and would ſit long at the table, becauſe he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before, Otherwiſe he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite vpon, and as pleaſant, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelineſſe to adorne a prince, ſauing that he would be ſome thing ouer buſie in glorying of his owne deeds, much like vnto a bragging ſouldier: neither was he contented himſelfe to pleaſe his owne humour that way, but would alſo ſuffer his familiars to ſooth him euen

to his teeth. And this was many times the deſtruction of honeſt men about him, the which would neuer praiſe him in his preſence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durſt ſay leſſe of the praiſes which they gaue him. For of the firſt they were aſhamed, and by the ſecond they fell in danger. After ſupper, he would waſh himſelfe againe, and ſleepe vntill noone the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For himſelfe, he was nothing curious of daintie diſhes: for when any did ſend him rare fruites, or fiſh, from the countries neare the ſea ſide, he would ſend them abroad vnto his friends, & ſeldome keepe any thing for himſelf. His table notwithſtanding was alwaies very honourably ſerued, and did ſtill increaſe his fare, as he did enlarge his conqueſts, till it came to the ſumme of ten thouſand drachmaes a day. But there he ſtayed, and would not exceede that ſumme: and moreouer, commanded all men that would feaſt him, that they ſhould not ſpend aboue that ſumme. After this battel of Issvs, he ſent vnto the city of Damas, to take all the gold and ſiluer, the cariage, & all the women and children of the Persians which were left there, where the men of armes of the Thessalians ſped them full well: for therefore did he ſend them thither, becauſe he ſaw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and ſo were the reſt of his army alſo well ſtored with money. There the Macedonians hauing taſted firſt of the gold, ſiluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by ſent do follow the tracke of beaſts, euen ſo were they greedie to follow after the goods of the Persians. Firſt Alexander thought it beſt to winne all the ſea coaſt. Thither came the Kings of Cyprvs and Phoenicia, and deliuered vp to him the whole Iland and all Phoenicia, ſauing onely the citie of Tyre. That citie he beſieged ſeuen monethes together by land, with great bulwarkes & diuers engines of batterie, and by ſea, with two hundred gallies. During this ſiege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the citie, and called him by his name: and there were diuers Tyrians alſo that dreamed in like ſort, that Apollo told them that he would go vnto Alexander, becauſe he was not pleaſed with their doings in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image (which was of a wonderfull bigneſſe) with great chaines, and nailed him downe faſt to the baſe, as if he had bene a traitor that would haue yeelded himſelfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauouring Alexander. Alexander had there alſo another dreame: for he dreamed he ſaw a Satyre a farre off ſporting with him, and when he thought to haue come neare to haue taken him, he ſtill eſcaped from him: vntil at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his hands. The Soothſayers being asked what this dreame ſhould ſignifie, anſwered probably, by deuiding Satyros into two, and then it is σὰ τύρος which ſignifieth, the city of Tyre ſhall be thine. And they do yet ſhew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he ſaw the Satyre. Continuing this ſiege, he went to make warre with the Arabians, that dwell vpon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being caſt away onely becauſe he heard his tutor Lyſimachus that followed him, ſay boaſtingly, that he was not inferiour, nor older then the Phœnix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horſes, and went vp on foote: and Alexander was of ſo courteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lyſimachus behind him, (who was ſo wearie that he could go no further) but becauſe it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encourage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes vnawares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted beſides: moreouer, it was verie cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiuing diuers fires which the enemies had made, ſome in one place, and ſome in another, truſting to his valiantneſſe, hauing alwayes prouided remedie in extremitie, when the Macedonians were diſtreſſed, himſelfe euer putting too his owne hand, he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him; and killing two of the barbarous people that lay by the fire ſide, he ſnatched away a fire-brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire, At this the barbarous people were ſo affraid, that they ranne their way as faſt as they could. Other alſo thinking to come and ſet vpon him, he ſlue them euery man, and ſo lay there that night, himſelfe and his men without danger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the ſiege of Tyre, that fell out thus. Alexander cauſed the moſt part of his armie to take reſt, being ouerharried and wearied with ſo many battels as they had fought: and ſent a few of his men onely to giue aſſault vnto the citie, to keepe the Tyrians occupied, that they ſhould take no reſt. One day the Soothſayer Ariſtander ſacrificing vnto the gods, hauing conſidered of the ſignes of the intrailes of the beaſts, did assure them that were present, that the city should be taken by the latter end of the moneth. Euery body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very last day of the moneth. Alexander seeing him amated, as one that could not tel what to say to it, seeking euer to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothsayers did prognosticate, commanded them that they should not reckon that day the thirtieth day, but the seuen and twentieth: and immediatly vpon it made the trumpet sound the allarme, & gaue a hotter assault to the wal, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valiantly on both sides, insomuch as they that were left in the campe, could not keepe in, but must needes runne to the assault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS seeing the assault so hote on euery side, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes was the city taken the selfe same day. Another time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe city of SYRIA, there fell a clod of earth vpon his shouldier, out of the which there flew a bird into the aire. The bird lighting vpon one of the engines of his batterie was caught with the nets made of sinewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines, Aristander did prognosticate, that it signified he should be hurt in his shoulder, notwithstanding, that he should yet take the towne. And indeed it came so to passe. When he sent great presents of spoyles which he wanne at the sacke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuers others of his friends: among other things, he sent vnto Leonidas his Gouernour, fiue hundred talents weight of frankensence, and a hundred talents weight of myrrhe: remembring the hope he put him into when he was a child. For, as Alexander was vpon a day sacrificing vnto the gods, he tooke both his hands full of frankensence to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his Gouernour Leonidas saw him, he said thus vnto him: When thou hast conquered the countrey where these sweete things grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to mind at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this sort: We do send thee plentie of frankensence and myrrhe, because thou shouldest no more be a niggard vnto the gods. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thing and the richest that was gotten of all the spoyles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some said one thing, some said another thing: but he said, he would put the Iliads of Homer into it, as the worthiest thing. This is confirmed by the best Historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides words, be true, then it appeareth that he did profite himselfe much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered ÆGYPT, he determined to build a great citie, and to repleniſh it with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certaine ground, which he had chosen by the aduice of his enginers and worke-masters, the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he saw an old man standing before him, full of white haires, with an honourable presence, and coming towards him said these verses:

Within the foming sea there lies a certain Iland, right
Against the shore of Ægypt, which of ancient Pharos hight.

As soone as he arose y next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nilus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broad inough, that separateth a great lake on the one side, & the sea on the other, the which doth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he said that Homer was wonderful in all his things, but that amongst others, he was an excellent Architector: and commanded that straight they should cast the platforme of the citie, according to the situation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to mark withal, wherfore they were driuē to take meale, & with that did mark out vpon the earth being blacke the compasse of the town that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall parts, either of them resembled the skirts and fashion of the MACEDONIAN cloake. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there arose vpon the sodaine out of the riuer or lake, such an infinite multitude of great fowle of all sorts, that they couered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuit, did eat vp all the meale, and left not a crumme. Alexander liked not these signes. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayer bad him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should build a citie there, so ſo plentifull of all things, that he ſhould maintaine all ſorts of people. Then he commanded them, vnto whom he had giuen the charge of the building, that they ſhould go forward with their worke, and he himſelfe in the meane time, tooke his iourney to go viſite the temple of Iupiter Hammon. The iourney was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two dangers aboue all the reſt moſt ſpeciall: the firſt was lacke of water, becauſe they had to trauell many dayes iourney through a great deſert: the ſecond was, the danger of the riſing of the South wind by the way, to blow the ſand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there aroſe ſuch a tempeſt in that deſert, that blew vp whole hils of ſand, which ſlue fifteene thouſand men of Cambyſes armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know theſe dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to diſſwade Alexander from any thing which he had a deſire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attempts, made him conſtant and reſolute in his determinations: and his noble courage beſides, made him inuincible in all things he tooke in hand; inſomuch as he did not onely compell his enemies, but he had power alſo of time and place. In that voyage, in ſtead of theſe former dangers ſpoken of, he had many helpes, the which are ſuppoſed were ſent him from the gods, by the oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certaine ſort they haue beleeued the oracles that were written of him. Firſt of all, the wonderfull water and great ſhowers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the firſt danger, and did quench their thirſt, and moiſtened the drineſſe of the ſand, in ſuch ſort that there came a ſweete freſh ayre from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to ſhew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downe they could not tell where, there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying faſt when they ſaw them follow them, and ſtayed for them when they were behind. But Challiſthenes, writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noiſe of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right way which had loſt their way. Thus Alexander in the end, hauing paſſed through this wilderneſſe, he came vnto the temple he ſought for: where the prophet or chiefe prieſt ſaluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The prieſt anſwered him, & bad him take heede he did not blaſpheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearſing that he had ſpoken, asked him, if the murtherers that had conſpired the death of Philip his father were all puniſhed. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would grant him to be King ouer all the world. The god anſwered him by the mouth of his prophet, he ſhould: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great preſents vnto the god, and gaue money largely to the prieſts and miniſters of the temple. This is that the moſt part of writers do declare, touching Alexanders demand, and the oracles giuen him. Yet did Alexander himſelfe write vnto his mother, that he had ſecret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into MACEDON. Others ſay alſo, that the prophet meaning to ſalute him in the Greeke tongue, to welcome him the better, would haue ſaid vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deare ſonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, becauſe the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an, s, for an, n, in the latter end, ſaying, O Paidies, to wit, O ſonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that miſtaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumour ſtraight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his ſon. It is ſaid alſo, that he heard Pſammon the Philoſopher in ÆGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when he ſaid that God was King of all mortall men. For (quoth he) he that commandeth all things, muſt needs be God. But Alexander ſelfe ſpake better, and like a Philoſopher, when he ſaid: that God generally was father to al mortal men, but that particularly he did elect the beſt ſort for himſelfe. To conclude, he ſhewed himſelfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainly beleeued that he had bin begotten of ſome god: but vnto the GRECIANS he ſpake more modeſtly, of diuine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the city of SAMOS, he ſaid: I gaue you not that noble free city, but it was giuen you at that time by him, whom they called my Lord and father: meaning Philip. Afterwards alſo being ſtriken with an arrow, & feeling great paine of it: My friends, ſaid he, This bloud which is ſpilt, is mans bloud, and not as Homer ſaid,

No ſuch as from th' immortall gods doth flow.

And one day alſo in a maruellous great thunder, when euery man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetoritian being preſent, ſaid vnto him: O thou ſonne of Iupiter, wilt thou do as much? No, ſaid

he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my f riends, as thou wouldst haue me: disdaining the seruice of fish to my boord, because thou seest not princes heads serued in. And ý report goeth also, that Alexander vpon a time, sending a litle fish vnto Hephæstion, Anaxarchus should say as it were in mockerie, that they which aboue others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or else as little as others haue. By these proofes & reasons alleaged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of himselfe, to think that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keep other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into ÆGYPT, he made many sacrifices, feasts, and processions in honour of the gods, sundrie dances, tragedies, and such like pastimes, goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which striued euery one to exceed the other. For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINA, in CYPRVS: and Pasicrates, Lord of the city of SOLES. For it fel out to their lot to furnish two of the excellentest players; Pasicrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus, whom Alexander loued singularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victour, by the Iudges deputed to giue sentence. For when he went from the playes, he told them he did like the Iudges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would haue bene contented to haue giuen the one halfe of his Realme, not to haue seene Thessalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the feast of Bacchus, when the Comedies & Tragedies were plaied, and a fine set on his head for his absence: he besought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penaltie. Alexander would not so do, but sent thither his money, whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent stage-player had pleased Alexander well, and did foist in a verse in his comedie, containing a petition of ten talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certaine of his friends also, to pray him to take ten thousand talents for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the countries, lands and signiories on this side the riuer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thenceforth he might be his kinseman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Among them Parmenio said vnto him: If I were Alexander, quoth he, surely I would accept his offer. So would I indeed quoth Alexander again, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit himself, he would vse him curteously: if not, that then he wold presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when king Darius wife was dead with child: for without dissimulation it grieued him much, that he had lost so noble an occasion to shew his curtesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her body honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongst the Eunuches of the Queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexanders camp, taking his horse-backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O gods, what wretched hap haue the PERSIANS! that haue not only had the wife and sister of their king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that she is dead in trauel of child, she hath bene depriued of princely burial. Then spake the eunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, and for all due honor that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For neither did Queene Statira your wife whilst she liued prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iot of their honor they were wont to haue before, sauing onely to see the light of your honour, the which, god Oromasdes grant to restore again (if it be his will) vnto your Maiestie: neither was there any honor wanting at her death (to set forth her stately funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as merciful in victory as he is valiant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in mind for very griefe, tooke the Eunuch aside into the secretest place of his tent, and said vnto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIAN, become a MACEDONIAN, but doest in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy soueraigne Lord and master: I pray thee, and do also coniure thee, by the reuerence thou beares vnto this bright light of the Sunne, and to the right hand of the King, that thou do tell me truly.

Are theſe the leaſt euils which I lament in Statira, her impriſonment and death. And did ſhe not in her life make vs more miſerable by her diſhonor, then if we had diſhonorably fallen into the hands of a cruell enemy? For, what honeſt communication, I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a priſoner: hauing done her ſo much honour as he had done? Darius going on with theſe ſpeeches, Tireus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, and beſought him not to ſay ſo, neither to blemiſh the vertue of Alexander in that ſort, nor yet ſo to diſhonour his ſiſter and wife deceaſſed; & thereby alſo to depriue himſelf of the greateſt comfort he could wiſh to haue in his calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemy that had greater vertues then a man could poſſibly haue: but rather that he ſhould wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had ſhewed himſelf chaſter to the Ladies, then valiant againſt the PERSIANS, And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honeſtie, chaſtitie and noble mind of Alexander, by many great and deepe oathes. Then Darius coming out among his friends againe, holding vp his hands vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods: O heauenly gods, creators of men, and protectors of Kings and Realmes: firſt, I beſeech you grant me, that reſtoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good eſtate, I may leaue the Realme vnto my ſucceſſors, with that glorie & fame I receiued it of my predeceſſors: that obtaining victorie, I may vſe Alexander with that great honor and courteſie, which he hath in my miſery ſhewed vnto thoſe I loued beſt in the world. Or otherwiſe if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of PERSIA muſt needes haue end, either through diuine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: then good gods yet grant, that none but Alexander after me, may ſit in Cyrus throne. Diuers writers do agree, that theſe things came euen thus to paſſe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this ſide of the riuer Euphrates, he went to meet with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thouſand fighting men. It was told him by ſome of his friends to make him laugh, that the ſlaues of his armie had deuided themſelues in two parts, and had choſen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the firſt, they began to skirmiſh only with clods of earth, and afterwards with fiſts; but at the laſt, they grew ſo hot, that they came to plaine ſtones and ſtaues, ſo that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes haue the two Generals fight hand to hand one with the other: and Alexander ſelf did arme him that was called Alexander and Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the armie thereupon was gathered together to ſee this combat betweene them, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was ſharpe betweene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to go after the PERSIAN manner. Thus it is written by Eratoſthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gauſameles, which ſignifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the houſe of the Cammell. For ſome one of the ancient kings of PERSIA that had eſcaped from the hands of his enemies, flying vpon a dromedarie cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammel there. There fel out at that time an eclipſe of the Moone, in the moneth called Bœdromion (now Auguſt) about the time that the feaſts of the myſteries were celebrated at ATHENS. The eleuenth night after that, both the armies being in ſight each of other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went himſelfe by torch-light viewing his bands & companies. Alexander on the other ſide whileſt his MACEDONIAN ſouldiers ſlept, was before his tent with Ariſtander the Soothſayer, and made certaine ſecret ceremonies and ſacrifices vnto Apollo. The ancient captaines of the MACEDONIANS, ſpecially Parmenio, ſeeing all the valley betwixt the riuer of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noiſe as of a confuſed multitude of people that filled their campe with the ſound thereof: they were amazed, and conſulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpoſſible to fight a battell with ſuch an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counſell him to giue battell by night, becauſe the darkeneſſe thereof ſhould helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the ſight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable anſwer: I will not ſteale victorie, quoth he. This anſwer ſeemed very fond and arrogant to ſome, that he was ſo pleaſant, being neare ſo great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a preſent noble courage, and a deepe conſideration of him, to thinke what ſhould happen: thereby to giue Darius no manner of occaſion (if he were ouercome) to take heart againe, and to proue another battell, accusing the darkneſſe of the night as cauſe of his ouerthrow: as he had done at the firſt conflict, imputing his ouerthrow to the mountaines, the ſtraights, and the ſea. For ſaid he, Darius wil neuer leaue to make wars with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, hauing ſo large a realme as he hath, & ſuch a world of people beſides: but then he would no more hazard battel, when his heart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he ſeeth his armie at noone dayes ouerthrowne by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and laid him downe to ſleepe, and ſlept all that night more ſoundly then he was wont to do before: inſomuch as the Lords and Princes of his campe coming to waite vpon him at his vpriſing, maruelled when they found him ſo ſound aſleepe, & therefore of themſelues they commanded the ſouldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiuing that time came faſt vpon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and coming to his beds ſide, called him twiſe or thriſe by name, till at the laſt he awaked him, & asked him how he chanced that he ſlept ſo long, like one that had already ouercome, and that did not thinke he ſhould fight as great and dangerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, ſaid Alexander, laughing on him: doeſt thou not thinke we haue alreadie ouercome, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a countrey vtterly deſtroyed, as we ſhould otherwiſe haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue come to battel, and deſtroyed the countrey before vs? Now Alexander did not only ſhew himſelf before the battell, but euen at the very inſtant of the battell, a noble man of courage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue ſuch a fierce onſet vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them giue backe: and Mazeus alſo, king Darius lieutenant, ſent certaine troupes of horſemen out of their battel, to giue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to guard the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, ſent immediatly to aduertiſe Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be loſt, if he did not ſend preſently to aid the rereward. When theſe newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already giuen the ſignall of battell vnto his men for to giue charge. Whereupon he anſwered the meſſenger that brought him theſe newes, that he ſhould tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wan the battell, they ſhould not only ſaue their owne cariage, but alſo win the cariage of their enemies: and if it were their chance to loſe it, then that they ſhould not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their ſlaues, but only to thinke to die honourably, valiantly fighting for his life. Hauing ſent this meſſage vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The reſt of his armour for his body, he had put it on before in his tent, which was a SICILIAN caſſocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many folds of canuas with oylet-holes, which was gotten among the ſpoiles at the battel of ISSVS. His head-peece was as bright as ſiluer, made by Theophilus the armourer: his coller ſute-like to the ſame, all ſet full of precious ſtones, and he had a ſword by his ſide maruellous light, and of excellent temper, which the King of the CITIEANS had giuen him, vſing commonly to fight with his ſword at any ſet battel. His coate-armour was maruellous rich, and of ſumptuous workmanſhip, farre aboue all the reſt he wore. It was of the workmanſhip of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a preſent, & this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did ſet his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ride alongſt the bands to take view of them, he alwaies vſed to ride vpon another horſe to ſpare Bucephal, becauſe he was then ſomewhat old: notwithſtanding, when he meant indeed to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, & aſ ſoone as he was gotten vp on his back, the trumpet ſounded, and he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortations to encourage ý men of armes of the THESSALIANS and the other GRECIANS alſo, & when they had all promiſed him they would ſtick to him like men, and prayed him to leade them, and giue charge vpon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hand, and holding vp his right hand vnto heauen, beſought the gods (as Calliſthenes writeth) that if it were true he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would pleaſe them that day to helpe him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Soothſayer Ariſtander was then on horſe-backe hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, and a crowne of gold on his head, who ſhewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. This maruellouſly encouraged all the army that ſaw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders ſide, encouraging one another, did ſet ſpurres to their horſe to charge vpon the enemies. This battel of the footmen of the PERSIANS, began a litle to giue way, and before the foremoſt could come to giue them charge, the barbarous people turned their

their backes, and fled. The chase was great: Alexander driuing them that fled vpon the middest of their owne battell, where Darius selfe was in person, he spied him a farre off, ouer the foremost rankes in the middest of his battell, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a chariot of warre, compassed in round with great troupes of horsemen, all set in goodly ordinance to receiue the enemie. But when they saw Alexander at hand with so grimme a looke, chasing them that fled, through those that yet keepe their rankes, there fel such a feare among them, that the most part dispersed themselues. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiant men fought it to the death before their King, and falling dead one vpon another, they did let them that the enemies could not so well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Darius then seeing nothing but terror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bands which he had set before him for safegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his chariot forward nor backward, the wheeles were so hindred and stayed with the heapes of dead bodies; and that the horse also being set vpon and hid in maner in this conflict, fell to leaping and plunging for feare, so that the charrettiers could no longer guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had a fole, and so saued himselfe flying vpon her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: because there was yet a great squadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to haue dealt but slackly and cowardly, either because his age had taken his courage from him, or else for that he enuied Alexanders greatnesse and prosperitie, who against his will became ouer great, as Callisthenes said. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second message, and yet told not his men truly the cause why, but feigning that he would haue them leaue killing, and because also night came on, he caused the trumpet sound retraite, and so went towards his armie, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, newes came, to him by the way, that in that place also, they had giuen the enemies the ouerthrow, and that they fled euery way for life. The battell hauing this successe, euery man thought that the kingdome of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowne, and that Alexander likewise was become onely King of all ASIA: whereupon he made sumptuous sacrifices vnto the gods, and gaue great riches, houses, lands, and possessions vnto his friends and familiars. Furthermore, to shew his liberalitie also vnto the GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies suppressed throughout all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS should liue at libertie vnder their owne lawes. Particularly also he wrote vnto the PLATÆIANS, that he would reedifie their city againe, because their predecessors in times past, had giuen their countrey vnto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the cõmon libertie of all GREECE. He sent also into ITALY vnto the CROTONIANS, part of the spoile, to honour the memory of the valiantnesse, and good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of their wars with the MEDES (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALY had forsaken their naturall countrimen of GREECE it selfe, because they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a ship of his vnto SALAMINA, which he armed and set forth at his owne charges, because he would be at the battell, and partake also of the common danger with the GRECIANS. Such honour did Alexander beare vnto prowesse, that he loued to reward and remember the worthy deedes of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the countrey of Babylon, they all yeelded straight vnto him. When he came into the countrey of the ECBATANIANS, he maruelled when he saw an opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall sparkes of fire as out of a well: and that hard by also the earth spued out continually a kinde of * maund or chalkie clay somewhat liquid, of such abundance, as it seemed like a lake. This maund of chalke is like vnto a kind of lime or clay, but it is so easie to set on fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnesse onely of the light that cometh out of the fire, it is set on fire, and doth also set the aire on fire which is betweene both. The barbarous people of that countrey, being desirous to shew Alexander the nature of that Naptha, scattered the street that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being shut in, they fired it at one of the ends, and the first drops taking fire, in the twinkling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the street to the other was on a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightened all the place thereabout. Alexander being in a bath at that time, and waited vpon by a page called Stesen, (a hard fauoured boy, but yet that had an excellent sweet voice to sing)

The flying of Darius.

Alexanders third victory of Darius, and like alsy to all men.

* The strength and power of Naptha, in the country of Ecbatania.

one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwayes nointed and bathed the King, & much delighted him with his pleasant conceits, asked him if he would see the trial of this Naptha vpon Steuen: for if the fire tooke & went not out, then he would say it had a wonderfull force, & was vnquenchable. The page was contented to haue it proued vpō him. But so soone as they had laid it on him, and did but touch it onely, it tooke straight such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander himselfe was in a maruellous perplexitie withal. And sure had it not bin by good hap, that there were many by, ready with vessels ful of water to put into the bath, it had bin vnpossible to haue saued the boy from being burnt to nothing; and yet so he scaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying, that therewith she rubbed the crowne & lawne she gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her marriage, so much spoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could cast fire of themselues, neither did the fire light by chance: but by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnesse to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride sate. For the beames which the fire casteth out, haue ouer some bodies no other force, but to heat and lighten them: but such as haue an oily drie humour, and thereby a simpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire, it easily inflameth & setteth on fire, by the forcible impressiō of his beames. Howbeit they make a great questiō of the cause of this natural force of Naptha, *or whether this liquid substance & moist humor, that taketh fire so easily, doth come of the earth that is fatty & apt to cōceiue fire. For the country about BABYLON is very hot, in so much as oftētimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp again, as if ŷ earth by vehement inflammation had a strong blast to cast it out: and men in the extremest heate in the sommer, do sleepe there vpō great leather budgets filled ful of fresh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenant and Gouernor of that country, desiring to set forth and beautifie the gardens of the Kings pallace and walkes of the same, with all maner plants of GREECE, he brought all the rest to good passe, sauing iuie only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer died; because the heat and temper of the earth killed it, and the iuy of it selfe liketh fresh aire & a cold ground. This digression is somewhat frō the matter, but peraduenture the Reader wil not think it troublesome, how hard soeuer he find it, so it be not ouertedious. Alexander hauing won the citie of SVSA, he found within the castle foure thousand talents in ready coyne, gold & siluer, besides other infinite treasure and inestimable, amongst the which (it is said) he found to the value of fiue thousand talents weight of *purple HERMIONA silk, which they had locked vp safe, & kept the space of two hundred yeares saue ten, & yet the colour kept as fresh as if it had bin newly made. Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it with hony, in silkes, which before had bin died red, and with white oile in white silkes. For there are silkes seene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dino writeth furthermore, that the kings of PERSIA made water to be brought from the riuers of Nilus & Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did lock vp with their other treasure for a confirmatiō of the greatnes of their Empire, & to shew that they were Lords of the world. The waies to enter into PERSIA being very hard of passage, and in maner vnpassible, (both for the ilnesse of the waies, as also for the guard that kept them, which were the choisest men of PERSIA) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greeke & PERSIAN tongue (whose father was borne in the country of LYCIA, and his mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by some compasse fetched about not very long, according to the oracles answer of Alexander giuen by the mouth of the Nun Pythias, when he was a child: that a LYCIAN should guide and leade him against the PERSIANS. There was then great slaughter made in PERSIA of the prisoners that were taken. For Alexander himselfe writeth, that he commanded the men should be put to the sword, thinking that the best way to serue his turne. It is said also, that there he found a maruellous treasure of gold and siluer in readie money, as he had done before in the city of SVSA: the which he caried away with all the rest of the Kings rich wardrobe, and with it laded ten thousand moyles, and fiue thousand camels. Alexander entring into the castle of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, saw by chance a great image of Xerxes lie on the ground, the which vnawares was throwne downe by the multitude of the souldiers that came in thronging one vpon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spoke vnto it as if it had bene aliue, saying I cannot tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lie, for the warre thou madest sometime against the GRECIANS: or whether I should lift thee vp, respecting the noble minde and vertues thou haddest.

Alexanders iourney into Persia.

Alexander found a maruellous treasure in Persia.

In

In the end, when he had ſtood mute a long time, conſidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refreſh his wearie army, becauſe it was the winter quarter, he remained there 4. moneths together. The report goeth that the firſt time that Alexãder ſate vnder the cloth of ſtate of king Darius, all of rich gold, Demarathus CORINTHIAN (who firſt began to loue him, euen in his father Philips time) burſt out in teares for ioy (good old man) ſaying, that ỹ GRECIANS long time dead before, were depriued of this bleſſed hap, to ſee Alexãder ſit in king Xerxes princely chaire. After that, preparing again to go againſt Darius, he would needs make merry one day, and refreſh himſelfe with ſome banquet. It chanced ſo, that he and his companions was bidden to a priuate feaſt priuatly, where was aſſembled ſome fine curtiſans of his familiars, who with their frieds taried at the banquet. Amongſt them was that famous Thais, borne in the countrey of ATTICA, and then concubine to Ptolomy, king of ÆGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praiſed Alexander, and partly in ſporting wiſe, began to vtter matter in affection of her countrey, but yet of greater importance then became her mouth: ſaying, that that day ſhe found her ſelfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for al the paines ſhe had taken, trauelling through al the coũtries of ASIA, following of his army, now that ſhe had this fauor and good hap to be merry and pleaſant, in the proud & ſtately pallace of the great kings of PERSIA. But yet it would do her more good for a recreation to burne Xerxes houſe with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the city of ATHENS: and her ſelf to giue the fire to it, before ſo noble a Prince as Alexander. Becauſe euer after it might be ſaid, that the woman following his campe had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and iniuries they had done vnto GREECE, then all the Captaines of GREECE that euer were, had done, either by land or ſea. When ſhe had ſaid, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands, and made great noiſe for ioy, ſaying: that it were as good a deed as could be poſſible, and perſwaded Alexander vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perſwaſions, roſe vp, and putting a garland of flowers vpon his head, went foremoſt himſelfe: and all his familiars followed after him, crying and dancing all about the caſtle. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it alſo, came thither immediatly with torches light & great ioy, hoping that this was a good ſigne that Alexander meant to returne againe into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the countrey of the barbarous people, ſith he did burne & deſtroy the kings caſtle. Thus and in this ſort it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwiſe: that it was not burnt with ſuch ſport, but by determination of the councell. But howſoeuer it was, all they grant, that Alexander did preſently repent him, and commanded the fire to be quenched ſtraight. For his liberality, that good wil and readineſſe to giue, increaſed with his conqueſts: and when he did beſtow gifts on any, he would beſides his gift, euer giue them good countenance, on whom he beſtowed his grace and fauor. And I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariſto being Colonell of the PÆONIANS, hauing ſlaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and ſaid: ſuch a preſent, O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cup of gold. Yea, quoth Alexander ſmiling vpon him, with an emptie cup. But I drinke to thee this cup full of good wine, and do giue thee cup and all. Another time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the Kings: & when the poore moyle was ſo wearie that ſhe could no longer carrie her burden, the moyletter put it vpon his own back, and loded himſelfe withall, carying it ſo a good prety way: howbeit in the end being ouerloden, was about to throw it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was told him: wel, quoth he to the moyletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I giue it thee. To be ſhort, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with thoſe that would aske him ſomewhat. He wrote alſo vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuſe his gifts. It ſeemed that he had giuen nothing vnto a yong boy called Serapion (who euer did ſerue them the ball that plaid at tennis) becauſe he asked him nothing. Wherefore the King playing on a time, this yong boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to himſelfe. The King maruelling at it, at the length ſaid vnto him: Why my boy, doeſt not thou giue me the ball? becauſe your Maieſtie doth not aske it me, quoth he. Alexander then vnderſtanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, and did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him alſo one Proteas, a pleaſant conceited man, and that could ieaſt finely, it chanced vpon ſome occaſion that Alexander fell out with him: whereupon ſome of his friends were interceſſors vnto the King for him, & beſought him to pardon him: & Proteas himſelf alſo being preſent, craued pardon with teares in his eies. Alexander therupon forgaue him. Then preſẽtly replied Proteas, I deſire it may pleaſe your grace, that I may receiue ſome teſtimonie to aſſure me I am in your fauor. Therupon the king ſtraight commanded one to giue him fiue talents. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and guard about him, were very great, as it appeared plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou ſpareſt not to giue thy friends large gifts, & that thou makeſt much of them: but thereby thou makeſt them kings fellowes, they get many friends, and leaue thee poſt alone without any. His mother did many times write ſuch like matters vnto him the which Alexander kept very ſecret, ſauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephæſtion being preſent drew neare, & read the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the ſeale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vſe to ſeale his letters, and put it to Hephæſtions mouth. He gaue alſo vnto the ſon of Mazeus (that was the chiefeſt man about Darius) a ſecond gouernment, beſides that which he had before, & greater then the firſt. This yong nobleman refuſed it, ſaying: why, and it pleaſe your Grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio alſo Lagoas houſe, where (as it is reported) he found a thouſand talents worth of the ſpoiles & goods of the Svsians. He wrote alſo vnto Antipater, that he ſhould keepe a guard about his perſon, for he had many enemies that lay in wait for him. He did ſend alſo many goodly preſents vnto his mother, but withal he wrote vnto her, that ſhe wold meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpō her the office of a captain. She ſtorming at it, he patiētly did brook her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long letter vnto him againſt his mother Olympias, when he had read it ouer, lo, ſaid he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye wil wipe out ten thouſand ſuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his friends became very diſſolute and licencious in diet and life, and that Agnon Theian had his corked ſhoos nailed with ſiluer nailes; that Leonatus alſo cauſed diuers camels to be lodē amongſt his cariage with powder of Ægypt, to put vpon him when he wreſtled or vſed any other exerciſe of body; and that alſo they caried after Philotus, toies for chaſe and hunting, of a hundred furlong long; and that there were alſo that vſed precious perfumes and ſweet ſauors when they bathed thēſelues, more then there were that rubbed themſelues with plaine oyle; and that they had fine chamberlaines to rub thē in the bath, & to make their beds ſoft and delicate: he wiſely and courteouſly rebuked them and ſaid: I marueil, ſaid he, that you which haue fought in ſo often and great battels, do not remember that they which trauell, do ſleepe more ſweet & ſoundly, then they that take their eaſe and do nothing: and that you do not marke, that comparing your life, with the maner of life of the Persians, to liue at pleaſure is a vile thing, & to trauel is princely. And how I pray you, can a man take paine to dreſſe his own horſe, or to make cleane his lance or helmet, that for ſlothful curioſities ſake, diſdaineth to rub his own body with his fingers? Are you ignorant, that the tipe of honour in all our victory conſiſteth, in ſcorning to do that which we ſee them do, whom we haue vanquiſhed and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themſelues with hardineſſe, he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard himſelfe more dangerouſly, then euer he had done before. Wherupon an Ambaſſador of Lacedæmon being preſent to ſee him fight with a Lion, and to kill him, ſaid vnto him: Truly your Grace hath fought well with this Lion, and tried which of you two ſhould be King. Craterus after that, cauſed this hunting to be ſet vp in the temple of Apollo in Delphes: where are the images of the Lion, of the dogges, and of the King fighting with the Lion, and of himſelfe alſo that came to helpe him, all thoſe images being of copper, ſome made by Lyſippus, the reſt by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himſelfe vnto all ieopardies, as well to exerciſe his ſtrength and courage, as alſo to allure his men to do the like. This notwithſtanding his friends and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needes liue delicately and at eaſe, and would take no more paines, miſliking vtterly to go vp and downe the countries to make warre here and there, and thereupon began a litle to find fault with Alexander, and to ſpeake euill of him. Which at the firſt Alexander tooke quietly, ſaying that it was honour for a King to ſuffer himſelfē to be ſlandered and ill ſpoken of, for doing of good. And yet the leaſt good turnes he did vnto his friends, did ſhew his hearty loue and honour he bare them, as ſhall appeare vnto you by ſome examples that follow. Peuceſtas being bitten by a Beare, did let his friends vnderſtand by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus: Send me word at the leaſt yet how thou doeſt, & whether any of thy fellowes did forſake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be puniſhed.

Hephæſtion

Hephæſtion being abſent about certaine buſineſſe he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beaſt called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunatly croſſing Perdiccas dart, was ſtriken through both his thighes. Peuceſtas being cured of a great diſeaſe, Alexander wrote vntò Alexippus his Phiſition that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus alſo being ſicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine ſacrifices for the recouery of his health, and ſent vnto him, willing him to do the like. And when the Phiſition Pauſanias meant to giue him a drinke of Elleborus, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he receiued that medicine. He did alſo put Ephialtes and Ciſſus in priſon, who brought him the firſt newes of Harpalus flying, becauſe they did wrongfully accuſe and ſlander him. When he had commanded there ſhould be a bill made of all the old mens names, and diſeaſed perſons that were in his campe, to ſend them home againe into their countrey: there was one Eurylochus Ægeian, that made his name be billed among the ſicke perſons, and it was found afterwards that he was not ſicke; and confeſſed that he did it onely to follow a young woman called Teleſippa, with whome he was in loue, who was returning homewards towards the ſea ſide. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he anſwered him, that ſhe was a curtizan free borne. Then ſaid Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I cannot force her to tarie: but ſeeke to win her by giftes and faire words to be contented to tarie, ſithence ſhe is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to ſee what paines he would take, to write for his friends, euen in ſuch trifles as he did. As when he wrote into Cilicia for a ſeruant of Seleucus that was fled from his maſter, ſending ſtraight commandement, that they ſhould carefully lay for him. And by another letter he commendeth Peuceſtas, for that he had ſtayed and taken one Nicon, a ſlaue of Craterus. And by one other letter alſo vnto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken ſanctuarie in a temple, he commanded him alſo to ſeeke to entiſe him out of the ſanctuarie, to lay hold on him if he could, but otherwiſe not to meddle with him in any caſe. It is ſaid alſo, that at the firſt whē he vſed to ſit in iudgement to heare criminall cauſes, whilſt the accuſer went on with his complaint & accuſation, he alwayes vſed to lay his hand vpon one of his eares, to keepe that cleane from the matter of accuſation, thereby reſeruing it to heare the purgation and iuſtification of the perſon condemned. But afterwards, the number of accuſations that were brought before him, did ſo prouoke and alter him, that he did beleeue the falſe accuſations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he vnderſtood they had ſpoken ill of him: and then he was ſo fierce, as no pardon would be granted, for that he loued his honour more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went againſt Darius, thinking that he meant to fight againe: but vnderſtanding that Beſſus had taken him, then he gaue the Theſſalians leaue to depart home into their countrey, and gaue them two thouſand talents ouer and aboue their ordinarie pay. Alexander had then a maruellous long, hard, and painefull iourney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thouſand and three hundreth furlongs, inſomuch as the moſt part of his men were euen weary, and done for lacke of water. It chanced him one day to meete with certaine Macedonians that caried (vpon moyles) goate skinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a riuer. They ſeeing Alexander in manner dead for thirſt, being about noone, ranne quickly to him, and in a head-peece brought him water. Alexander asked them to whom they caried this water. They anſwered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet would haue your Grace to liue: for though we loſe them, we may get more children. When they had ſaid ſo, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thruſt out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had giuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it: for ſaid he, if I drinke alone, all theſe men here will faint. Then they ſeeing the noble courage & courteſie of Alexander, cried out that he ſhould lead them, and therewithall beganne to ſpurre their horſes, ſaying, that they were not wearie nor athirſt, nor did thinke themſelues mortall, ſo long as they had ſuch a King. Euery man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threeſcore onely that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, paſſing ouer much gold and ſiluer, which was ſcattered abroad in the place, and going alſo by many chariots full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the ſpurre, vntill they had ouertaken the foremoſt that fled, thinking to haue found Darius amongſt them.

Alexander kept one eare for the condemned perſons.

Alexander would not pardon ill words ſpoken of him.

Alexanders painfull iourney in following of Darius.

The loue of Alexander to his ſouldiers, and abſtinence. Alexander regarded not the ſpoile of gold and ſiluer, in reſpect of purſuing his flying enemie.

But at the length, with much ado, they found him layed along in a coach, hauing many wounds vpon his bodie, some of darts and some of speares. So he being almost at the last cast, called for some drinke, and dranke cold water, which Polystratus gaue him. To whom when he had drunk, he said: this is my last mishap my friend, that hauing receiued this pleasure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, & the gods Alexander, for the liberality and courtesie which he hath shewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my sake. At these last words, he tooke Polystratus by the hand, and so gaue vp the ghost. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely shewed that he was sorie for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his own cloake, he cast it vpon the bodie of Darius. After that, hauing by good hap gotten Bessus into his hands, he tare him in peeces with two high straight trees which he bowed downwards, and tied his legges to each of them: so that when the trees were let go, they gaue a sodaine cruell ierke vp, and caried either tree a peece of his body with it. Then Alexander hauing giuen Darius corpse princely buriall, and embalmed him, he sent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his friends. From thence he went into the coũtry of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his army, where he saw the gulfe of the sea Caspium, which he thought of no lesse greatnes, then the sea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other seas be. He could not then certainely find out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelihood he thought it was some breaking out of ỹ lake or marrish of Meotin. Yet some ancient natural Phylosophers seemed to know truly what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conqueſt, they wrote, that of the foure chiefest gulfes of the sea, which come from the Ocean, and do enter within maine land, that which is more Northerly, is the sea Caspium, which they call also Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the country, certaine barbarous people sodainly set vpon them that led Bucephal his horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, that he sent a Herauld into their countries to proclaime open warres vpon them, and that he would put man, woman, and child to the sword, if they brought him not his horse againe. Whereupon, when his horse was returned home, & that they yeelded vp their cities and forts into his hands, he did vse them al very curteously, and more ouer did giue them money for the ransome of his horse, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the countrey of PARTHIA. There hauing ley sure enough, he began to apparel himself after the fashion of the barbarous people, because he thought therby the better to win the hearts of the cõuntrimen, framing himself vnto their own fashions: or else to trie the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, to see how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he meant to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their King, by litle and litle acquainting them to allow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithstanding, he would not at the first take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was very strange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without breeches, nor did weare a long gowne trayling on the ground, nor a high coptanct hat, but tooke a meane apparell, betwixt the MEDES and the PERSIANS, more modest then the one, and more costly then the other, and yet at the first he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or else priuately amongst his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed himself openly to the people in that apparell, when he gaue them audience. This sight grieued the MACEDONIANS much: but they had his vertues in such admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take his owne pleasure, sithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow; and another time, had such a blow with a stone full in his necke, that it made him purre-blind a great while after, and yet neuertheless he neuer eschewed any bodily danger: for he passed ouer the riuer of Orexartes, which he tooke to be Tanais, and hauing in battell ouerthrowne the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase about an hundreth furlongs, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosenesse of bodie. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONS, as many writers do testifie among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onesicritus, Antigenes, and Hister. But Chares, Ptolomie, Anticlides and Philon THEBAN, Philip the Historiographer, Hecateus ERETRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these do write, that it was not true: and it seemeth also that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the King of SCYTHIA offered him his daughter in mariage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is also said, that Onesicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lysimachus, the fourth booke of his historie, where where he did ſpeake of the AMAZON. Lyſimachus ſmiling, ſaid vnto him: Why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit it, or not to credit it, Alexanders eſtimation therby is neither impaired nor aduanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being weary with this long warre, would go no further, he left all the reſt of his army behind, and tooke only twenty thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſemen of the choiſeſt men of his army, and with them inuaded the countrey of HYRCANIA. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had but ſeene them as it were in a dreame; and if they ſhould now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely ſtirred them, and not altogether ſubdued ASIA, the people offended with them, would ſet vpon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheleſſe, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, proteſting therewith againſt them that would go, how they did forſake him, his friends, and thoſe who had ſo good hearts towards him, as to follow him in ſo noble a iourney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MACEDONIANS. This ſelf matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cryed out, and bade him leade them into what part of the world he would. When they had granted their goodwils, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the reſt of the common ſort, who followed the example of the chiefeſt. Thereupon he did frame himſelfe the more to liue after the faſhion of the country there, and enterchangeably alſo to bring the men of that countrey vnto the maner of the MACEDONIANS: being perſwaded that by this mixture and enterchange of maners one with another, he ſhould by friendſhip more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he ſhould be ſo farre from the countrey of PERSIA. For this purpoſe therefore, he choſe thirtie thouſand of their children of that country, and ſet them to learne the Greeke tongue, & to be brought vp in the diſcipline of wars after the MACEDONIANS maner: and gaue them ſchoolemaſters and Captaines to traine them in each faculty. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, ſeeing her at a feaſt where he was: which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduice and counſell loued her. For the barbarous people were very proud of this match, when as they ſaw him make alliance with thē in this ſort, inſomuch as they loued him better then they did before, becauſe they ſaw in thoſe things he was alwaies ſo chaſt and continent, that notwithſtanding he was maruellouſly in loue with her, yet he would not diſhonorably touch this yong Lady, before he was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander conſidering that of the two men which he loued beſt, Hephæſtion liked well of his match, and went apparelled as himſelfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did ſtill vſe the MACEDONIAN maner, he dealt in all affaires with the barbarous people, by Hephæſtion; and with the GRECIANS & MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be ſhort he loued the one, and honored the other: ſaying that Hephæſtion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereupon theſe two perſons bare one another grudge in their harts, & oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inſomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drew their ſwords, and fought together, and diuerſe of their friends ran to take part with either ſide. Thither came Alexander ſelfe alſo, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephæſtion, and called him foole and bedlem, ſaying, doſt thou not know, that whatſoeuer he be that ſhould take Alexander from me, he ſhould neuer liue? Priuatly alſo, he ſharply rebuked Craterus, & calling them both before him, he made them friends together, ſwearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing; neuertheleſſe if euer he found that they fell out together againe, they ſhould both die for it, or he at the leaſt that firſt began to quarell. So euer after that, they ſay, there was neuer foule word nor deed between them, not ſo much as in ſport onely. There was alſo one Philotas, the ſonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next vnto Alexander was the moſt valiant man, the patienteſt to abide paine, the liberalleſt, and one that loued his men & friendes better then any noble man in the campe whatſoeuer. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borow money: and he commanded ſtraight one of his mē to let him haue it; His purſe-bearer anſwered him, that he had none. Why, ſaid his maſter, doeſt thou tell me ſo? Haſt thou not plate, and apparell to ſell or gage to helpe him to ſome? Howbeit otherwiſe, he had ſuch pride and glorie to ſhew his riches, to apparell himſelfe ſo ſumptuouſly, and to be more fine and princked then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: becauſe he tooke vpon him to be a great man, and to looke bigge on the matter, which became him ſo ill fauouredly, & therefore euery man through his own folly, fell

in misliking with him. Insomuch as his owne father said one day vnto him: Son, I pray thee be more humble and lowly. This Philotas had long before bene complained vpon vnto Alexander because that when the cariage of king Darius army (which was in the city of Damas) was taken after the battel of Cilicia, among many prisoners that were taken & brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a passing faire young curtisan, borne in the city of Pidna. Philotas found meanes to get her, and like a yong man that was in loue with her, making merry with her at the table, fondly let fall braue words and boasts of a souldier, saying, that what notable things were done, they were done by himselfe and his father: and called Alexander at euery word, yong man, and said, that by their meanes he held his name and kingdome. This curtisan told one of her friends what he said, and that friend told another friend, and so went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the curtisan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom she told as much as she had said before. Alexander bade her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he said of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumuented, did euer frequent her company, and would be bold commonly to speake many foolish and vndiscreet words against the king, sometime in anger, and sometime againe in a brauery. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he dissembled it for that time, and would not be knowne of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affraid of their great power and authority. About that time there was one Limnus Chalastrian a Macedonian, that laid great and secret wait to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, inticed him to helpe him to do this deed. The yong man wisely denied it, and told the same to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, & prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importāce to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why no man could tell) telling them, that the king had greater matters in hand, and was not at leisure. Then they went vnto another, and he brought them vnto Alexander, vnto whom they first opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: & by the way they told also, how they had bin twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with him. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slaine by him, whom he sent to apprehēd him, resisting him for that he would not be taken: & thought that by his death, he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this treason and conspiracy. Then Alexander frowning vpon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they began to speake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalastrian of himselfe durst haue entred into that treason, but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, set on by a greater personage then he: and therefore that it stood Alexander vpon to examine them straightly which had cause to keepe this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such words and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought a thousand accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuerse Lords and familiars of the King put to the torture, Alexander selfe hanging behind, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he heard how faintly and pitifully he besought Hephæstion to take pity vpon him, he said vnto himselfe: Alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a heart, how durst thou take vpon thee so great matters? In fine Philotas was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speed vnto the Realme of Media to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had serued king Philip his father, in his greatest affaires; and he onely of all other the old seruants of his father had procured Alexander to take in hand the conquest of Asia: and who also of three sons which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwards was slaine himselfe with the third. This cruelty of Alexander made his friends affraid of him, and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadours vnto the Ætolians to make league with them, because they themselues also were affraid of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that said, that he himselfe, and not the sonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged on the Ætolians. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitus, the which to heare it simply told, would seeme much more cruell then the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chanced, it will be found that it was not of set purpose, but by chance and vnfortunatly, that Alexander being ouercome with with wine, did vnluckily wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the low countries from the sea side, that brought apples of GRECE vnto Alexander. Alexander wondering to see them so greene and faire, sent for Clitus to shew him them, and to giue him some of them. Clitus by chance did sacrifice at that time vnto the gods, and left his sacrifice to go vnto Alexander: howbeit, there were three weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprinklings had bene done alreadie to haue sacrificed them. Alexander vnderstanding that, told it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN; both did answer him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander thereupon gaue order straight, that they should do sacrifice for the health of Clitus, and specially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he saw Clitus in a mourning gowne, sitting amongst the sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an end of his sacrifice, but came straight to supper to the king, who had that day sacrificed vnto Castor and Pollux. At this feast there was old drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses sung and made by a Poet, called Pranichus (or as others say, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bin ouercome by the barbarous people; and onely to shame them, and to make the company laugh. With these verses, ancient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grew angry with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that sung them. Alexander on the other side, and his familiars, liked them very well, and commanded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being ouertaken with wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, fell into greater choler, and said: that it was neither well nor honestly done in that sort to speake ill of those poore MACEDONIAN captaines (and specially amongst the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they that laughed them to scorne, although their fortune were worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and said, that saying so, he pleaded for himselfe, calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing vp, said again: But yet this my cowardlinesse saued thy life, that calleth thy selfe the sonne of the gods, when thou turnedst thy backe from Spithridates sword: and the bloud which these poore MACEDONIANS did shed for thee, and the wounds which they receiued on their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needs make thy selfe the sonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with these words, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou vsest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS to rebell against me? Clitus answered againe, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and seruice to receiue such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with rods of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauour with ỹ PERSIANS, to haue accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe answering and reuiling him, the graueſt men sought to pacifie this stirre and tumult. Alexander then turning himselfe vnto Xenodochus CARDIN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: Do you not thinke (said he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as demy gods that walke among brute beasts? Clitus for all this would not giue ouer his impudency and malapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openly what he had to say, or else not to bid free men to come to sup with him that were wont to speake franckly: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues that honoured his PERSIAN girdle, and long white garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, & threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his guard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euery man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented, he immediatly rose from the boord, and called his guard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN tongue (which was a signe of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a trumpeter to sound the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not sound: whereupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his friends with much ado thrust him out of the hall: but he came in againe at another doore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedy:

Alas for sorow euill wayes
Are into Greece crept now adayes.

Why Alexander slue Clitus.

Alexanders dreame of Clitus.

The malapertnesse of Clitus against Alexander.

Alexander slue Clitus, and grieuously repented him.

Then Alexander taking a partisan from one of his guard, as Clitus was coming towards him, and had lift vp the hanging before the doore, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choler had left him straight, and he became maruellous sorowfull: and when he saw his friends round about him say neuer a word, he pluckt the partisan out of his body, and would haue thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his guard about him caught him by the hands, and caried him perforce into his chamber: and there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, and the next day following, vntil such time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, only lay sighing. His friends hearing his voice no more, were afraid, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, sauing Aristander the Soothsayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was a prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destiny, before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander: Afterwards they brought in Callisthenes the Philosopher, a kinsman of Aristotles, and Anaxarchus borne in Abdera. Of these two Callisthenes sought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensiue, to comfort Alexanders sorow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken away by himselfe in the study of Phylosophy, being accounted a braine-sicke man, and one that dispised his companions, he coming into Alexanders chamber also with him, cried out at the dore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the Great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afraid of: see where he lies, weeping like a slaue on the ground, that is afraid of the law, and of the reproch of men: as if he himselfe should not giue them law, and stablish the bounds of iustice or iniustice, sithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and master, and not to be subiect and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Iupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and iustice placed on either hand of him? what signifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is holy, right and iust? These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorowfull heart of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did maruellously grow in fauour with the king, euen so did he make the company of Callisthenes (who of himselfe was not very pleasant, because of his grauity and sowernesse) much more hatefull and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certaine talke one night at king Alexanders boord touching the seasons of the yeare, and temperatnesse of the aire, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the country they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in Greece. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stifly maintained it, in so much as Callisthenes said vnto him: And yet must thou grant, that it is colder here then there. For there all the winter time thou couldest go with a single cloake on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy boord. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, & made him more angry then before: and for the other Rhetoritians and flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of yong men for his eloquence, and beloued also of old men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, & contented with his owne, desiring no mans else. Wherby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in his voyage, was true: for he said, that he came to be an humble suter to the king to restore his banished citizens into their countrey againe, and to replenish their city with inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuied, yet did he himselfe giue his enemies occasion to accuse him. For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, shewing by his grauity and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe said on a time vnto him:

Callisthenes and Anaxarchus, do comfort Alexander.

The cause why Callisthenes was enuied.

I cannot thinke that person wise,
That in his owne cause hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diuerse requesting him to make an Oration on the sudden in commendation of the Macedonians, he made such an eloquent Oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the boord, and clapping their hands for ioy, cast nosegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time said vnto him that which the Poet Euripides said:

It is no maisterie to be eloquent,
In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay,

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faults, they may learne to amend. Then Calliſthenes changing copy, ſpake boldly many things againſt the MACEDONIANS, declaring, that the diſſention amongſt the GRECIANS did increaſe king Philips power, alledging theſe verſes:

Where diſcord reignes in realme or towne,
Euen wicked folke do winne renowne.

But by this occaſion, he purchaſed himſelfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: inſomuch, as Alexander ſelfe ſaid at that time, that he had not ſo much ſhewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that one Stræbus a cleark of Calliſthenes, did afterwards tell it vnto Ariſtotle in this ſort: and that Calliſthenes ſeeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite theſe verſes of Homer three or foure times as he went:

Patroclus who farre paſſed thee,
Was ſlaine, as thou art like to be.

And therefore very wiſely ſaid Ariſtotle, that Calliſthenes was eloquent, but not wiſe. For like a Philoſopher, he ſtoutly ſtood againſt kneeling to the king, and ſaid that openly, which the nobleſt and the ancienteſt men among the MACEDONIANS durſt but whiſper one in anothers eare, though they did all vtterly miſlike it: wherby he did yet deliuer GREECE frō a great ſhame, and Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his perſon. This notwithſtanding, he vndid himſelfe, becauſe he would ſeeme rather by preſumption to bring him to it, then by reaſon to perſwade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander hauing drunke at a certaine feaſt where he hapned to be, reached his cup vnto one of his friends, who after he had taken it of him, roſe vp firſt on his feete, and dranke alſo, turning him towards the gods; and firſt making ſolemne reuerence, he went and kiſſed Alexander, and then ſate him downe againe. All the reſt that were at the feaſt, did the like one after another, and Calliſthenes alſo who rooke the cup when it came to his turne (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephæſtion) after he had drunke, came vnto the king to kiſſe him, as others had done. Howbeit, one Demetrius called Phidon, ſaid vnto the king: kiſſe him not, I pray your Grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head aſide, and would not kiſſe him. Then cried Calliſthenes out aloud: Well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with leſſe then others, by a kiſſe. And thus began Alexanders grudge firſt againſt Calliſthenes, by meanes whereof Hephæſtion was credited the better, when he ſaid that Calliſthenes had promiſed him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promiſe. After him alſo Lyſimachus, Agnon, and diuerſe others began to play their parts againſt him, ſaying, that this Sophiſter went bragging vp and downe, as if he had deſtroyed a whole tyranny; and that all the yong men followed him to honour him, as if among ſo many thouſand ſouldiers, neuer a man of them had ſo noble an heart as he. And therefore, when the treaſon of Hermolaus againſt Alexanders perſon was diſcouered, they found the accuſation probable, the which ſome falſe detractors had informed againſt Calliſthenes: who had anſwered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be ſo famous aboue all men, thus: In killing the famouſeſt perſon. And to animate him to go forward with this treaſon, he had told him further, that he ſhould not be afraid of a golden bed, but remember he had to do with a man, which was ſometimes ſicke and hurt as other men were. This notwithſtanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Calliſthenes, what torments ſo euer they abid, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander ſelfe alſo writing of this treaſon immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas, ſaid, that their ſeruants which had bene racked & put to the torture, did conſtantly affirme, that they onely had conſpired his death, and no man elſe was priuie vnto it. But afterwards, he ſent another letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accuſed Calliſthenes, and ſaid, that his ſeruants had alreadie bene ſtoned to death by the MACEDONIANS: howbeit that he himſelfe would afterwards alſo puniſh the maſter, and thoſe that had ſent vnto him; and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpoſe to kill him. And therein he plainely ſhewed the ill will he bare vnto Ariſtotle, for that Calliſthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinſman, and the ſonne of Hero, Ariſtotles neece. Some ſay that Alexander truſſed Calliſthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of ſickneſſe in priſon. Neuertheleſſe Chares writeth, that Calliſthenes was kept priſoner ſeuen moneths together, becauſe he ſhould haue had his iudgemēt in open councell euen in the preſence of Ariſtotle himſelfe: howbeit, being very fat, he was eaten in the end by lice, and ſo died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting againſt the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the conqueſt of INDIA; but theſe things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great deſire to go ſee Alexander: and when he had ſeene him, he ſaid, that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were depriued of that bliſſe and happineſſe, that they could not ſee Alexander ſit in the royall ſeate of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kings good will vnto him, for he died of a ſickneſſe ſoone after he came vnto his campe, and Alexander did honour his funerals: for all the army in their armour did caſt vp a mount of earth faſhioned like a tombe, which was a great compaſſe about, and foure ſcore cubits high. His aſhes afterwards were brought with honourable conuoy, vnto the ſea ſide, in a charet with foure horſes richly ſet out. Alexander being ready to take his iourney to go conquer INDIA, perceiuing that his army was very heauy and vnweildſome to remoue, for the wonderfull cariage and ſpoiles they had with them: the carts one morning being loden, he firſt burnt his owne cariage & next his friends, and then commanded that they ſhould alſo ſet the cariage of the MACEDONIANS on fire; which counſel ſeemed more dangerous to be reſolued of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficult. For there were very few of them that were angry therewith, & the moſt part of them (as if they had bin ſecretly moued by ſome god) with loud cries of ioy, one of them gaue vnto another ſuch neceſſary things as they had need of, & afterwards of themſelues did burne and ſpoile all the reſt. This made Alexander much more rigorus thē he was before, who beſides that he was already become cruel enough, & without mercy or pardon, did ſharply puniſh euery man that offended. For hauing commanded Menander one of his friends, to keepe him a ſtrong hold, he put him to death becauſe he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himſelf ſlue Orſodates (a Captaine of the barbarous people) with a dart, for that he rebelled againſt him About that time, there was an caw that had caned a lambe which had vpon her head, the forme & purple colour of the kings hat, after the PERSIAN maner called Tiara, hauing two ſtones hanging on each ſide of it. Alexander abhorred this monſtrous ſigne, inſomuch as he purged himſelf by certain BABYLONIAN prieſts, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpoſe, and ſaid vnto his friends: that this monſter did not ſo much moue him for reſpect of himſelf, as he did for thē, fearing that the gods after his death had perdeſtined the force and power of his kingdome to fall into the hands of ſome baſe cowardly perſon. This notwithſtanding, another ſigne and token which chanced in the neck of that, did take away his feare and diſcouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kings cariage, as he digged in a certaine place by the riuer of Oxus, to ſet vp the kings tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oily veine, which after they had drawne out the firſt, there came out alſo another clearer, which differed nothing, neither, in ſmell, taſt, nor ſauour from natural oile, hauing the gloſſe & fatneſſe ſo like, as there could be diſcerned no difference betweene them: the which was ſo much more to be wondred at, becauſe that in all that country there were no oliues. They ſay alſo, That the water of the riuer ſelf of Oxus is very ſoft, and maketh their skins fat, which waſh or bathe themſelues therin. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander ſelf wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongſt the greateſt ſignes which the gods had ſent vnto him. The ſoothſayers did interpret this wonder, that it was a ſigne, that he ſhould haue a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the gods, ſaid they, haue giuen oyle vnto men to refreſh their wearineſſe. And truely ſo did he ſuſtaine many dangers in thoſe warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greateſt loſſe he had of his men, was for lacke of victuals, & by the infection of the aire. For he ſtriuing to ouercome fortune by valiantneſſe, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impoſſible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withſtand a noble heart. It is reported, that when he went to beſiege a ſtrong hold which Siſimethres kept, being thought vnſaltable, and that his ſouldiers were in deſpaire of it, he asked one Oxyathres, what heart Siſimethres had. Oxyathres anſwered him, that he was the verieſt coward in the world. O, that is well quoth Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou ſaieſt, ſithence the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it on a ſudden, by putting Siſimithres in a great feare. After that alſo he did beſiege another peece of as great ſtrength and difficultie to aſſault as the other, and making the young ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the aſſault, he called one of them vnto him, whoſe name alſo was Alexander, vnto whom he ſaid thus: Alexander, this day thou muſt fight like a man, and it be but for thy names ſake. The young

yong man did not forget his words, for he fought ſo valiantly, that he was ſlaine, for whom Alexander was very ſory. Another time when his men were afraid, and durſt not come neare vnto the city of NISA to aſſault it, becauſe there ran a very deepe riuer hard by the walles, he came to the riuers ſide, & ſaid: O what a coward am I, that neuer learned to ſwim? and ſo prepared himſelf to ſwim ouer vpon his ſhield. After he had cauſed them to retire from the aſſault, there came ambaſſadours vnto him, from the cities beſieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondred at him at the firſt, when they ſaw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaire was brought him to ſit downe on, that he commanded the oldeſt man amongſt them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and ſit him downe. Acuphis maruelling at Alexanders great courteſie, asked him what they ſhould do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, ſaid Alexander, that they from whom thou comeſt as Ambaſſadour vnto vs, do make thee their king: and withall, that they do ſend me a hundred of their beſt men for hoſtages. Acuphis ſmiling anſwered him againe: but I ſhall rule them better, ô king, if I ſend you the worſt and not the beſt. There was a king called Taxiles a very wiſe man, who had a great countrey in INDIA, no leſſe in bigneſſe and circuit then all ÆGYPT, and as full of good paſture and fruits as any country in the world could be: who came on a time to ſalute Alexander, and ſaid vnto him: What ſhould we need, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with another, if thou comeſt not to take away our water, & our neceſſary cõmodities to liue by: for which things, men of iudgement muſt needs fight? As for our goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readie to giue thee of mine: & if I haue leſſe, I will not thinke ſcorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me ſome of thine. Alexander being pleaſed to heare him ſpeake thus wiſely, imbraced him, & ſaid vnto him: Thinkeſt thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all theſe goodly faire words? no, no, thou haſt won nothing by that: for I will fight & contend with thee in honeſtie and courteſie, becauſe thou ſhalt not exceed me in bounty and liberality. So Alexander taking diuers gifts of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles, he dranke to him one night at ſupper, and ſaid: I drinke to thee a thouſand talents in gold. This gift miſliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of theſe barbarous Lords and Princes of that countrey. There was a certaine number of ſouldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikeſt men of all that country, who being mercenarie ſoldiers, were euer entertained in ſeruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a city where they were kept in, when they came abroad vpon ſuretie of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the ſword. There was but this onely fault, to blemiſh the honour of his noble deeds in all his warres: for in all things elſe he ſhewed mercy and equity. Furthermore the graue Philoſophers and wiſe men of INDIA did greatly trouble him alſo. For they reproued the kings & Princes of the INDIANS, for that they yeelded vnto Alexander, & procured the free cities to take armes againſt him. But by their occaſion, he tooke diuers of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander ſelfe writeth in his Epiſtles, all his acts at large which he did againſt him. For he ſaith, that both their campes lying on either ſide of the riuer of Hydaſpes, king Porus ſet his Elephants vpon the banke of the riuer with their heads towards their enemies, to keepe him from paſſing ouer: and that he himſelfe did continually make a noiſe and tumult in his campe to acquaint his men not to be afraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no Moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, and the choiſe of his horſemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Iland. When he was come into the Iland, there fell a wonderful ſhower of raine, great winds, lightnings and thunders vpon his campe, inſomuch as he ſaw many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Iland. This notwithſtanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other ſide of the riuer. The riuer being ſwollen with the great floud of raine that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: ſo that Alexander when he had paſſed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other ſide, found himſelfe in very ill caſe, for that he could hardly keep his feete, becauſe the earth was very ſlippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery ſide. It is written of him, that then he ſaid vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take ſuch paines, and put my ſelfe into ſo many dangers, onely to be praiſed of you? Thus Oneſicritus reporteth it. But Alexander ſelfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of timber pinned together, whereupon they had paſſed ouer the ſtreame of the maine riuer: and that they waded through the other arme or gut of the water which had broken the earth, vp to their breasts, with their harneſſe on their backes. Furthermore, when he had paſſed ouer both waters, he rode with his horſemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footemen, thinking that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the ſtronger: and if they would alſo aduance their footemen forward, that his footemen alſo ſhould come time enough. One of the twaine fell out as he had gueſſed: for a thouſand horſemen and threeſcore charrets armed with his enemies, gaue him charge before their great company; whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, and ſlue foure hundred of the men at armes in the field. King Porus then knowing by thoſe ſignes that Alexander was there in perſon, and had paſſed ouer the riuer, he marched towards him with all his army in battel ray, ſauing a few which he left behind to reſiſt the MACEDONIANS, if they ſhould force to paſſe ouer the riuer. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terrour of the Elephants, did not giue charge vpon the middeſt of the battell, but being himſelfe in the left wing, gaue charge vpon the corner of the enemies left wing, and alſo commanded them that were in the right wing to do the like. So both the ends of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ran vnto the Elephants, and gathered themſelues together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, inſomuch as the enemies were ſcantly all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Moſt writers agree, that Porus was foure cubits and a ſhaft-length high, and that being vpon an Elephants backe, he wanted nothing in height and bigneſſe to be proportionable for his mounture, albeit it were a very great Elephant; and beſides, that the Elephant did ſhew great wit and care to ſaue the King his maſter. For whileſt he perceiued his maſter was ſtrong enough, he luſtily repulſed thoſe which came to aſſaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many wounds vpon his body, and arrowes ſticking in it, then being afraid leſt his maſter ſhould fall downe from his backe, he ſoftly fell on his knees, and gently taking his darts and arrowes with his trunke, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after another. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he ſhould handle him. Princely, anſwered Porus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would ſay any thing elſe. I comprehend all, ſaid he, in this word Princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieutenant, but gaue him many other countries alſo. When he had ſubdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene ſeuerall nations, fiue thouſand of no ſmal cities, beſides an infinit number of villages and thrice as many other countries, he made Philip one of his friends, his Lieutenant of all thoſe countries. His horſe Bucephal died at this battell, not in the field but afterwards whileſt he was in cure for the wounds he had on his body: but as Oneſicritus ſaith he died euen worne for very age. Alexander was as ſorie for his death, as if he had loſt any of his familiar friends: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horſe was buried, vpon the riuer of Hydaſpes, the which he called after his name, BVCEPHALIA. It is reported alſo, that hauing loſt a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vp of a whelpe, and loued very dearely, he built alſo a city, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This laſt battell againſt king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no deſire to go any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had ſuch ado to ouercome them, though they were but twenty thouſand footemen, and two thouſand horſe, they ſpake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to paſſe ouer the riuer of Ganges, vnderſtanding by the countrimen that it was two and thirtie furlongs ouer, and a hundred fadome deepe: and how that the banke of the riuer was full of ſouldiers, horſemen and Elephants. For it was reported that ỹ kings of the GANGARIDES, and the PRÆSIANS were on the other ſide with foure ſcore thouſand horſemen, two hundred thouſand footemen, eight thouſand charrets or carts of warre well armed, and ſix thouſand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor friuolous tale: for a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after) gaue vnto Seleucus, fiue hundred Elephants at one time, and conquered all INDIA with ſixe hundred thouſand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refuſal, kept cloſe in his tent for certaine dayes, and lay vpon the ground, ſaying, that he did not thanke them for all that they had done thitherunto, vnleſſe they paſſed ouer the riuer of Ganges alſo; and that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confeſſe, that he had bin ouercome. At the length, when he ſaw and conſidered that there was great reaſon in his friends perſwaſions which laboured to comfort him, him, and that his ſouldiers came to the dore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beſeeching him to leade them backe againe; in the end he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithſtanding, before he departed from thoſe parts, he put foorth many vaine and falſe deuices to make his name immortall among that people. He made armours of greater proportion then his owne, and mangers for horſes, higher then the common ſort: moreouer, he made bits alſo farre heauier then the common ſort, and made them to be throwne and ſcattered abroad in euery place. He built great altars alſo in honour of the gods, the which the kings of the PRÆSIANS haue in great veneration at this day, and paſſing ouer the riuer, do make ſacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very yong man, and ſaw Alexander himſelfe, and ſaid afterwards, that Alexander had well-neare taken and won all the countrey, the king which then reigned, was ſo hated of all his ſubiects for his wicked life, and baſe parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to ſee the great ſea Oceanum, and made diuerſe boats with oares, in the which he eaſily went downe the riuers at his pleaſure. Howbeit, this his pleaſant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and did aſſaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in aſſailing the city of the MALLIANS, (which they ſay are the warlikeſt men of all the INDIANS) he was almoſt ſlaine there. For hauing with darts repulſed the enemies from the wall, he himſelfe was the firſt man that ſet foote on a ladder to get vp, the which brake aſſoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. Then the barbarous people coming together againſt the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing few of his men about him, made no more ado, but leaped downe from the wall in the middeſt of his enemies, and by good happe lighted on his feete. His harneſſe making a great noiſe with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had ſeene ſome light or ſpirit go before them: ſo that at the firſt they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne ſcattering here and there. But after that, when they came againe to themſelues, and ſaw that he had but two Gentlemen onely about him, they came and ſet vpon him of all hands, and fought with him at the ſword or puſh of the pike, and ſo hurt him very ſore through his armour: but one amongſt the reſt, being ſomewhat farther off, gaue him ſuch a terrible blow with an arrow, that he ſtrake him through his curaces, and ſhot him in at the ſide vnder his breaſt. The blow entred ſo into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had ſtricken him with his arrow, ranne ſodainly to him with a cimiter drawne in his hand: howbeit as Peuceſtas and Limnæus ſtepped before him, and were both hurt, Limnæus was ſlaine preſently, and Peuceſtas fought it out, till at the length Alexander ſelfe ſlue the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many grieuous wounds vpon his bodie. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke, that ſo aſtonied him, that he leaned againſt the wall looking vpon his enemies. In the meane time the MACEDONIANS compaſſing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a ſwound, and was paſt knowledge: whereupon there ranne a rumour ſtraight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much ado to cut the arrow aſunder that was of wood: ſo his curaces being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his bodie, which ſtucke in one of his bones: the which (as it is reported) was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he ſwounded ſo oft, that he was almoſt dead. This notwithſtanding, he ouercame the danger, and eſcaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer himſelfe, and neuer came out of his tent: vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and make great noiſe about his tent, deſirous to ſee him. Then he put on a night-gowne, and came out amongſt them all: and after he had done ſacrifice vnto the gods for recouery of his health, he went on his iourney againe, and in the ſame did conquer many great countries, and tooke diuers goodly cities. He did alſo take ten of the wiſe men of the countrey, which men do all go naked, & therfore are called GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, (to wit, Philoſophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell againſt him, and had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And becauſe they were taken to be the ſharpeſt and readieſt of anſwer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard queſtions, and told them he would put the firſt man to death, that anſwered him worſt, and ſo the reſt in order: and made the eldeſt among them Iudge of their anſwers. The queſtion he asked the firſt man, was this:

1 Whether the dead or the liuing were the greater number? He anſwered, The liuing: for the dead ſaid he are no more men.

2 The ſecond man he asked: Whether the earth or the ſea brought forth moſt creatures? He anſwered, The earth. For the ſea, ſaid he, is but a part of the earth.

3 To the third man: Which of all beaſts was the ſubtileſt? That (ſaid he) which man hitherto neuer knew.

4 To the fourth: Why he did make Sabbas rebell? Becauſe, ſaid he, he ſhould liue honourably, or die vilely.

5 To the fift, Which he thought was firſt, the day or the night? He anſwered, the day, by a day. The king finding his anſwer ſtrange, added too this ſpeech: Strange queſtions muſt needs haue ſtrange anſwers.

6 Coming to the ſixth man, he asked him: How a man ſhould come to be beloued? If he be a good man, ſaid he, not terrible.

7 To the ſeuenth, How a man ſhould be a god? In doing a thing, ſaid he, impoſſible for a man.

8 To the eight: Which was the ſtronger, life, or death? Life, ſaid he, that ſuffereth ſo many troubles.

9 And vnto the ninth and laſt man: how long a man ſhould liue? Vntill, ſaid he, he thinke it better to die then to liue.

When Alexander had heard theſe anſwers, he turned vnto the Iudge, and bade him giue his iudgement vpon them. The Iudge ſaid, they had all anſwered one worſe then another. Then ſhalt thou die firſt, ſaid Alexander, becauſe thou haſt giuen ſuch ſentence: Not ſo ô king, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer becauſe thou ſaideſt, that thou wouldeſt kill him firſt, that had anſwered worſt. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He ſent Oneſicritus alſo vnto the other wiſe men of the INDIANS, which were of greateſt fame among them, and that led a ſolitarie and quiet life, to pray them to come vnto him. This Oneſicritus the Philoſopher, was Diogenes the Cyniks ſcholer. It is reported, that Calanus one of theſe wiſe men, very ſharply & proudly bade him put off his clothes to heare his words naked or otherwiſe that he would not ſpeake to him, though he came from Iupiter himſelfe. Yet Dandamis anſwered him more gently. For he hauing learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, ſaid: that they ſeemed to haue bene wiſe men, and well borne, notwithſtanding that they had reuerenced the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithſtanding, that Dandamis ſaid nothing elſe, but asked why Alexander had taken ſo painfull a iourney in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus, (whoſe right name otherwiſe was Sphines) king Taxiles perſwaded him to go vnto Alexander: who becauſe he ſaluted thoſe he met in the INDIAN tongue, ſaying, Cale, as much to ſay, as God ſaue ye, the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did ſhew Alexander a figure and ſimilitude of his kingdome, which was this. He threw downe before him a dry ſcare peece of leather, & then put his foot vpon one of the ends of it. The leather being troden downe on that ſide, roſe vp in all parts elſe, and going vp and downe withall, ſtill treading vpon the ſides of the leather, he made Alexander ſee, that the leather being troden downe, on the one ſide did riſe vp of all ſides elſe, vntill ſuch time as he put his foot in the midſt of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plaine alike, his meaning thereby, was to let Alexander vnderſtand, that the moſt part of his time he ſhould keepe in the middeſt of his country, and not to go farre from it. Alexander continued ſeuen moneths trauelling vpon the riuers, to go ſee the great ſea Oceanum. Then he tooke ſhip and ſailed into a litle Iland called SCYLLVSTIS, howbeit others call it PSITVLCIS. There he landed, made ſacrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greatnes and nature of the ſea Oceanum, and all the ſituation of the coaſts vpon that ſea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers vnto the gods, that no conquerour liuing after him ſhould go beyond the bounds of his iourney and conqueſt, and ſo returned homeward. He commanded his ſhips ſhould fetch a compaſſe about, and leaue INDIA on the right hand: and made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleet, and Oneſicritus chiefe Pilote. He himſelfe in the meane time went by land through the country of the ORITES, and there he found great ſcarcitie of victuals, and loſt many of his men: ſo that he caried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all ſixe ſcore thouſand footmen, and fifteene thouſand horſemen. Some of them died of grieuous diſeaſes: others by ill diet: others by extreme heate and drought, & the moſt part of them by hunger, trauelling through this barren country, where the poore men liued hardly, and had only a few ſheepe which they fed with ſea fiſh, that made their fleſh ſauour very ill fauouredly. At the length, when in threeſcore dayes iourney he had painefully fully trauelled through this country, he then entred into the country called GEDROSIA, where he found great plentie of all kind of victuals, which the gouernors, kings and princes, neighbours vnto the same, did send vnto him. After he had refreshed his army there a litle, he went through the country of CARMANIA, where he continued seuen dayes together banqueting, going still through the country. For night & day he was feasting continually with his friends vpon a scaffold, longer then broad, rising vp of height, & drawne with 8. goodly horse. After that scaffold followed diuers other charrets couered ouer, some with goodly rich arras, & purple silke; others with trim fresh boughs, which they renued at euery fields end: and in those were Alexanders other friends and Captaines with garlands of flowers vpon their heads, which dranke and made merry together. In al this army, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor target seene: but gold & siluer bolles, cups, & flagons in the soldiers hands, al the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes & vessels, which they caried with thē one drinking to another, some marching in the fields going forward, & others also set at the table. About them were the minstrels playing and piping on their flutes and shalmes, and women singing and dancing, and fooling by the way as they went. In all this dissolute marching through the country, and in the midst of their drunkennesse, they mingled with it sport, that euery man did striue to counterfeit all the insolencies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus himselfe had bene there in person, & had led the mummery. When he came vnto ỳ kings castle of GEDROSIA, he staid there also certain daies to refresh his army with feasting & banqueting. It is said, that one day when he had drunk hard, he went to see the games for dancing, and amongst them, the games which a yong man called Bagoas had set forth, (with whom Alexander fell in liking) and bare the bell. This Bagoas being in his dancing garments, came through the Theater, & sate him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were so glad of it, that they shouted & clapped their hands for ioy, crying out aloud to kisse him: so that in fine he tooke him in his armes and kissed him before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him, who made report what he had seene and done in his nauigation. Alexāder was so glad of that, as he was desirous to saile by sea himselfe: and so entring into the sea Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great fleete of ships, to compasse in all the coasts of ARABIA and AFRICK, & thence into Mare Mediterraneū, by the straights of the pillers of Hercules. To this intent he built a great number of ships in ỳ city of THAPSACVS, & sent for mariners, shipmasters and pilots out of all parts. But now the difficulty of the iourny which he took vpon him for the conquest of INDIA, the danger he was in when he fought with the MALLIANS and the number of his men which he lost besides, which was very great: all these things considered together making men beleeue that he should neuer returne with safetie, they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to rise against him, & gaue his Gouernors & Lieutenants of prouinces occasion to commit great insolencies, robberies and exactions of people. To be short, it put all his kingdome in broile & sedition. Insomuch as Olympias and Cleopatra rising against Antipater, they deuided his gouernment betweene thē: Olimpias chusing for her the kingdome of EPIRVS: and Cleopatra the kingdome of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard, he said, his mother was the wisest: for the realme of MACEDON would neuer haue suffered a woman to reigne ouer thē. Thereupon he sent Nearchus backe again to the sea, determining to fil all the sea coasts with war. As he trauelled through the countries far from the sea, he put his captaines & gouernors to death which had reuolted against him: & of those he slue Oxiathres, one of Abulites sons, by his owne hand running him through with a pike. And when Abulites selfe also had brought Alexander 3000 talents only, without any other prouision made for victuals for his army, he made him put the mony before his horse, which wold not once touch it. Then said he vnto him, I pray thee to what purpose serueth this prouision? & therewithal immediatly committed him to prison. As he came through the country of PERSIA, he first renued the old custome there, which was: that as oftentimes as the kings did returne home from any far iourny, they gaue vnto euery woman a crowne a peece. It is said therfore that for this cause, some of their natural kings many times did not returne again into their country: and that Ochus amongst others did not so much as once returne backe againe, willingly banishing himself out of his country, of niggardlinesse, because he would not be at this charge. After that, Cyrus tomb (king of PERSIA) being found & broken vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the city of PELLA, (and none of the meanest) called Polymachus. When he had read the inscription written vpon it in the PERSIAN tongue, he wold needs haue it also written in the Greek tongue: and this it was: O man, what so thou art, and whence soeuer thou commest, for I know thou shalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia: I pray thee enuie me not for this little earth that couereth my body. These words pierced Alexanders heart, when he considered the vncertaintie of worldly things. There also Calanus the INDIAN Philosopher, hauing had a flux a little while, prayed that they would make him a stacke of wood, such as they vse to burne dead bodies on, and then rode thither on horsebacke: and after he had made his prayer vnto the gods, he cast those sprinklings vpon him which were vsed to be sprinkled at the funerals of the dead: then cutting off a locke of his haire before he went vpon the woodstacke, he bad all the MACEDONIANS that were there farewell, and shoke them by the hands, praying them that day to be merrie, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would see shortly after in the city of BABYLON. When he had said these words, he laid him downe vpon the woodstacke, couered his face, nor neuer stirred hand nor foot, nor quitched when the fire tooke him, but did sacrifice himself in this sort, as the maner of his countrey was, that the wise men should so sacrifice themselues. Another INDIAN also, who followed Iulius Cæsar, did the like many yeares after in the city of ATHENS: and there is his tombe yet to be seene, commonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came from seeing this sacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuerse of his friends and Captaines to supper to him, and there did bring forth a crowne for a reward vnto him that dranke best. He that dranke most of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure gallons of wine, and won the crowne worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three daies after. And of other also that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drinke most, there died of them (as Chares writeth) one and fortie persons, of an extreme cold that tooke them in their drunkennesse and wine. When they were in the city of SVSA, he maried certaine of his friends, and himselfe also maried Statira, one of king Darius daughters disposing also of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their estate and birth) vnto his best friends. He made also a solemne feast of common mariages amongst the MACEDONIANS, of them that had bene maried before. At which feast it is written, that nine thousand persons sitting at the boords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honour of the gods. And there also amongst other wonderfull gifts, he did pay all the debts ỹ MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditours, the which amounted vnto the summe of ten thousand talents, sauing a hundred and thirtie lesse. Whereupon Antigenes with one eye, falsly putting in his name amongst the number of the debters, and bringing in one that said he had lent him money, Alexander caused him to be payed: but afterwards when it was proued to his face, that there was no such matter, Alexander then was so offended with him, that he banished him his court, and depriued him of his Captaineship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed himselfe a valiant man in the warres. For when he was but a young man he was shot into the eye, before the city of PERINTE, which king Philip did besiege; and at that present time they would haue pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would suffer them to pull it out, before he had first driuen his enemies within the walles of their citie. He took this infamie very inwardly, and he was so sorie for it, that euery man might see he was like to die for sorrow. Then Alexander fearing he should die, did pardon him, and bade him besides keepe the money which was giuen him. Now the 30000. young boyes which Alexander had left to the gouernment of Captaines, to traine and exercise them in the discipline of warre, they being growne strong men, and lusty youths, excellently well trained and readie in armes, Alexander reioyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS & made them greatly afraid, because they thought that from thenceforth the king would make lesse account of them. For when Alexander would haue sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low country to the sea side, they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to send these poore men from him in that sort (after they had done him al the seruice they could) home to their country & friends, in worse case thē he took thē from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men vnseruiceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly yong dancers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was maruellously offended with their proud words, insomuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary guard, and took other PERSIANS in their place, making some the guard about his own person; others, his vshers, heraulds, and ministers to execute his will and commandement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, and themselues so shamefully reiected, they let fall their stoutnesse, and after

after they had commoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare themſelues for ſpite and malice. In fine, when they had laid their heads together, they conſented to go vnto his tent, and without weapons, naked in their ſhirts, to yeeld themſelues vnto him weeping and howling, beſeeching him to do with them what pleaſed him, and to vſe them like wretched vnthankefull creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now ſomewhat pacified, did not receiue them the firſt time, neither did they alſo go their waies, but remained there two daies & nights together in this pitifull ſtate, before the dore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their ſoueraigne, and king; vntill that he came himſelfe out of his tent the third day, & ſeeing the poore wretches in this grieuous and pitifull ſtate, he himſelf fel a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked them, he called them courteouſly, and gaue ỹ impotent & ſicke perſons leaue to depart home, rewarding them very honorably. Furthermore he wrote vnto Antipater his lieutenant, that he ſhould giue them alwaies the higheſt place in all common ſports & aſſemblies, and that they ſhould be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreouer, he commanded that the orphants whoſe parents were ſlaine in the wars, ſhould receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the city of ECBATANA, in the kingdome of MEDIA, and that he had diſpatched his weightieſt cauſes, he gaue himſelf again vnto publike ſports, feaſts and paſtimes; for that there were newly come vnto him out of GRECE, 3000. excellent maſters and deuiſers of ſuch ſports. About that time it chanced, that Hephæſtion fell ſicke of an ague. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he ſhould haue done, but hauing ſpied oportunitie that his Phiſitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to ſee the ſports & paſtimes, he went to dinner, and eate a roſted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had cauſed to be ſet in water: whereupon his feauer took him ſo ſorely, that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwiſely tooke the chance of his death, and commanded all the haires of his horſe and mules to be preſently ſhorne, in token of mourning; and that all the battlements of the walles of cities alſo ſhould be ouerthrown, and hung vp poore Glaucus his Phiſitian vpon a croſſe, & commanded that no minſtrell ſhould be heard play of any kind of inſtrument within his campe: vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, commanding that Hephæſtion ſhould be worſhipped and ſacrificed vnto, as a demy god. In the end, to paſſe ouer his mourning and ſorrow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto an hunting of men, and there ſubdued the people of the COSSÆIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and ſlue man, woman, and child. And this was called the ſacrifice of Hephæſtions funerals. Alexander furthermore being deſirous to beſtow tenne thouſand talents coſt vpon his obſequies and funerals, and alſo to exceede the charge by the rareneſſe and excellencie of workmanſhip, amongſt all other excellent workemaſters, he deſired one Staſicrates: for he had euer paſſing inuention, and his worke was alwayes ſtately and ſumptuous in any new thing he tooke in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, tould him, that of all the mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to reſemble the ſtatue or image of a man, then was mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his pleaſure, he would make him the nobleſt and moſt durable image, that ſhould be in the world, which in his left hand ſhould hold a city to containe ten thouſand perſons, and out of his right hand, there ſhould run a great riuer into the ſea. Yet Alexander would not hearken to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more ſtrange inuentions, and farre greater coſt. Now as he was ready to take his iourney to go vnto BABYLON, Nearcus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great ſea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates; and told him, how certaine CHALDEAN Soothſayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he ſhould not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the wals of BABYLON, he ſaw a great number of crowes fighting and killing one of another, and ſome of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwards being told him that Apollodorus the gouernor of the city of BABYLON, hauing ſacrificed vnto the gods, to know what ſhould happen to him, he ſent for the ſoothſayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The ſoothſayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what ſignes he had in the ſacrifice. He anſwered that the liuer of the beaſt had no head. O gods, ſaid Alexander then, this is an ill ſigne: notwithſtanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not beleeue Nearchus words. For this reſpect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the country frõ BABYLON, and did take his pleaſure rowing vp & down the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill ſignes and tokens one vpon another, that made him affraid. For there was a tame asse that killed one of the greatest and goodliest Lions in all Babylon, with one of his feet. An other time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be annointed to play at tennis, when he should put on his apparell againe, the yong gentlemen that played with him, found a man set in his chaire of estate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, and his gowne on his backe, & said neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them answer, but at the length coming to himselfe, he said, his name was Dionysius, borne in Messina: and being accused for certaine crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had bin a long time prisoner: and also that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, and vndone his irons, & that he commanded him to take the kings gowne, and his diademe, & to sit him down in his chaire of estate, and say neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counsell of his Soothsayers: but then his mind was troubled, and feared that the gods had forsaken him, and also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexander feared Antipater and his sons aboue all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his first cup-bearer: and his brother called Cassander, was newly come out of Greece vnto him. The first time that Cassander saw some of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the libertie of Greece, and had neuer seene the like before, fell into a loud laughing very vnreuerently. Therewith king Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wall together. Another time also when Cassander did answer some that accused his father Antipater, king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, and said vnto him: What say est thou, said he? Doest thou thinke that these men would haue gone so long a iourney as this, falsly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Cassander againe replied vnto Alexander and said, that that was a manifest proofe of their false accusation, for that they did now accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and said, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & contra: but this will not saue you from punishment, if I find that you haue done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Cassander tooke such an inward feare and conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of Macedon, & had all Greece at his commandement, going vp and down in the city of Delphes, & beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander; which put him into such a sodaine feare, that the haires of his head stood vpright, and his body quaked in such sort, that it was a great time before he could come to himself againe. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the gods, his mind was so troubled and afraid, that no strange thing happened vnto him, (how litle soeuer it was) but he tooke it straight for a signe and prediction from the gods: so that his tent was alwayes full of Priests, and Soothsayers, that did nothing but sacrifice and purifie, and tend vpon diuinements. So horrible a thing is the mistrust and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men; and superstition also so dreadful, that it filled the guiltie consciences and fearefull hearts, like water distilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after that he had receiued some answers touching Hephæstion from the Oracle of Iupiter Hammon, he left his sorrow, and returned againe to his banquets and feastings. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bath according to his manner, being readie to go to bed, Medius one of his Captaines besought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, so that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as some write) by drinking vp Hercules cup all at a draught; neither for the sodaine paine he felt betweene his shoulders, as if he had bene thrust into the backe with a speare: for all these were thought to be written by some for lies and fables, because they would haue made the end of this great tragedy lamentable & pitifull. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had such an extreame feuer and thirst withall; that he dranke wine, and after that fell a raging; and at the length died the thirtieth day of the moneth of Iune. In his household booke of things passed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he slept at his hote house on the eighteene day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hote house, he went into his chamber, and passed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed himselfe and sacrificed vnto the gods, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day also, bathing himselfe againe, and making his ordinarie sacrifice to the gods, he did sit downe to eate within his stoue, hearkening vnto Nearchus that told him strange things he had seene in the

the great sea Oceanum. The one and twentieth day also hauing done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt himselfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feauer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be set vp by the fish ponds, where he communed with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were void in his army, and commanded them not to place any man that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day hauing an extreame feauer vpon him, he was caried vnto the sacrifices, and commanded that his chiefest Captaines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner sort, as Centeniers and Lieutenants of bands, that they should watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on the other side of the lake, where he slept a litle, but the feauer neuer left him: & when his Captaines and Noblemen came to do him humble reuerence, and to see him, he lay speechlesse. So did he the fiue and twentieth day also: insomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out vnto his friends and familiars, and threatened them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Therupon the gates were opened, and they coming in their gownes, went vnto his bed side to see him. That selfe day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to know if they should bring king Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they should not remoue him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in maner, in the household booke of remembrance. At that present time, there was no suspition that he was poysoned. Yet they say, that sixe yeares after, there appeared some proofe that he was poysoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was said he gaue him poyson in his drinke. They that thinke it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poyson was brought, they say that Agnothemis reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyson (as some say) was cold as ice, and falleth from a rocke in the territory of the city of NONACRIS, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horne of the foot of an asse, for there is no other kind of thing that will keep it, it is so extreame cold and piercing. Others maintaine, and say, that the report of his poysoning is vntrue: and for proofe thereof they alleadge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefest captaines fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a hote drie countrie, and yet there neuer appeared any signe or token vpon his body, that he was poysoned, but was still a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour: but she did malice Statira extreamely, and did finely deceiue her by a counterfeit letter she sent, as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her sister, & then threw their bodies into a wel, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdiccas help and consent. Perdiccas came to be king, immediatly after Alexanders death by means of Aridæus, whom he kept about him for his guard and safety: This Aridæus, being borne of a strumpet and common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunaticke, not by nature nor by chance, but as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes which Olympias caused to be giuen him, and thereby continued franticke.

THE LIFE OF Julius Cæsar.

AT what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would haue had Cæsar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but whē he saw he could neither with any promise nor threat bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cause of Cæsars ill will vnto Sylla, was by meanes of mariage: for Marius the elder, maried his fathers owne sister, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Cæsar and he were cousin germaines. Sylla being troubled in weightie matters, putting to death so many of his enemies, when he came to be conquerour, he made no reckening of Cæsar: and he was not contented to be hidden in safetie, but came and made suite vnto the people for the Priesthoodship that was voide, when he had scant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulsed by Syllaes meanes, that secretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to haue killed him, some of his friends told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not consider that there were many Marians in that yong boy. Cæsar vnderstāding that, stole out of ROME, and hid himself a long time in the country of the SABINES, wandring still from place to place. But one day being caried frō house to house, he fell into the hands of Syllaes souldiers, who searched all those places, and took them whom they found hidden. Cæsar bribed the captaine, whose name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had escaped thē thus, he went vnto the sea side, & took ship, & sailed into BITHYNIA to go vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he took sea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of PHARMACVSA: for those pyrats kept all vpon the sea coast, with a great fleet of ships and boates. They asking him at the first 20. talents for his ransome, Cæsar laughed them to scorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himself promised them 50. talents. Thē he sent his men vp & down to get him this mony, so that he was left in maner alone among these theeues of the CILICIANS, (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his friends, and two of his slaues only: and yet he made so litle reckōning of them, that when he was desirous to sleepe, he sent vnto them to command them to make no noise. Thus was he 38 daies among them, not kept as prisoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise himselfe in any sport or pastime they would go to. And otherwhile also he would write verses, and make orations, and call them together to say them before them: and if any of them seemed as though they had not vnderstood him, or passed not for them, he called them them blockheads and brute beasts, and laughing, threatened them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and took all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransome was come from the city of MILETVM, they being paid their mony, and he againe set at liberty; he then presently armed and manned certaine shippes out of the hauen of MILETVM, to follow those theeues, whom he found yet riding at anker in the same Iland. So he tooke the most of them, and had the spoile of their goods; but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMVS & there committed them to prison, whilest he himselfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the gouernment of ASIA, as vnto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that countrey. But this Prætor hauing a great fancy to be fingering of the money, because there was good store of it, answered that he would consider of these prisoners at better leysure. Cæsar leauing Iunius there, returned again vnto PERGAMVS, and there hung vp all these theeues openly vpon a crosse, as he had oftentimes promised them in the Ile he would do, when they thought he did but least. Afterwards when Syllaes power began to decay, Cæsars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home again. But he sailed first vnto RHODES, to study there a time vnder Apollonius the son of Molon, whose scholer also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetoritian. It is reported, that Cæsar had an excellent natural gift to speake well before the people, and besides that rare gift, he was excellently wel studied, so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, & gaue place to the first, because he wold be the first and chiefest man of war & authority, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speak wel, which his nature could haue performed in him, because he was giuen rather to follow wars, and to manage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the readers not to compare the stile of a souldier with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto ROME, he accused Dolabella for his ill behauiour in the gouernement of his Prouinces, and he had diuers cities of GREECE that gaue in euidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cæsar, to requite the good will of the GRECIANS which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could haue no iustice in GREECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cæsar immediatly wanne many mens good wils at ROME, through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes, and the people loued him maruellously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speake to euery man, and to vse them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his yeares. Furthermore, he euer kept a good boord, and fared well at his table, and was very liberall besides: the which indeed did aduance him forward, and brought him in estimation with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauour of the common people would soone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence, suffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growne to be of great strength and power. But in fine, when they had thus giuen him the bridle to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in sight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and commonwealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will soone make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnesse. Thereupon, Cicero like a wise shipmaster that feareth the calmenesse of the sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the commonwealth, found out his craft and malice, which he cunningly cloked vnder the habite of outward courtesie and familiarity. And yet, said he, when I consider how finely he combeth his faire bush of haire, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger onely, my mind giues me then, that such a kind of man should not haue so wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the commonwealth. But this was long time after that. The first shew and proofe of the loue and goodwil which the people did beare vnto Cæsar, was when he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footmen) standing against Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second and more manifest proofe then the first, was at the death of his aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder.

For being her nephew, he made a solemne oration in the market place in cõmendation of her, & at her burial did boldly venture to shew forth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were seene after Syllaes victorie, because that Marius and all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the commonwealth. For when there were some that cried out vpon Cæsar for doing of it, the people on the other side kept a stirre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their hands, and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honour againe into Rome, which had so long time bene obscured and buried. And where it had bene an ancient custome of long time, that the Romaines vsed to make funerall orations in praise of old Ladies and matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cæsar was the first that praised his own wife with funeral oration when she was dead, the which also did encrease the peoples goodwils the more, seeing him of so kind and gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treasurer vnder Antistius Vetus Prætor, whom he honoured euer after: so that when himselfe came to be Prætor, he made his sonne to be chosen Treasurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he maried his third wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his first wife, Cornelia, which was maried vnto Pompey the Great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as some thought) but a vaine and short glory of the fauour of the people, (where indeede he bought good cheape the greatest things that could be:) some say, that before he bare any office in the commonwealth, he was growne in debt, to the summe of thirteene hundred talents. Furthermore, because he was made ouerseer of the worke, for the high way called Appius way, he disbursed a great summe of his owne money towards the charges of the same. And on the other side, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did shew the people the pastime of three hundred and twenty couple of sword players, and did besides exceede all other in sumptuousnesse in the sports and common feasts, which he made to delight them withall, (and did as it were drowne all the stately shewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so pleased the people, and wan their loue therewith, that they deuised daily to giue him new offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factiõs in Rome, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power; and the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote, and durst not shew it selfe. But Cæsar because he would renew it againe, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feasts and common sports were in their greatest ruffe, he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphs; & those he set vp one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when euery man saw the glistering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won vpon the Cimbres, euery one maruelled much at the boldnesse of him that durst set them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ran straight through all the city, & euery man came thither to see them. Then some cried out vpon Cæsar, & said, it was a tyranny which he meant to set vp, by renewing of such honours as before had bene troden vnder foot & forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a bait to gage the peoples good wils, which he had set out in the stately shewes of his cõmon playes, to see if he had brought them to his lure, that they wold abide such parts to be played, & a new alteratiõ of things to be made. They of Marius factiõ on the other side, incouraging one another, shewed thẽselues straight a great nũber gathered together, & made the mount of the Capitoll ring again with their cries and Clapping of hands: insomuch as the teares ran down many of their cheeks, for very ioy, when they saw ỹ images of Marius, & they extolled Cæsar to the skies, iudging him the worthiest man of al the kinred of Marius. The Senate being assembled therupon, Catulus Luctatius, one of ỹ greatest authority at that time in Rome, rose, & vehemẽtly inueighed against Cæsar, & spake that thẽ which euer since hath bin noted much: that Cæsar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plain force sought to alter the state of the cõmonwealth. Neuertheless, Cæsar at that time answered him so, that the Senat was satisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimation did grow in better hope then before, and perswaded him, that hardily he should giue place to no man, and that through the goodwill of the people, he should be better then all they, and come to be the chiefest man of the city. At that time the chiefe Bishop Metellus died, and two of the notablest men of the citie, and of greatest authoritie (Isauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cæsar notwithstanding their contention, would giue neither of them both place, but presented himselfe to the people, and made suite for it as they did. The suite being equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, because he was a man

man of greater calling and dignity than the other, doubting the vncertainty of the election, ſent vnto Cæſar a good ſumme of money, to make him leaue off his ſuite. But Cæſar ſent him word againe, that he would lend a greater ſumme then that, to maintaine the ſuite againſt him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the doore of his houſe, Cæſar weeping, kiſſed her, and ſaid: Mother, this day thou ſhalt ſee thy ſonne chiefe Biſhop of Rome, or baniſhed from Rome. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the ſtriſe well debated, Cæſar wanne the victory, and made the Senate and Noble men all affraid of him, for that they thought that thencefoorth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piſo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cæſar, when he knew that he was of conſpiracy with Catiline, and had oportunity to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the ſtate of the commonwealth, but vtterly to deſtroy the Empire of Rome, he eſcaped out of the hands of iuſtice for lacke of ſufficient proofe, before his full treaſon and determination was knowne. Notwithſtanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the city, companions of his conſpiracy: vnto whom, whether Cæſar did giue any ſecret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowne. Yet this is manifeſt, that when they were conuinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Conſull, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what puniſhment they ſhould haue, and euery one of them till it came to Cæſar, gaue ſentence they ſhould die: Cæſar then riſing vp to ſpeake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and ſaid, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their cuſtome did beare it, to put men of ſuch Nobility to death (but in an extremity) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in priſon in ſome city of Italy, where Cicero thought beſt vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowne, the Senate then might at their pleaſure quickly take ſuch order therein, as might appeare beſt vnto their wiſedomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with ſuch a paſſing good grace and eloquence, that not onely they which were to ſpeake after him did approue it: but ſuch alſo as had ſpoken to the contrary before, reuoked their opinion, and ſtucke to his, vntil it came to Cato and Catulus to ſpeake. They both did ſharply inueigh againſt him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæſar ſuſpected to be of the conſpiracy, and ſtoutly ſpake againſt him, inſomuch that the offenders were put into the hãds of the officers to be put to death. Cæſar coming out of the Senate, a company of young men which guarded Cicero for the ſafety of his perſon, did ſet vpon him with their ſwords drawne. But ſome ſay, that Curio couered Cæſar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their hands. And Cicero ſelfe, when the yong men looked vpon him, beckened with his head that they ſhold not kil him, either fearing the fury of the people, or elſe that he thought it too ſhameful and wicked a part. But if that were true, I maruel why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Conſulſhip. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he took not the opportunity offered him againſt Cæſar, only for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him very dearely. For ſhortly after, when Cæſar went into the Senate, to cleare himſelfe of certaine preſumptions and falſe accuſations obiected againſt him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer then they were wont: the people came about the councell-houſe, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the inſurrection of the poore needy perſons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæſar, and did alſo moue the people to ſtirre, did perſwade the Senate to make a franke diſtribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This diſtribution did put the commonwealth to a new charge of fiue hundred and fifty Myriades. This counſell quenched a preſent great feare, and did in happy time ſcatter and diſperſe abroad the beſt part of Cæſars force and power, at ſuch time as he was made Prætor, and that for reſpect of his office he was moſt to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer ſought any alteration in the common-wealth, but contrarily he himſelf had a great misfortune fel on his houſe, which was this. There was a yong noble man of the order of the Patricians, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence but otherwiſe as inſolent and impudent a perſon, as any was elſe in Rome. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæſars wife, who miſliked not withall: notwithſtanding ſhe was ſo ſtraightly looked to, and Aurelia (Cæſars mother) an honeſt Gentlewoman had ſuch an eye of her, that theſe two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill and difficulty. The Romaines do vſe to honor a goddeſſe which they call the good goddeſſe, as the Grecians haue her whom they call Gynacia, to wit, the goddeſſe of women. Her, the Phrygians do claime to be peculiar vnto them, saying: that she is king Midas mother. Howbeit the Romaines hold opinion, that it is a nimph of the woods maried vnto the god Faunus. The Grecians, they say also, that she was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feast day, the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, & leaues of vine branches; and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy dragon for this goddesse, and do set it by her: besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say, that the women in these sacrifices do many things amongst themselues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast came, the husband (whether he were Prætor or Consull) and all his men and the boyes in the house, do come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, and there the sacrifices & ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they do besides passe the night away in songs and musick. Pompeia Cæsars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feast, Clodius who had yet no haire on his face, and thereby thought he should not be bewrayed, disguised himself in a singing wenches apparell, because his face was very like vnto a yong wench. He finding the gates open, being secretly brought in by her chambermaid that was made priuy vnto it, she left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistresse, to tell her that he was come. The chamber-maid taried long before she came againe, in somuch as Clodius being weary waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the light; and was by chance met withall by one of Aureliaes maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeiaes women. So Aureliaes maid knowing him by his voice, ranne straight where the lights and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women therewith were so amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leaue off the ceremonies of the sacrifice, and to hide their secret things; and hauing seene the gates fast locked, went immediatly vp and downe the house with torch-light to seeke out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeiaes maid, with whom he hid himselfe. Thus Clodius being found out, and knowne of the women, they thrust him out of the doores by the shoulders. The same night the women told their husbands of this chance as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumour through the city, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deserued, not onely to be punished of them whom he had slandered, but also of the commonwealth and the gods. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the Nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burthened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding the people stoutly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Iudges, which were amazed, and afraid to stirre the people. This notwithstanding, Cæsar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witnesse against him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they obiected against Clodius. This answer being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Cæsar, why then he had put away his wife: Because I will not, said he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cæsar spake truly as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, because the most part of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the feare they stood in one way of the danger of the common people, if they condemned him, and for the ill opinion on the other side of the Nobility, if they did quit him. The gouernement of the prouince of Spaine being fallen vnto Cæsar, for that he was Prætor, his creditors came & cried out vpon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cæsar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to go vnto Crassus, who was the richest man of all Rome, and that stood in need of Cæsars boldnesse and courage to withstand Pompeys greatnes in the commonwealth. Crassus became his surety vnto his greedyest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talents: whereupon they suffered Cæsar to depart to the gouernment of his prouince. In this iourney it is reported, that passing ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many housholds, and yet poore cottages. him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that town, and whether there were any ſtrife there amongſt the noble men for honor. Cæſar ſpeaking in good earneſt, anſwered: I cannot tell that ſaid he, but for my part I had rather be the chiefeſt man here, then the ſecond perſon in ROME. Another time alſo when he was in SPAINE, reading the hiſtory of Alexanders acts, when he had read it, he was ſorowfull a good while after, and then burſt out in weeping. His friends ſeeing that, maruelled what ſhould be the cauſe of his ſorow. He anſwered them, Do you not thinke, ſaid he, that I haue good cauſe to be heauie, when king Alexander being no elder then my ſelfe is now, had in old time wonne ſo many nations and countries: and that I hitherunto haue done nothing worthy of my ſelfe? Therefore when he was come into SPAINE, he was very carefull of his buſineſſe, and had in few dayes ioyned ten new enſignes more of footmen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward againſt the CALLECIANS and LVSITANIANS, he conquered all, and went as far as the great ſea Oceanum, ſubduing all the people which before knew not the ROMAINES for their Lords. There he tooke order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wiſely take order for the eſtabliſhing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them friends one with another, but ſpecially he pacified all ſuites of law, and ſtrife betwixt the debtors and creditors, which grew by reaſon of vſury. For he ordained that the creditors ſhould take yearely two parts of the reuenew of their debtors, vntill ſuch time as they had payed themſelues: and that the debtors ſhould haue the third part themſelues to liue withall. He hauing won great eſtimation by this good order taken, returned from his gouernment very rich, and his ſouldiers alſo full of rich ſpoiles, who called him Imperator, to ſay ſoueraigne Captaine. Now the ROMAINES hauing a cuſtome, that ſuch as demanded honor of triumph, ſhould remaine a while without the city, and that they on the other ſide which ſued for the Conſulſhip, ſhould of neceſſity be there in perſon: Cæſar coming vnhappily at the very time when the Conſuls were choſen, he ſent to pray the Senate to do him that fauour, that being abſent he might by his friends ſue for the Conſulſhip. Cato at the firſt did vehemently inuey againſt it, vowching an expreſſe law to the contrary. But afterwards, perceiuing that notwithſtanding the reaſons he alledged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæſar) fauored his requeſt, yet he cunningly ſought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, in dilating his oration vntill night. Cæſar thereupon determined rather to giue ouer the ſuite of his triumph, and to make ſuite for the Conſulſhip: and ſo came into the city, and had ſuch a deuice with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato only. His deuice was this: Pompey and Craſſus, two of the greateſt perſonages of the city of ROME being at iarre together, Cæſar made them friends, & by that meanes got vnto himſelfe the power of them both, for by colour of that gentle act & friendſhip of his, he ſubtilly (vnwares to thē all) did greatly alter & change the ſtate of the commonwealth. For it was not the priuate diſcord betwen Pompey & Cæſar as many men thought, that cauſed the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers firſt to ouerthrow the ſtate of the Senate and Nobility, and afterwards they fell at iarre one with another. But Cato that then foreſaw and prophecied many times what would follow, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwards they found him a wiſer man then happy in his counſel. Thus Cæſar being brought vnto the aſſembly of the election, in the middeſt of theſe two noble perſons, whom he had before reconciled together, he was there choſen Conſull with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine-ſaying, or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he began to put forth lawes meeter for a ſeditious Tribune of the people, then for a Conſull: becauſe by them he preferred the diuiſion of lands, and diſtributing of corne to euery citizen gratis, to pleaſe them withall. But when the Noblemen of the Senate were againſt his deuice, he deſiring no better occaſion, began to cry out, and to proteſt, that by the ouerhardneſſe and auſterity of the Senate, they draue him againſt his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Craſſus on the one ſide of him, and Pompey on the other, he aſked them openly in the aſſembly, if they did giue their conſent vnto the lawes which he had put foorth. They both anſwered, they did. Then he prayed them to ſtand by him againſt thoſe that threatened him with force of ſword to let him. Craſſus gaue him his word, he would, Pompey alſo did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his ſword and target both, againſt them that would withſtand him with their ſwords. Theſe words offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauity, and vndecent for the maieſty and honor he caried, and moſt of all vncomely for the preſence of the Senate whom he ſhould haue reuerenced: and were

ſpeeches fitter for a raſh light headed youth, then for his perſon. Howbeit the common people on the other ſide, they reioyced. Then Cæſar becauſe he would be more aſſured of Pompeys power and friendſhip, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, and promiſed him in exchange Pompeys daughter, who was ſure alſo vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. And ſhortly after alſo, Cæſar ſelfe did mary Calphurnia, the daughter of Piſo, whom he cauſed to be made conſull, to ſucceed him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witneſſe, that it was a ſhamefull matter, and not to be ſuffered, that they ſhould in that ſort make hauocke of the Empire of Rome, by ſuch horrible bawdy matches, diſtributing among themſelues through thoſe wicked mariages, the gouernements of the prouinces, and of great armies. Chalphurnius Bibulus, fellow Conſull with Cæſar, perceiuing that he did contend in vaine, making all the reſiſtance he could to withſtand this law, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be ſlaine with Cato, in the market place and aſſembly; he kept cloſe in his houſe all the reſt of his Conſulſhip. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with ſouldiers, and by open force authoriſed the lawes which Cæſar made in ỹ behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Cæſar had Gavle on this ſide and beyond the Alpes, and all Illyria, with foure legions granted him for fiue yeares. Then Cato ſtanding vp to ſpeake againſt it, Cæſar bad his officers lay hold on him, and carie him to priſon, thinking he would haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato ſaid neuer a word, when he went his way. Cæſar perceiuing then, that not onely the Senators and Nobilitie were offended, but that the common people alſo for the reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were aſhamed, and went away with ſilence; he himſelfe ſecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be Præſident of the Senate vnder him, but left the city, becauſe they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Conſidius, that on a time boldly told him, the reſt durſt not come to councell, becauſe they were afraid of his ſouldiers. Cæſar anſwered, him again: and why then, doeſt not thou keepe thee at home, for the ſame feare? Conſidius replied, becauſe my age taketh away feare from me: for hauing ſo ſhort a time to liue, I haue no care to prolong it further. The ſhamefulleſt part that Cæſar played while he was Conſull, ſeemeth to be this: when he choſe P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offered his wife ſuch diſhonor, and prophaned the holy ancient myſteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne houſe. Clodius ſued to be Tribune to no other end, but to deſtroy Cicero: and Cæſar ſelfe alſo departed not from Rome to his army before he had ſet them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of Italy. All theſe things they ſay he did, before the warres with the Gavles. But the time of the great armies and conqueſts he made afterwards, and of the war in the which he ſubdued all the Gavles (entring into another courſe of life farre contrary vnto the firſt) made him to be knowne for as valiant a ſouldier and as excellent a captain to leade men, as thoſe that afore him had bene counted the wiſeſt and moſt valiant Generals that euer were, and that by their valiant deeds had atchieued great honour. For whoſoeuer would compare the houſe of the Fabians, of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea thoſe alſo of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey ſelfe:

Whoſe fame aſcendeth vp vnto the heauens:

It will appeare that Cæſars proweſſe, & deeds of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard countries where he made wars: another, in enlarging the realmes and countries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of Rome: another, in the multitude and power of his enemies whō he ouercame: another in the rudeneſſe and auſtere nature of men with whom he had to do, whoſe maners afterwards he ſoftned and made ciuill: another, in courteſie and clemencie which he vſed vnto them whom he had conquered: another, in great bounty and liberality beſtowed vnto them that ſerued vnder him in thoſe warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had ſlaine in battell. For in leſſe then ten yeares warre in Gavle he tooke by force and aſſault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred ſeuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirtie hundred thouſand ſouldiers, at ſundry times, he ſlue ten hundred thouſand of them, and tooke as many more priſoners. Furthermore, he was ſo entirely beloued of his ſouldiers, that to do him ſeruice (where otherwiſe they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Cæſars honour were touched, they were inuincible, and would ſo deſperately venture themſelues, and with ſuch such fury, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Acilius: who in a battel by sea before the city of MARSEILLES, bording one of his enemies ships, one cut off his right hand with a sword; but yet he forsooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his enemies faces, and made them flie, so that he wanne their ship from them. And Cassius Scæua also, in a conflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his shoulder striken through with a dart, and his thigh with another, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his shield, he called to his enemies, & made as though he would yeeld vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their shoulders from his body with his sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, and at the length saued himselfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITAINE also, when the Captaines of the bands were driuen into a marish or bogge full of mire and dirt, and that the enemies did fiercely assaile them there, Cæsar then standing to view the battell, he saw a priuate souldier of his thrust in among the Captaines, and fought so valiantly in their defence, that at the length he draue the barbarous people to flye, and by his meanes saued the Captaines, which otherwise were in great danger to haue bene cast away. Then this souldier being the hindmost man of all the Captains, marching with great paine though the mire and dirt, halfe swimming, and halfe on foote, in the end got to the other side, but left his shield behind him. Cæsar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with ioy to embrace him. But the poore souldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell downe at Cæsars feete, and besought him to pardon him, for that he had left his target behind him. And in AFRICKE also, Scipio hauing taken one of Cæsars ships, and Granius Petronius abord on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurer; he put all the rest to the sword but him, and said he would giue him his life. But Petronius answered him againe, that Cæsars souldiers did not vse to haue their liues giuen them, but to giue others their liues: and with these words he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe through. Now Cæsars selfe did breed this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gaue them bountifully, and did honor them also, shewing therby, that he did not heape vp riches in the warres to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honourably to reward their valiant seruice: and that by so much he thought himselfe rich, by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deserued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valiantnesse in putting himselfe at euery instant in such manifest danger, and in taking so extreme paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy desire of honour that set him on fire, and pricked him forward to do it: but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the constitution of his body, he was leane, white, and soft skinned, and often subiect to head-ach, and otherwhile to the falling sickenesse (the which tooke him the first time, as it is reported, in CORDVBA, a city of SPAINE:) but yet therefore yeelded not to the disease of his body, to make it a cloake to cherish him withall, but contrarily, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his sicke body, fighting alwayes with his disease, trauelling continually, liuing soberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the most nights he slept in his coach or litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwayes able to do something: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the countrey to see townes, castles, and strong places He had alwayes a secretary with him in the coach, who did still write as he went by the way, and a souldier behind him that caried his sword. He made such speed the first time he came from ROME, when he had his office, that in eight dayes he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of horse from his youth, that holding his hands behind him, he would gallop his horse vpon the spurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exercise himselfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupy two secretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. As it is reported, that Cæsar was the first that deuised friends might talke together by writing cyphers in letters, when he had no leasure to speake with them for his vrgent businesse, & for the great distance besides from ROME. How litle account Cæsar made of his diet, this example doth proue it. Cæsar supping one night in MILLANE with his friend Valerius Leo, there was serued Sperage to his boord, and oyle of perfume put into it in stead of sallet oyle. He simply eate it, and found no fault, blaming his friends that were offended: and told them, that it had bene enough for them to haue abstained to eate of that they misliked, and not to shame their friend, and how that he lacked good manners that found fault with his friend. Another time as he trauelled through the country, he was driuen by fowle weather on the sudden to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, & that was so narrow, that one man could but scarce lye in it. Then he said to his friends that were about him: Greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, & the most necessary roomes for the sickest persons. And thereupon he caused Oppius that was sicke to lye there all night: and he himselfe, with the rest of his friends, lay without doores, vnder the easing of the house. The first warre that Cæsar made with the GAVLES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGVRINIANS, who hauing set fire on all their good cities, to the number of twelue, & foure hundred villages besides, came to inuade that part of GAVLE which was subiect to the ROMAINES, as the CIMBRI and TEVTONS had done before, vnto whom for valiantnesse they gaue no place: and they were also a great number of them (for they were three hundred thousand soules in all) whereof there were an hundred, foure score, and ten thousand fighting men. Of those, it was not Cæsar himselfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that ouerthrew them by the riuer of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themselues came suddenly with their army to set vpon him, as he was going towards a city of his confederates. Cæsar perceiuing thar, made haste to get him some place of strength, and there did set his men in battell ray. When one brought him his horse to get vp on, which he vsed in battell, he said vnto them: When I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to follow the chase, but now let vs giue them charge. Therewith he marched forward on foote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before he could make them flie that were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their carts. For there, they that before had fled from the battell, did not only put themselues in force, and valiantly fought it out: but their wiues and children also fighting for their liues to the death, were all slaine, and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this victory was famous, vnto that he also added another as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, he gathered together againe aboue an hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey which they had forsaken, and vnto their townes also which they had burnt: because he feared the GERMAINES would come ouer the riuer of Rheyne, and occupie that countrey lying voide. The second warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he himselfe had caused Arioüistus their king, to be receiued for a confederate of the ROMAINS. Notwithstanding, they were growne very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainly, that hauing any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they would not content them with their own, but meant to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Cæsar perceiuing that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young Gentlemen of noble houses of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine, he called them to councell, and commanded them that were afraid, that they should depart home, and not put themselues in danger against their wils, sith they had such womanish faint-harts, to shrink when he had need of them. And for himselfe, he said, he would set vpon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, saying that the enemies were no valianter then the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferiour vnto Marius. This oration being made, the souldiers of the tenth legion sent their Lieutenants vnto him, to thank him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fel out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iourney with good will to serue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlongs of the campe of the enemies. Arioüistus courage was well cooled, when he saw Cæsar was come, and that the ROMAINES came to seeke out the GERMAINES; where they thought, and made account, that they durst not haue abidden them: and therefore nothing mistrusting it would haue come so to passe, he wondered much at Cæsars courage, and the more when he saw his owne army in a maze withall. But much more did their courage fall, by reason of the fooliſh womens propheſies they had amongst them, which did foretell things to come: who considering the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noyse they made running downe the streame, did forwarne them not to fight vntill the new Moone. Cæsar hauing intelligence thereof, and perceiuing that the barbarous people thereupon stirred not, thought it best then to set vpon them, being discouraged with the superstitious feare, rather rather then loſing time, he ſhould tarie their leiſure. So he did skirmiſh with them euen to their forts, and litle hils where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them ſo, that with great fury they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chaſe, with great ſlaughter, three hundred furlongs, euen vnto the Riuer of Rheyn: and he filled all the fields thitherto with dead bodies and ſpoyles. Howbeit Ariouiſtus flying with ſpeed, got ouer the riuer of Rheyn, and eſcaped with a few of his men. It is ſaid that there were ſlaine foure-ſcore thouſand perſons at this battell. After this exploite, Cæſar left his army amongſt the SEQVANES to winter there: and he himſelfe in the meane time, thinking of the affaires at ROME, went ouer the mountaines into GAVLE about the riuer of Po, being part of his prouince which he had in charge. For there the riuer called Rubico, deuideth the reſt of ITALIE from GAVLE on this ſide of the Alpes. Cæſar lying there, did practiſe to make friends in ROME, becauſe many came thither to ſee him: vnto whom he granted their ſuites they demanded, and ſent them home alſo, partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promiſes and hope. Now during all this conqueſt of the GAVLES, Pompey did not conſider how Cæſar enterchangeably did conquer the GAVLES with the weapons of the ROMAINES, and wanne the ROMAINES againe with the money of the GAVLES. Cæſar being aduertiſed that the BELGÆ (which were the warlikeſt men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third part of GAVLE) were all vp in armes, and had raiſed a great power of men together: he ſtraight made towards them with all poſſible ſpeede, and found them ſpoyling and ouerrunning the countrey of the GAVLES, their neighbours and confederates of the ROMAINES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the moſt part of them, which were in a troupe together; and ſlue ſuch a number of them, that the ROMAINES paſſed ouer deepe riuers and lakes on foote, vpon their dead bodies, the riuers were ſo full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt neareſt vnto the ſea ſide, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld themſelues without any compulſion or fight: whereupon, he led his army againſt the NERVIANS, the ſtouteſt warriers of all the BELGÆ. They dwelling in the wood countrey, had conueyed their wiues, children and goods, into a maruellous great forreſt, as farre from their enemies as they could; and being about the number of ſixſcore thouſand fighting men and more, they came one day & ſet vpon Cæſar, when his armie was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to haue fought that day. At the firſt charge, they brake the horſemen of the ROMAINES, and compaſſing in the twelfth and ſeuenth legion, they ſlue all the Centurions and Captaines of the bands. And had not Cæſar ſelfe taken his ſhield on his arme, and flying in amongſt the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth legion alſo ſeeing him in danger, run vnto him from the top of the hill where they ſtood in battell, and broken the rankes of their enemies, there had not a ROMAINE eſcaped aliue that day. But taking example of Cæſars valiantneſſe, they fought deſperatly beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in a maner ſlaine in the field. It is written that of threeſcore thouſand fighting men, there eſcaped onely but fiue hundred: and of foure hundred Gentlemen and counſellers of the ROMAINES, but three ſaued. The Senate vnderſtanding it at ROME, ordained that they ſhould do ſacrifice vnto the gods, and keepe feaſts and ſolemne proceſſions fifteene daies together without intermiſſion, hauing neuer made the like ordinance at ROME, for any victory that euer was obtained. Becauſe they ſaw the danger had bene maruellous great, ſo many nations riſing as they did in armes together againſt him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For whē Cæſar had ſet his affaires at a ſtay in GAVLE, on the other ſide of the Alpes, he alwaies vſed to lie about the riuer of Po in the winter time, to giue direction for the eſtabliſhing of things at ROME, at his pleaſure. For, not onely they that made ſuite for offices at ROME were choſen Magiſtrates, by meanes of Cæſars money which he gaue them, with the which, bribing the people, they bought their voices, and when they were in office, did all that they could to increaſe Cæſars power and greatneſſe: but the greateſt and chiefeſt men alſo of the Nobility, went into LVCA vnto him. As Pompey, Craſſus, Appius Prætor of SARDINIA, and Nepos, Proconſull in SPAINE. Inſomuch that there were at one time, ſixſcore ſergeants carying rods and axes before the Magiſtrates: and aboue two hundred Senators beſides. There they fell in conſultation, and determined that Pompey & Craſſus ſhould againe be choſen Conſuls the next yeare following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Cæſar ſhould haue money againe deliuered him to pay his army; and beſides, did proroge the time of his gouernment fiue yeares further. This was thought a very ſtrange and an vnreaſonable matter vnto wiſe men. For they themſelues that had taken ſo much money of Cæſar, perſwaded the Senate to let him haue money of the common treaſure, as though he had had none before: yea to ſpeake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, ſighing and lamenting to ſee the decrees they paſſed. Cato was not there then, for they had purpoſely ſent him before into CYPRVS. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes ſteps, when he ſaw that he could not preuaile, nor withſtand them, he went out of the Senate in choler, & cried out amongſt the people, that it was a horrible ſhame. But no man did hearkē to him: ſome for the reuerence they bare vnto Pompey, and Craſſus; and others fauouring Cæſars proceedings, did put all their hope and truſt in him: and therefore did quiet themſelues, and ſtirred not. Then Cæſar returning into GAVLE beyond the Alpes vnto his army, found there a great warre in the countrey. For two great nations of GERMANY had not long before paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn, to conquer new lands: & the one of theſe people were called IPES, & the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the battel which Cæſar fought with them, he himſelfe doth deſcribe it in his Commentaries, in this ſort. That the barbarous people hauing ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time, they notwithſtanding, againſt the law of armes, came & ſet vpon him as he trauelled by the way, inſomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrew fiue thouſand of his horſemen, who nothing at all miſtruſted their coming. Againe, that they ſent him other Ambaſſadors to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith cauſed his whole army to march againſt them, thinking it a folly, & madneſſe, to keep faith with ſuch trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Cauutius writeth, that the Senate appointing againe to do new ſacrifice, proceſſions, and feaſts, to giue thankes to the gods for this victorie, Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cæſar ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the barbarous people, for to purge their citie and commonwealth of this breach of faith, and to turne the curſe vpon him that was the author of it. Of theſe barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thouſand perſons) they were all in maner ſlaine, ſauing a very few of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the riuer of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the SICAMBRIANS, another people of the GERMAINES. Cæſar taking this occaſion againſt them, lacking no good-wil of himſelf beſides, to haue the honor to be counted the firſt ROMAINE that euer paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn with an armie, he built a bridge ouer it. This riuer is maruellous broad, and runneth with great furie; and in that place ſpecially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one ſide to the other: and it hath ſo ſtrong and ſwift a ſtreame beſides, that men caſting downe great bodies of trees into the riuer (which the ſtreame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes & force thereof maruellouſly ſhake the poſts of the bridge he had ſet vp. But to preuent the blowes of thoſe trees, and alſo to breake the furie of the ſtreame, he made a pile of great wood aboue the bridge a good way, & did forcibly ramme them in to the bottome of the riuer; ſo that in ten daies ſpace, he had ſet vp and finiſht his bridge of the goodlieſt carpenters worke, and moſt excellent inuention to ſee to, that could be poſſibly thought or deuiſed. Then paſſing ouer his army vpon it, he found none that durſt any more fight with him. For the SWEVIANS, which were the warlikeſt people of all GERMANY, had gotten themſelues with their goods into wonderfull great vallies and bogges, full of woods and forreſts. Now when he had burnt all the countrey of his enemies, and confirmed a league with the confederates of the ROMAINES, he returned backe againe into GAVLE after he had taried eighteene dayes at the moſt in GERMANY, on the other ſide of the Rheyn. The iourney he made alſo into ENGLAND was a noble enterpriſe, and very commendable. For he was the firſt that ſailed the Weſt Ocean with an army by ſea, & that paſſed through the ſea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that ſo great and famous Iland (which many ancient writers would not beleeue that it was ſo indeed, and did make them vary about it, ſaying it was but a fable and a lie) and was the firſt that enlarged the ROMAINE Empire, beyond the earth inabitable. For twice he paſſed ouer the narrow ſea againſt the firme land of GAVLE, and fighting many battels there, did hurt his enemies more then inrich his owne men: becauſe, of men hardly brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon the warre had no ſuch ſucceſſe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the King, and impoſing a yearely tribute vpon him, to be payed vnto the people of ROME, he returned againe into GAVLE. There he was no ſooner landed, but he found letters ready to be ſent ouer the ſea vnto him: in

in the which he was aduertiſed from Rome, of the death of his daughter, that ſhe was dead with child by Pompey. For the which Pompey, and Cæſar both, were maruellous ſorrowfull: and their friends mourned alſo, thinking that this alliance which maintained the common-wealth (that otherwiſe was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now ſeuered, and broken aſunder; and the rather likely, becauſe the child liued not long after the mother. So the common people at Rome tooke the corps of Iulia, in deſpite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the field of Mars. Now Cæſar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) in ſundry garriſons for the winter time, and returning againe into Italy as he was wont, all Gavle rebelled againe, and had raiſed great armies in euery quarter to ſet vpon the Romaines, and to aſſay if they could diſtreſſe their forts where they lay in garriſon. The greateſt number and moſt warlike men of theſe Gavles, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and firſt did ſet vpon the garriſons of Cotta, and Titurius, whom they ſlue, and all the ſouldiers they had about them. Then they went with threeſcore thouſand fighting men to beſiege the garriſons which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almoſt taken them by force, becauſe all the ſouldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were ſo valiant and couragious, that they did more then men (as they ſay) in defending of themſelues. Theſe newes being come to Cæſar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all poſſible ſpeed, and leauying ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers, made haſte to helpe Cicero that was in ſuch diſtreſſe. The Gavles that did beſiege Cicero, vnderſtanding of Cæſars coming, raiſed their ſiege incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handfull in their hands, they were ſo few. Cæſar to deceiue them ſtill drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies; and commanded his men in no wiſe to ſtirre out to skirmiſh with them, but compelled them to raiſe vp the rampiers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afraid, becauſe the enemies ſhould the leſſe eſteeme of them: vntill at length he tooke oportunity, by their diſorderly coming to aſſaile the trenches of his campe, (they were growne to ſuch a preſumptuous boldneſſe and brauerie,) and then ſallying out vpon them, he put them all to flight with ſlaughter of a great number of them. This did ſuppreſſe all the rebellions of the Gavles in thoſe parts, and furthermore he himſelfe in perſon went in the middeſt of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new ſupply out of Italy of three whole legions, in their roome which he had loſt: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion he himſelfe had leauied in Gavle about the riuer Po. During theſe ſtirres, brake forth the beginning of the greateſt and moſt dangerous warre that he had in all Gavle, the which had bene ſecretly practiſed of long time by the chiefeſt and moſt warlike people of that countrey, who had leauied a wonderfull great power. For euery where they leauied multitudes of men, and great riches beſides, to fortifie their ſtrong holds. Furthermore, the countrie where they roſe, was very ill to come vnto, and ſpecially at that time being winter, when the riuers were froſen, the woods and forreſts couered with ſnow, the medowes drowned with flouds, and the fields ſo deepe of ſnow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the marriſhes nor riuers to be diſcerned, all was ſo ouerflowne and drowned with water: all which troubles together were inough (as they thought) to keepe Cæſar from ſetting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the Gavles were of this conſpiracie, but two of the chiefeſt were the Avernians and Carnvtes: who had choſen Vircingentorix for their Lieutenant Generall, whoſe father the Gavles before had put to death, becauſe they thought he aſpired to make himſelfe king. This Vercingentorix deuiding his armie into diuers parts, and appointing diuers Captaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and countries thereabouts, euen as farre as they that dwell towards the ſea* Adriaticke, hauing further determined (vnderſtanding that Rome did conſpire againſt Cæſar) to make al Gavle riſe in armes againſt him. So that if he had but taried a litle longer, vntill Cæſar had entred into his ciuill wars, he had put all Italy in as great feare and danger, as it was when the Cimbri did come and inuade it. But Cæſar, that was valiant in all aſſaies and dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the newes of this rebellion, he departed with ſpeed, & returned backe the ſelfſame way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they ſhold deale with an army inuincible, and which they could not poſſibly withſtand, conſidering the great ſpeed he had made with the ſame, in ſo ſharpe and hard a winter. For where they would not poſſibly haue beleeued, that a poſt or currer could haue come in ſo ſhort a time from the place where he was vnto them, they wondred when they ſaw him burning and deſtroying the countrey, the towns and ſtrong forts where he came with his armie, taking all to mercy that yeelded vnto him: vntill ſuch times as the HEDVI tooke armes againſt him, who before were wont to be called the brethren of the ROMAINES, and were greatly honoured of them. Wherefore Cæſars men when they vnderſtood that they had ioyned with the rebels, they were maruellouſly ſory, & half diſcouraged. Thereupon, Cæſar departing from thoſe parts, went through the country of the LINGONES, to enter the countrey of the *BVRGONIANS, who were confederates of the ROMAINS, and the neareſt vnto ITALY on that ſide, in reſpect of all the reſt of GAVLE. Thither the enemies came to ſet vpon him, and to enuiron him on all ſides, with an infinite number of thouſands of fighting men. Cæſar on the other ſide taried their coming, and fighting with them a long time, he made them ſo afraid of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the firſt, it ſeemeth notwithſtanding, that he had receiued ſome ouerthrow: for the ARVERNIANS ſhewed a ſword hanged vp in one of their temples, which they ſaid they had won from Cæſar. Inſomuch as Cæſar ſelfe coming that way by occaſion, ſaw it, and fell a laughing at it. But ſome of his friends going about to take it away, he would not ſuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was an holy thing. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as at the firſt had ſaued themſelues by flying, the moſt part of them were gotten with their king into the city of ALEXIA, the which Cæſar went and beſieged, although it ſeemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as alſo for the multitude of ſouldiers they had to defend it. But now during this ſiege, he fell into a maruellous great danger without, almoſt incredible. For an armie of three hundred thouſand fighting men of the beſt men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came againſt him being at the ſiege of ALEXIA, beſides them that were within the citie, which amounted to the number of threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men at the leaſt: ſo that perceiuing he was ſhut in betwixt two ſo great armies, he was driuen to fortifie himſelfe with two wals, the one againſt them of the citie, and the other againſt them without. For if thoſe two armies had ioyned together, Cæſar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this ſiege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wan before it, did deſeruedly winne him more honour and fame then any other. For there, in that inſtant and extreme danger, he ſhewed more valiantneſſe and wiſdome then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this? that they of the city neuer heard any thing of them that came to aide them, vntill Cæſar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMAINES themſelues which kept watch vpon the wal that was built againſt the city, knew alſo no more of it then they, vntill it was done, and that they heard the cries and lamentations of men and women in ALEXIA, when they perceiued on the other ſide of the citie ſuch a number of gliſtering ſhields of gold and ſiluer, ſuch ſtore of bloudy corſlets and armors, ſuch a deale of plate and moueables, and ſuch a number of tents and pauilions after the faſhion of the GAVLES, which the ROMAINES had gotten of their ſpoiles in their camp. Thus ſuddenly was this great armie vaniſhed, as a dreame or viſion: where the moſt part of them were ſlaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the citie of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cæſar and themſelues alſo, in the end, they all yeelded themſelues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Captaine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horſe furniſhed with rich capariſon accordingly, and rode round about Cæſar, who ſate in his chaire of eſtate. Then lighting from his horſe, he tooke off his capariſon and furniture, and vnarmed himſelfe, and laid all on the ground, and went and ſate downe at Cæſars feete, and ſaid neuer a word. So Cæſar at length committed him as a priſoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in the triumph of ROME. Now Cæſar had of long time determined to deſtroy Pompey, and Pompey him alſo. For Craſſus being killed amongſt the PARTHIANS, who onely did ſee, that one of them two muſt needs fall, nothing kept Cæſar from being the greateſt perſon, but becauſe he deſtroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pompey to withſtād that it ſhould not come to paſſe, but becauſe he did not firſt ouercome Cæſar, whom onely he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before ſet light by him, thinking it an eaſie matter for him to put him downe when he would, ſith he had brought him to that greatneſſe he was come vnto. But Cæſar contrarily, hauing had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wreſtler that ſtudieth for trickes to ouerthrow his aduerſary, he went farre from ROME, to exerciſe himſelfe in the warres of GAVLE; where he did traine his army

army, and presently by his valiant deeds did increase his fame and honour, by these meanes became Cæsar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution, but some occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly also the time deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernment at that time of the commonwealth at Rome. For they that made sute for honour and offices, bought the voyces of the people with readie money, which they gaue out openly to vsury, without shame or feare. Thereupon the common people that had sold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hired them: not with their voyces, but with their bowes, slings, and swords. So that the assembly seldome times brake vp, but the pulpit for Orations was defiled and sprinckled with the bloud of them that were slaine in the market place, the city remaining all that time without gouernment of Magistrate, like a ship left without a Pilote. Insomuch as men of deepe iudgement and discretion, seeing such fury and madnesse of the people, thought themselues happy if the commonwealth were no worse troubled then with the absolute state of a Monarchy and soueraigne Lord to gouerne them. Furthermore, there were many that were not afraid to speake it openly, that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the commonwealth, but by the authority of one man onely, that should command them all: and that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Phisition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vsed many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnderhand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the marke he shot at, and fearing lest in the end the people should be compelled to make him Dictator, he perswaded the Senate rather to make him sole Consul, that contenting himself with that more iust and lawful gouernment, he should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not onely make him Consull, but further did proroge his gouernment of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all Spaine and Africke, the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: and further, he receiued yearely of the common treasure to pay his souldiers a thousand talents. Hereupon Cæsar took occasion also to send his men to make suite in his name for the Consulship, and also to haue the gouernment of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his peace, But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Cæsar) withstood them, and to shame and dishonor him, had much needlesse speech in matters of weight. Furthermore they took away the freedom from the Colonies which Cæsar had lately brought vnto the city of Novvmcomvm in Gavle towards Italy, where Cæsar not long before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Consull, he made one of the Senators in that city to be whipped with rods, who came to Rome about those matters: and said, he gaue him those markes, that he should know he was no Romaine citizen, and bade him go his way, and tell Cæsar of it. After Marcellus Consulship, Cæsar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotten among the Gavles, did frankly giue it out amongst the Magistrates at Rome, without restraint or spare. First, he set Curio ỹ Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue also vnto Paul the Consull a thousand fiue hundred talents, with which mony he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Basilick, in the place of Fuluius Basilick. Then Pompey being afraid of this practise, began openly to procure, both by himselfe & his friends, that they should send Cæsar a successor: and moreouer, he sent vnto Cæsar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of Gavle. Cæsar sent him them againe, and gaue euery priuate souldier, two hundred and fiftie siluer Drachmaes. Now, they that brought these two legions backe from Cæsar, gaue out ill and seditious words against him among the people, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruellously desired and wished for in Cæsars campe: and though in Rome, for the malice and secret spite which the gouernors there did beare him, he could hardly obtaine that he desired, yet in Gavle he might assure himselfe, that all the army was at his commandement. They added further also, that if the souldiers there did once returne ouer the mountaines againe into Italy, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cæsar, because he wearied them with too much labour and continuall fight: and withall, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding security in Pompey, and a vaine conceit of himselfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation of warre, as though he had no occasion to be afraid: but only studied to thwart Cæsar in speech, & to crosse the suites he made. Howbeit Cæsar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cæsars Captaines

which was sent to Rome to prosecute his suite, being at the Senate doore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Cæsars time of gouernment which he sued for, clapping his hand vpon his sword, he said: Sith he will not grant it him, this shall giue it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Cæsar propounded, caried great semblance of reason with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: and that both of them as priuate persons should come and make suite of their citizens to obtain honourable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, and granting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make himselfe a tyrant, and in the meane time to grant the other meanes to be a tyrant. Curio making these offers and perswasions openly before the people, in the name of Cæsar, he was heard with great reioycing and clapping of hands, and there was some that cast flowers and nosegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vse to do vnto any man, when he hath obtained victory, and won the games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a letter sent from Cæsar, & made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæsar did not dismisse his armie by a certain day appointed him, the Romains should proclaime him an enemy vnto Rome. Then the Consuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismisse his army: but few agreed to that demand. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæsar should dismisse his armie: thereto they all in maner answered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested againe that both of them should lay downe armes, then they were all indifferently of his mind. Notwithstanding, becausse Scipio did insolently behaue himselfe, and Marcellus also, who cried, that they must vse force of armes, and not mens opinion against a theefe, the Senate rose straight vpon it without further determination; & men changed apparel through the city because of this dissention, as they vse to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæsar, which seemed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would grant him Gavle, that lieth betweene the mountaines of the Alpes and Italie and Illyria, with two legions onely, and then that he would request nothing else; vntill he made suite for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from the gouernment of Cilicia, trauelled to reconcile them together, and pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him he would yeeld to any thing he would haue him, so he did let him alone with his army. So Cicero perswaded Cæsars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and sixe thousand men only, that they might be friends and at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded vnto it, and granted them. But Lentulus the Consull would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themselues gaue Cæsar a happy occasion and colour, as could be, stirring vp his souldiers the more against them, when he shewed them these two noble men and Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, disguised like slaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driuen for feare to steale out of Rome, disguised in that maner. Now at that time, Cæsar had not in all about him aboue fiue thousand footmen, and three thousand horsmen: for the rest of his army, he left on the other side of ý mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So considering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not need so many men of warre at the first, but rather suddenly stealing vpon them, to make them afraid with valiantnesse, taking benefit of the opportunity of time; becausse he should more easily make his enemies afraid of him, coming so suddenly when they looked not for him then he should otherwise distresse them, assayling them with his whole army, in giuing them leisure to prouide further for him: he commanded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armor thē their swords, to take the city of Ariminvm (a great city of Gavle being the first city men come to, when they come out of Gavle) with as little bloudshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that force & army he had with him, vnto Hortensius one of his friends, he remained a whole day together, openly in the sight of euery man, to see the sword players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his bodie a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongst them, and made merrie a while with them, whom be had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be merry, and no man to stir, for he would straight come to them againe: howbeit he had secretly before commanded a few of his trustiest friends to follow him, not altogether, but some one way, and some another way. made as though he would haue gone some other way at the first, but sodainly he turned backe againe towards the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle riuer of Rubicon, which deuided GAVLE on this side the Alpes from ITALIE, he stayed vpon a sodaine. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, to think what an enterprise he tooke in hand: and his thoughts also fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into consideration of the desperatnesse of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himselfe, and spake neuer a word, wauing sometime one way, sometime another way, and oftentimes changed his determination, contrary to himself. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Asinius Pollio, telling him what mischiefes the beginning of this passage ouer that riuer would breed in the world, and how much their posterity and they that liued after them, would speake of it in time to come, but at length, casting from him with a noble courage all those perillous thoughts to come, & speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt dangerous and desperate enterprises: A man can be but once vndone, come on, he passed ouer the riuer; and when he was come ouer, he ran with his coach and neuer stayed, so that before day light he was within the city of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is said, that the night before he passed ouer this riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The city of ARIMINVM being taken, & ỹ rumor therof dispersed through al ITALY euen as if it had bin open war both by sea and land, & as if all the lawes of ROME, together with the extreme bounds and confines of the same had bene broken vp: a man would haue said, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities themselues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALIE. And ROME it selfe also was immediatly filled with thẽ flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parts like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer nor magistrate that could any more command them by authoritie, neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused & disorderly multitude: so that ROME had in maner destroyed it self for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were dangerous stirres and tumults euery where, becausethey that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that seemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himselfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill words some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproued him, & said, that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly, because he had made Cæsar so great and strong against him and the commonwealth. And other againe did blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Cæsar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consull to abuse him too much. On the other side, Phaonius spake vnto him, and bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: for Pompey being one day in a brauery in the Senate, said openly: Let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he lifted, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of souldiers then Cæsar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lies, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Cæsar had bene already at their heeles, and had won all: so that in the end he yeelded vnto them, and gaue place to their fury & madnesse, determining (seeing all things in such tumult and garboile) that there was no way but to forsake the city, & thereupon commanded the Senate to follow him, & not a man to tary there, vnlesse he loued tyranny more then his own liberty & the cõmonwealth. Thus the Cõsuls thẽselues, before they had done their cõmon sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the city, fled euery man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senators, taking their own things in hast, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were some of thẽ also that alwaies loued Cæsar, whose wits were thẽ so troubled & besides themselues with the feare they had conceiued, that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessitie. But aboue all things, it was a lamentable sight to see the city it selfe, that in this feare & trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ship tossed in storme of sea, forsaken of her Pylots & despairing of her safety. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to be their naturall countrey, and reckened Rome no better then Cæsars campe. At that time also Labienus, who was one of Cæsars greatest friends, and had bin alwaies vsed as his Lieutenant in the wars of Gavle, and had valiantly fought in his cause, he likewise forsooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæsar sent his mony and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the city of Corfinivm, the which Domitius kept with thirtie cohorts or ensignes. When Domitius saw he was besieged, he straight thought himselfe but vndone; and dispairing of his successe, he bad a Phisitian, a slaue of his, giue him poison. The Phisitian gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue died. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemencie and wonderfull courtesie Cæsar vsed vnto them he tooke, repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament & bewaile his desperate resolution taken to die. The Phisitian did comfort him againe, and told him that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him sleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went straight and yeelded himselfe vnto Cæsar; who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stole away immediatly, and fled vnto Pompey. When these newes were brought to Rome, they did maruellously reioyce and comfort them that stil remained there: & moreouer there were of them that had forsaken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane time Cæsar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauied men for Pompey. Now Cæsar hauing assembled a great and dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to find Pompey himselfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of Brvndvsivm, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with that army he had, vnto Dyrrachivm: and he himselfe also went thither afterwards, when he vnderstood that Cæsar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cæsar lacked no goodwill to follow him, but wanting ships to take the seas, he returned forthwith to Rome: so that in lesse then threescore dayes he was Lord of all Italy, without any bloudshed. Who when he was come to Rome, and found it much quietter then he looked for, & many Senators there also, he curteously intreated them, and prayed them to send vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters between them, vpon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either becausethey feared Pompey, for that they had forsaken him, or els for that they thought Cæsar meant not as he spake, but that they were words of course to colour his purpose withal. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but told him that it was against the law: Tush, said he, time of war and law, are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for warre cannot abide this franke and bold speech. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of fauour, impairing so much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that haue risen against me, and whom I haue in my hands. When he had spoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple doore where the treasure lay, and finding no keyes there, he caused Smiths to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon began againe to withstand him, and certain men that stood by, praised him in his doing: but Cæsar at length speaking bigly to him, threatned him, he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, Yong man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tel it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly; and euer after that, Cæsar had all at his commandement for the warres. From thence he went into Spaine, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: first to get their armies & Prouinces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwards he might follow Pompey the better, leauing neuer an enemy behind him. In this iourney he was oftentimes himselfe in danger through the ambushes that were layed for him in diuers strange sorts and places, and likely also to haue lost all his army for lacke of victuals. All this notwithstanding he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in, vntill he had gotten their campe and armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants themselues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæsar returned againe to Rome, Piso his father in law gaue him counsell to send Ambassadours vnto Pompey, to treate for peace. But Isauricus, to flatter Cæsar was against it. Cæsar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had bene slaine in Syllaes time: and did somewhat cut off the vsuries that did oppresse them; and besides, did make some such other ordinances as those, but very few, For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, and then did yeeld it vp of himselfe, and made himselfe Consull with Seruilius Isauricus, and after that determined to follow the warres. Al the rest of his armie he left coming on the way, behind him, and went himselfe before with sixe hundred horse, and sixe legions only of footmen, in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuarie, which after the ATHENIANS is called Posidion. Then hauing past ouer the sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he sent his ships backe again vnto BRVNDVSIVM to transport the rest of his souldiers that could not come with that speed he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of body, and lustie youth was decayed) being wearied with so many sundry battels as they had fought with their enemies, complained of Cæsar in this sort. To what end and purpose doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vsing vs like slaues and drudges? It is not our armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, shall we neuer be without our harnesse on our backs, and our shields on our armes? should not Cæsar thinke, at the least when he seeth our bloud and wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the misery and paines that other men do feele? and now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercie of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods themselues cannot withstand, as if he fled before his enemies, and pursued them not. Thus spending time with this talke, the souldiers stil marching on, by small iourneys came at length vnto the city of BRVNDVSIVM. But when they were come, and found that Cæsar had already passed ouer the sea, then they straight changed their complaints and minds. For they blamed themselues, and tooke on also with their captaines, because they had not made them make more haste in marching: and sitting vpon the rocks and cliffes of the sea, they looked ouer the maine sea, towards the realme of EPIRVS, to see if they could discerne the ships returning backe, to transport them ouer. Cæsar in the meane time being in the city of APOLLONIA, hauing but a small armie to fight with Pompey, it grieued him for that the rest of his army was so long of coming, not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a dangerous determination, to imbarke vnknowne in a litle pinnace of 12 oares only, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM, the which he could not do without great danger, considering that all that sea was full of Pompeys ships and armies. So he tooke ship in the night, apparelled like a slaue, and went aboord vpon this litle pinnace, and said neuer a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condition. The pinnace lay in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme and quiet, by reason of a litle wind that came from the shore, which euery morning draue back the waues far into the main sea. But that night (by ill fortune) there came a great wind from the sea, that ouercame the land wind, insomuch as the force & strength of the riuer fighting against the violence of the rage and waues of the sea, the encounter was maruellous dangerous, the water of the riuer being driuen back, & rebounding vpward, with great noise and danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Master of the pinnace seeing he could not possibly get out of ỹ mouth of this riuer, bad the mariners to cast about againe, & to returne against the streame. Cæsar hearing that straight discouered himselfe vnto the Master of the pinnace, who at the first was amazed when he saw him; but Cæsar thẽ taking him by the hand, said vnto him, good felow, be of good cheere, & forwards hardily, feare not, for thou hast Cæsar & his fortune with thee. Then the mariners forgetting ỹ danger of ỹ storme they were in, laid on load with oares, & labored for life what they could against the wind, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they laboured in vaine, and that the pinnace took in abundance of water, and was ready to sinke, Cæsar then to his great griefe was driuen to returne backe againe: who when he was returned vnto his campe, his souldiers came in great companies vnto him, and were very sory, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in danger to go fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arriued, and brought with him the rest of his army from BRVNDVSIVM. Then Cæsar finding himselfe strong enough, went and offered Pompey battell, who was passingly well lodged, for victualling of his campe both by sea and land. Cæsar on the other side, who had no great plentie of victuals at the first, was in a very hard case: insomuch as his men gathered rootes, and mingled them with milke, and eate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it also, & sometime when they skirmished with the enemies, and came along by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their trenches, and said that as long as the earth brought forth such fruits, they would neuer leaue besieging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly cõmanded them, that they should neither cary thoſe words not bread into their campe, fearing leaſt his mens hearts would faile them, and that they would be afraid when they ſhould thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whom they had to fight, ſith they were wearie with no paines, no more then bruite beaſts. Cæſars men did daily skirmiſh hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe, in the which Cæſar had euer the better, ſauing once onely, at which time his men fled with ſuch feare, that all his campe that day was in great hazard to haue bin caſt away. For Pompey came on with his battell vpon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were ſlaine within the very gate & bulwarks of their camp, they were ſo valiantly purſued. Cæſar ſtood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe, but he could not preuaile. For when he would haue taken the enſignes to haue ſtayed them, the enſigne-bearers threw them downe on the ground: ſo that the enemies tooke two and thirtie of them, and Cæſars ſelfe alſo eſcaped hardly with life. For ſtriking a great bigge ſouldier that fled by him, commanding him to ſtay, and turne his face to his enemie: the ſouldier being affraid, lift vp his ſword, to ſtrike at Cæſar. But one of Cæſars pages preuenting him, gaue him ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he ſtrake off his ſhoulder. Cæſar that day was brought vnto ſo great extremity, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or ſpiteful fortune, left off to follow his victorie, and retired into his campe, being contented to haue driuen his enemies into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he ſaid vnto them: The victory this day had bene our enemies, if they had had a Captaine that could haue told how to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more then any night that euer he had. For ſtill his mind ranne with great ſorrow of the foule fault he had committed in leading of his armie, of ſelfe-will to remaine there ſo long by the ſea ſide, his enemies being the ſtronger by ſea, conſidering that he had before him a goodly countrey, rich and plentifull of all things, and goodly cities of MACEDON and THESSALY: and had not the wit to bring the warre frō thence, but to loſe his time in a place, where he was rather beſieged of his enemies for lacke of victuals, then that he did beſiege them by force of armes. Thus fretting and chafing to ſee himſelfe ſo ſtraighted with victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raiſed his campe, intending to go ſet vpon Scipio, making account, that either he ſhould draw Pompey to battell againſt his will, when he had not the ſea at his backe to furniſh him with plentie of victuals; or elſe that he ſhould eaſily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnleſſe he were aided. This remoue of Cæſars campe, did much encourage Pompeys army and his Captaines, who would needs in any caſe haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey himſelfe, he would in no reſpect hazard battell, which was a matter of ſo great importance. For finding himſelfe ſo well prouided of all things neceſſary to tary time, he thought it better to draw this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to conſume this litle ſtrength that remained in Cæſars army: of the which, the beſt men were maruellous well trained, and good ſouldiers, and for valiantneſſe at one dayes battell, were incomparable. But on the other ſide againe, to remoue here and there ſo oft, and to fortifie their camp where they came, and to beſiege any wal, or to keepe watch all night in their armour; the moſt part of them could not do it, by reaſon of their age, being then vnable to away with their paines, ſo that the weaknes of their bodies did alſo take away the life and courage of their hearts. Furthermore, there fell a peſtilent diſeaſe among them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate. Yet was not this the worſt: for beſides, he had no ſtore of money, neither could tell how to come by victuals; ſo that it ſeemed in all likelihood, that in very ſhort time he would come to nothing. For theſe reſpects, Pompey would in no caſe fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his mind in that, who ſtucke in it the rather, becauſe he would auoide ſhedding of his countrimens bloud. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies ſlaine in the campe of his enemies, at the laſt skirmiſh that was betweene them, the which were no leſſe then a thouſand perſons, he couered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, becauſe he ſo long refrained from battell: and ſome prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kings, ſaying that he delayed this war in this ſort, becauſe he would not leaue his authority to command them all, and that he was glad alwaies to ſee many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honour him, & wait vpon him. And Faonius alſo a hare-braind fellow, frantickly counterfeiting the round and plaine ſpeech of Cato, made as though he was maruellous angrie, and ſaid: Is it not great pitie, that we ſhal not eate this yeare of TVSCVLVM figs & all for Pompeys ambitious ambitious mind to reigne alone? and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAINE (where becauſe he had but ill ſucceſſe, he was accuſed of treaſon, that for money he had ſold his armie vnto Cæſar) he went buſily asking, why they fought not with that Merchant, vnto whom they ſaid he had ſold the prouince of SPAINE? So that Pompey with theſe kinds of ſpeeches againſt his will, was driuen to follow Cæſar to fight with him. Then was Cæſar at the firſt, maruellouſly perplexed and troubled by the way, becauſe he found none that would giue him any victuals, being deſpiſed of euery man, for the late loſſe and ouerthrow he had receiued. But after he had taken the citie of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meet with plentie of victuals to relieue his army with, but he ſtrangely alſo did rid them of their diſeaſe. For the ſouldiers meeting with plenty of wine, drinking hard, and making merry, draue away the infection of the peſtilẽce. For they diſpoſed themſelues vnto dancing, masking & playing the BACCHERIANS by the way, inſomuch that drinking drunke they ouercame their diſeaſe, and made their bodies new again. When they both came into the country of PHARSALIA, & both camps lay before each other, Pompey returned againe to his former determination, and the rather, becauſe he had ill ſignes and tokens of misfortune in his ſleepe. For he thought in his ſleepe, that when he entred into the Theater, all the ROMAINS receiued him with great clapping of hands. Whereupon they that were about him grew to ſuch boldneſſe and ſecuritie, aſſuring themſelues of victorie, that Domitius, Spinther and Scipio in a brauerie contended betweene themſelues for the chiefe Biſhopricke which Cæſar had. Furthermore, there were diuers that ſent vnto ROME to hire the neareſt houſes vnto the market place, as being the fitteſt places for Prætors, and Conſuls: making their account alreadie, that thoſe offices could not ſcape them, incontinently after the warres. But beſides thoſe, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAINE knights were maruellous deſirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with gliſtering gilt armors their horſes fat and very finely kept, and themſelues goodly yong men, to the number of ſeuen thouſand, where the Gentlemen of Cæſars ſide were but one thouſand onely. The number of his footemen alſo were much after the ſame reckening. For he had fiue and fortie thouſand againſt two and twentie thouſand. Wherfore Cæſar called his ſouldiers together, and told them how Cornificius was at hand who brought two whole legions, and that he had fifteene enſignes led by Calenus, the which he made to ſtay about MEGARA & ATHENS. Then he aſked them, if they would tary for that aid or not, or whether they wold rather themſelues alone venture battell. The ſouldiers cried out to him, & prayed him not to defer battel, but rather to deuiſe ſome fetch to make ẏ enemy fight as ſoon as he could. Then as he ſacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his army, the firſt beaſt was no ſooner ſacrificed, but his ſoothſayer aſſured him that he ſhould fight within three daies. Cæſar asked him again, if he ſaw in the ſacrifices, any luckie ſigne or tokẽ of good luck. The ſoothſayer anſwered: For that, thou ſhalt anſwer thy ſelf, better then I can do: for the gods do promiſe vs a maruellous great change & alteratiõ of things that are now, vnto another cleane cõtrary. For if thou beeſt well now, doeſt thou think to haue worſe fortune hereafter? and if thou be ill, aſſure thy ſelf thou ſhalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to viſite the watch, mẽ ſaw a great firebrãd in the element, al of a light fire, that came ouer Cæſars campe, and fell down in Pompeys. In the morning alſo when they relieued the watch, they heard a falſe alarme in the enemies campe, without any apparent cauſe: which they cõmonly call a ſodain feare, that makes men beſides themſelues. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raiſed his campe from thence, and to haue gone towards the city of SCOTYSA: and his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowne when his ſcouts came in with great ſpeed, to bring him newes that his enemies were preparing themſelues to fight. Then was he very glad, and after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he ſet his men in battell ray, and deuided them into three ſquadrons, giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left wing vnto Antonius, and placed himſelfe in the right wing, chuſing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But ſeeing that againſt that, his enemies had ſet all their horſemen, he was halfe afraid when he ſaw the great number of them, and ſo braue beſides. Wherfore he cloſely made ſixe enſignes to come from the rereward of his battell, whom he had laid as an ambuſh behind his right wing, hauing firſt appointed his ſoldiers what they ſhould do, when the horſmen of the enemies came to giue them charge. On the other ſide, Pompey placed himſelfe in the right wing of his battell, gaue the left wing vnto Domitius, & the middle battel vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMANE

knights (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left wing of purpoſe to enuiron Cæſars right wing behind, & to giue their hoteſt charge there, where the general of their enemies was: making their account, that there was no ſquadron of footmen, how thicke ſoeuer they were, that could receiue the charge of ſo great a troupe of horſemen, and that at the firſt onſet they ſhould ouerthrow them all, and march vpon their bellies. When the trumpets on either ſide did ſound the alarme to the battell, Pompey commanded his footemen that they ſhould ſtand ſtill without ſtirring, to receiue ỹ charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherfore Cæſar afterwards ſaid, that Pompey had committed a foule fault, not to conſider that the charge which is giuen running with fury, beſides that it giueth the more ſtrength alſo vnto their blowes, doth ſet mens hearts alſo on fire: for the common hurling of all the ſouldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that ſets men on fire. Then Cæſar making his battell march forward to giue the onſet, ſaw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whom he had alſo great confidence) ſpeaking to his ſouldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloud by his name, and ſaid vnto him: Well, Caius Craſſinius, what hope ſhall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Craſſinius caſting vp his hand, anſwered him aloud: This day, ô Cæſar, we ſhall haue a noble victory, and I promiſe thee ere night thou ſhalt praiſe me aliue or dead. When he had told him ſo, he was himſelf the foremoſt man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, being about ſixe ſcore men; and making a lane through the foremoſt rankes, with great ſlaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies, vntill that valiantly fighting in this ſort, he was thruſt in at length into the mouth with a ſword, that the point of it came out againe at his necke. Now the footmen of both battels being come to the ſword, the horſmen of the left wing of Pompey did march as fiercely alſo, ſpreading out their troupes, to compaſſe in the right wing of Cæſars battell. But before they began to giue charge, the ſixe enſignes of footmen which Cæſar had laid in ambuſh behind him, they began to run full vpon them, not throwing away their darts far off, as they were wont to do, neither ſtriking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to ſeeke to hit them ful in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cæſar had taught them. For he hoped that theſe luſty yong gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vſed to ſee themſelues hurt, and the which, being in the prime of their youth and beautie, would be afraid of thoſe hurts, as well for the feare of the preſent danger to be ſlaine, as alſo for that their faces ſhould not for euer be deformed. As indeed it came to paſſe, for they could neuer abide that they ſhould come ſo neere their faces with the points of their darts, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, becauſe they ſhould not be hurt. Then, breaking of themſelues, they began at length cowardly to flie, and were occaſion alſo of the loſſe of all the reſt of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to ſet vpon the ſquadron of the footmen behind, and ſlue them. Then Pompey ſeeing his horſemen from the other wing of his battell, ſo ſcattered and diſperſed, flying away, forgat that he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had bene before, but was rather like a man whoſe wits the gods had taken from him, being afraid and amazed with the ſlaughter ſent from aboue, and ſo retired into his tent, ſpeaking neuer a word, & ſate there to ſee the end of this battell; vntill at the length all his armie being ouerthrowne and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampiers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that ſtood to defend the ſame. Then as a man come to himſelfe againe, he ſpake but this only word: What, euen into our campe? So in haſt, caſting off his coate-armour and apparell of a Generall, he ſhifted him, and put on ſuch as became his miſerable fortune, and ſo ſtole out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himſelfe into the hands of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miſerably ſlain, we haue ſet it forth at large in his life. Then Cæſar entring into Pompeys campe, and ſeeing the bodies layed on the ground that were ſlaine, and others alſo that were a killing, ſaid, fetching a great ſigh: It was their own doing, and againſt my will. For Caius Cæſar, after he had wonne ſo many famous conqueſts, and ouercome ſo many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithſtanding, if he had departed from his armie. Aſinius Pollio writeth, that he ſpake theſe words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke; and ſaith furthermore, that the moſt part of them which were put to the ſword in the campe, were ſlaues and bondmen, and that there were not ſlaine in all this battell aboue ſixe thouſand thousand souldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, Cæsar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwards slue Cæsar himselfe: and it is reported, that Cæsar was very sory for him, when he could not immediatly be found after the battel, & that he reioyced againe when he knew he was aliue, and that he came to yeeld himselfe vnto him. Cæsar had many signes and tokens of victory before this battel, but the notablest of al other that happened to him, was in the city of TRALLES. For in the temple of victory, within the same city, there was an image of Cæsar, and the earth all about it very hard of it selfe, and was paued besides with hard stone: and yet some say that there sprang vp a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an excellent Southsayer, (a countriman and friend of Titus Liuius the Historiographer) was by chance at that time set to behold the flying of birds. He (as Liuie reporteth) knew the very time when the battell began, and told them that were present, Euen now they giue the onset on both sides, and both armies do meete at this instant. Then sitting downe againe to consider of the birds, after he had bethought him of the signes, he sodainly rose vp on his feete, and cried out as a man possessed with some spirit: O Cæsar the victory is thine. Euery man wondering to see him, he tooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an oath that he would neuer put it on againe, till the euent of his prediction had proued his art true. Liuie testifieth, that it came so to passe. Cæsar afterwards giuing freedome vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wan in their country, he followed after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gaue freedome also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theopompus sake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release ASIA also, the third part of ý tribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the ROMAINS. Thẽ he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was slaine: and detested Theodotus that presented him Pompeys head, and turned his head aside becausse he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his seale, & beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteously vsed all Pompeys friends and familiars, who wandring vp and downe the country, were taken of the king of ÆGYPT, and wan them all to be at his commandement. Continuing these courtesies, he wrote vnto his friends at ROME, that the greatest pleasure he took of his victory, was, that he daily saued the liues of some of his countrimen that bare armes against him. And for the warre he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not to haue done it, but that he willingly did it for the loue of Cleopatra: wherein he wan litle honor, and besides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault vpon the king of ÆGYPTS ministers, but specially on Pothinus ý Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the kings seruants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driuen Cleopatra from the court, secretly laid wait all the waies he could, how he might likewise kill Cæsar. Wherefore Cæsar hearing an inckling of it, began thenceforth to spend all the night long in feasting & banqueting, that his person might be in the better safetie. But besides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch spake many things openly not to be borne, only to shame Cæsar, & to stir vp the people to enuie him. For he made his souldiers haue the worst & oldest wheat that could be gotten: then if they did cõplaine of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at another mans cost. And he would serue them also at the table in treene & earthen dishes, saying, that Cæsar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him: which was, a thousand seuen hundred & fifty Myriades; wherof Cæsar had before forgiuẽ seuen hundred and fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a million to pay his souldiers withall. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importãce, & afterwards that he should at more leisure recouer his debt with the kings good will and fauor. Cæsar replied vnto him, & said, that he would not aske counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his affaires, but wold be paid: and therupon secretly sent for Cleopatra, which was in the country, to come vnto him. She only taking Apollodorus SICILIAN of all her friends, took a litle bote, & went away with him in it in the night, and came & landed hard by the foot of the castell. Then hauing no other meane to come into the court without being knowne, she laid her selfe downe vpon a matteresse or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied & bound vp together like a bundle with a great leather thong, & so took her vpon his backe & brought her thus hampered in this fardle vnto Cæsar in at the castle gate. This was ý first occasion (as it is reported) that made Cæsar to loue her: but afterwards, when he saw her sweet cõuersation & pleasant entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her again vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly should reigne together. Vpon this new reconciliation,

a great feaſt being prepared, a ſlaue of Cæſars that was his barber, the fearfulleſt wretch that liued ſtill buſily prying and liſtening abroad in euery corner, being miſtruſtfull by nature, found that Pothinus and Achillas did lie in waite to kill his maſter Cæſar. This being proued vnto Cæſar, he did ſet ſuch ſure watch about the hall, where the feaſt was made, that in fine, he ſlue the eunuch Pothinus himſelfe. Achillas on the other ſide, ſaued himſelf, and fled vnto the kings campe, where he raiſed a maruellous dangerous and difficult warre for Cæſar: becauſe he hauing then but a few men about him, was to fight againſt a great and ſtrong citie. The firſt danger he fell into, was the want of water: for that his enemies had ſtopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water into the caſtell. The ſecond danger he had, was, that ſeeing his enemies came to take his ſhips from him, he was driuen to repulſe that danger with fire, the which burnt the arſenal where the ſhips lay, & that notable library of ALEXANDRIA withal. The third danger was in the battel by ſea, that was fought by the tower of PHAR: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by ſea, he leapt from the peere into a boate. Then the ÆGYPTIANS made towards him with their oares on euery ſide: but he leaping into the ſea, with great hazard ſaued himſelfe by ſwimming. It is ſaid, that then holding diuers books in his hand, he did neuer let thē go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, and ſwam with the other hand, notwithſtanding that they ſhot maruellouſly at him, and was driuen ſomtime to ducke into the water: howbeit ý boate was drowned preſently. In fine, the king coming to his mē that made war with Cæſar, he went againſt him, and gaue him battell, and wan it with great ſlaughter, and effuſion of bloud. But for the King, no man could euer tel what became of him after. Therupon Cæſar made Cleopatra his ſiſter, Queen of ÆGYPT, who being great with child by him, was ſhortly brought to bed of a ſon, whō the ALEXANDRIANS named Cæſarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and ſo going into ASIA, there it was told him that Domitius was ouerthrown in battell, by Pharnaces the ſon of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the Realme of PONT with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victory, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to win ARMENIA the leſſe, procuring all thoſe Kings, Princes, & Gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts to rebel againſt the ROMAINS. Therupon Cæſar went thither ſtraight with three legions, & fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the city of ZELA, where he ſlue his army, and draue him out of al the Realme of PONT. And becauſe he would aduertiſe one of his friends of the ſodainneſſe of this victory, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I ſaw, I ouercame. Theſe three words ending all with like ſound and letter in the Latine, haue a certain ſhort grace more pleaſant to the eare, then can be well expreſſed in any other tongue, After this he returned againe into ITALY, & came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the ſecond time, which office before was neuer granted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then was he choſen Conſul for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very il ſpokon of, for that his ſouldiers in a mutiny hauing ſlaine two Prætors, Coſconius and Galba, he gaue them no other puniſhment for it, but in ſtead of calling them ſoldiers, he named them citizens, & gaue vnto euery one of them a thouſand Drachmaes a man, and great poſſeſſions in ITALY. He was much miſliked alſo for the deſperate parts and madneſſe of Dolabella, for the couetouſneſſe of Anitius, for the drunkennеſſe of Antonius and Cornificius; which made Pompeys houſe be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not big inough for him, wherwith the ROMAINS were maruellouſly offended. Cæſar knew all this well inough, and would haue bene contented to haue redreſſed them: but to bring his matters to paſſe, he pretended he was driuē to ſerue his turne by ſuch inſtruments. After the battell of Pharſalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICKE, king Juba ioyned with them, and leauied a great puiſſant army. Wherefore Cæſar determined to make war with them: and in the middeſt of winter, he tooke his iourny into SICILE. There, becauſe he would take all hope from his captaines & ſouldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very ſands by the ſea ſide, & with the next gale of wind that came, he tooke the ſea with three thouſand footmen, & a few horſmen. Then hauing put thē a land, vnwares to them he hoiſed ſaile againe to fetch the reſt of his army, being afraid leſt they ſhold meete with ſome danger in paſſing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was told him, that his enemies truſted in an anciēt Oracle, which ſaid, that it was predeſtined vnto the family of the Scipios to be conquerous in AFRICE: either of purpoſe to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwiſe in good earneſt to take the benefit of this name (giuen

(giuen by the Oracle) vnto himſelf, in all the skirmiſhes and battels fought, he gaue the charge of his army vnto a man of meane quality and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the race of Scipio AFRICAN, and made him alwaies General when he fought. For he was eftſoones compelled to wearie and harry his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had corne inough, nor the beaſts forrage, but the ſouldiers were driuen to take ſea weeds, called Alga: and (waſhing away the brakiſhneſſe thereof with freſh water, putting to it a litle herb called dogs tooth) to caſt it ſo to their horſe to eate. For the NVMIDIANS (which are light horſmen, & very ready of ſeruice) being a great number together, would be on a ſodaine in euery place, & ſpread all ỹ fields ouer therabout, ſo that no man durſt peepe out of the campe to go for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were ſtaying to behold an AFRICAN doing notable things in dancing & playing with the flute (they being ſet down quietly to take their pleaſure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time giuen their ſlaues their horſes to hold) the enemies ſtealing ſodainly vpon them, compaſſed them in round about, & ſlue a number of them in the field, and chaſing the other alſo that fled, followed them pel mel into their camp. Furthermóre, had not Cæſar himſelf in perſon, and Aſinius Pollio with him, gone out of the campe to the reſcue, and ſtaid them that fled, the war that day had bin ended. There was alſo another skirmiſh where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cæſar taking the enſigne bearer by the collar that caried the Eagle in his hand, ſtaid him by force, and turning his face, told him: ſee, there be thy enemies. Theſe aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battel: and leauing Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neare together, he did fortifie himſelf by ỹ city of THAPSACVS, aboue the lake, to be a ſafe refuge for thẽ all in this battel. But whilſt he was buſie intrenching of himſelfe, Cæſar hauing maruellous ſpeedily paſſed through a great country ful of wood, by by-paths which men would neuer haue miſtruſted: he ſtole vpon ſome behind, and ſodainly aſſailed the other before, ſo that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following the firſt good hap he had, he went forthwith to ſet vpon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the firſt onſet, & the campe of the NVMIDIANS alſo, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three camps, & ſlue fifty thouſand of his enemies, and loſt but fifty of his ſouldiers. In this ſort is ſet down the effect of this battel by ſome writers. Yet others do write alſo, that Cæſar ſelf was not there in perſon at the execution of this battel. For as he did ſet his men in battel ray, the falling ſickneſſe took him, wherunto he was giuen; and therfore feeling it coming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a caſtell not far from thence where the battel was fought, & there took his reſt til the extremity of his diſeaſe had left him. Now for the Prætor & Conſuls that ſcaped from this battel, many of them being taken priſoners, did kil themſelues, & others alſo Cæſar did put to death: but he being ſpecially deſirous of all men els to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with al poſſible ſpeed vnto the city of VTICA, whereof Cato was gouernour, by means wherof he was not at the battell. Notwithſtanding being certified by the way, that Cato had ſlaine himſelf with his owne hands, he then made open ſhew that he was very ſory for it, but why or wherfore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæſar ſaid at that preſent time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, becauſe thou didſt enuy my glory to ſaue thy life. This notwithſtanding, the booke that he wrote afterwards againſt Cato being dead, did ſhew no very great affection nor pitifull heart towards him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his hands, that being dead did ſpeake ſo vehemently againſt him? Notwithſtãding, men ſuppoſe he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemency he ſhewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuerſe others that had borne armes againſt him. Some report, that he wrote that booke, not ſo much for any priuat malice he had to his death, as for ciuil ambition, vpon this occaſion. Cicero had written a booke in praiſe of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likelihood was very well liked of, by reaſon of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, & of the excellent ſubiect thereof. Cæſar therewith was maruellouſly offended, thinking that to praiſe him, of whoſe death he was author, was euen ſo much as to accuſe himſelfe: and therfore he wrote a letter againſt him, & heaped vp a number of accuſations againſt Cato, & intituled the booke Anticaton. Both theſe books haue fauorers vnto this day, ſome defending the one for the loue they beare to Cæſar, & others allowing ỹ other for Catoes ſake. Cæſar being now returned out of AFRICK, firſt of al made an oratiõ to the people wherin he greatly praiſed & cõmẽded this his laſt victory, declaring vnto thẽ, that he had cõquered ſo many coũtries vnto the Empire of ROME, that he could furniſh the cõmonwealth yearly with two hundred thousand bushels of wheate, and twenty hundred thousand pound weight of oile. Then he made three triumphs, ỹ one for Ægypt, the other for the kingdome of Pont, and the third for Africke: not because he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose son being likewise called Iuba, being then a yong boy, was led captiue in the shew of this triumph. But this his imprisonmẽt fel out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous Nvmidian, by the study he fell vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the wisest historiographers of the Grecians. After these three triumphs ended, he very liberally rewarded his soldiers: & to curry fauour with the people, he made great feasts & cõmon sports. For he feasted all the Romaines at one time, at two and twenty thousand tables, & gaue them the pleasure to see diuers sword-players to fight at the sharpe, and battels also by sea, for the remẽbrance of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long before. Thẽ after all these sports, he made the people (as the maner was) to be mustered: and where there were at the last musters before, three hundred & twenty thousand citizens, at this muster there were only but a hundred & fifty thousand. Such misery and destruction had this ciuill war wrought vnto the commonwealth of Rome, and had consumed such a number of Romains, not speaking at all of the mischiefs and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of Italy, and to the other prouinces pertaining to Rome. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Consul the fourth time, and went into Spaine to make war with the sons of Pompey: who were yet but very yong, but had notwithstãding raised a maruellous great army together, and shewed they had manhood and courage worthy to command such an army, insomuch as they put Cæsar himselfe in great danger of his life. The greatest battel that was fought betwen thẽ in all this war, was by the city of Mvnda. For then Cæsar seeing his men sorely distressed, and hauing their hands ful of their enemies, he ranne into the preasse among his men that fought, & cried out vnto them: What, are ye not ashamed to be beatẽ & taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your own hands to these yong boies? And so, with al ỹ force he could make, hauing with much ado put his enemies to flight, he slue aboue thirtie thousand of them in the field, & lost of his owne men a thousand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent and told his friends, that he had often before fought for victory, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his own life. He wanne this battell on the very feast day of the Bacchanalians, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of Rome, about foure yeares before, to begin this ciuil war. For his sonnes, the yonger escaped from the battell; but within few daies after, Diddius brought the head of the elder. This was the last war that Cæsar made. But the triumph he made into Rome for the same, did as much offend the Romaines, and more, then any thing that euer he had done before: because he had not ouercome Captaines that were strangers, nor barbarous kings, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man of Rome, whom fortune had ouerthrowne. And because he had plucked vp his race by the roots, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumph so for the calamities of his country, reioycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alledge in his defence, vnto the gods and men, that he was compelled to do that he did. And the rather they thought it not meet, because he had neuer before sent letters nor messengers vnto the commonwealth at Rome, for any victory that he had euer won in all the ciuill wars: but did alwaies for shame refuse the glory of it. This notwithstanding the Romains inclining to Cæsars prosperity, & taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for thẽ to take breath a litle, after so many troubles & miseries as they had abiddẽ in these ciuil wars they chose him perpetual Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this absolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraid to be deposed: Cicero pronounced before the Senate, that they should giue him such honors as were meet for a man: howbeit others afterwards added too, honors beyond all reason. For men striuing who should most honour him, they made him hatefull and troublesome to themselues that most fauoured him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnesse and honours which they gaue him. Thereupon it is reported, that euen they that most hated him, were no lesse fauourers & furtherers of his honors, then they that most flattered him, because they might haue greater occasions to rise, and that it might appeare they had iust cause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for himself, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did so honorably behaue himselfe, that there was no fault to be found in him: and therefore me thinks amongst other honors they gaue him, he rightly deserued this, that they should build him a temple of clemency, to thanke him for his courtesie he had vsed vnto them in his

For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes against him, and furthermore, did preferre some of them to honor and office in the common wealth: as amongst others, Cassius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwne down, he caused them to be set vp againe: whereupon Cicero said then, that Cæsar setting vp Pompeys images againe, he made his owne to stand the surer. And when some of his friends did counsell him to haue a guard for the safety of his person, and some also did offer themselues to serue him, he would neuer consent to it, but said: It was better to die once, then alwayes to be afraid of death. But to win himselfe the loue and goodwil of the people, as the honorablest guard & best safetie he could haue, he made common feasts againe, and generall distributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the souldiers also he replenished many cities again with inhabitants, which before had bin destroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which the noblest and chiefest cities were these two, CARTHAGE and CORINTH: and it chanced also, that like as aforetime they had bin both taken & destroyed together, euen so were they both set on foote again, and replenished with people, at one self time. And as for great personages, he wan them also, promising some of them, to make them Prætors and Consuls in time to come; and vnto others, honors & preferments: but to all men generally, good hope, seeking all the waies he could to make euery man contented with his reigne. Insomuch as one of his Consuls called Maximus, chancing to die a day before his Consulship ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Consul only for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his house (as the maner was) to salute him, and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferment, being newly chosen officer, Cicero pleasantly said: Come, let vs make haste, and be gone thither before his Consulship come out. Furthermore, Cæsar being borne to attempt all great enterprises, and hauing an ambitious desire besides to couet great honors, ý prosperous good successe he had of his former conquests, bred no desire in him quietly to enioy the fruites of his labors; but rather gaue him the hope of things to come, still kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterprises, and desire of new glory, as if that which he had present were stale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with himselfe as with another man, and a certaine contention to ouercome the things he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, and made preparation also, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had ouercome them, to passe through HYRCANIA (compassing in the sea Caspium, and mount Caucasus) into the Realme of PONTVS, and so to inuade SCYTHIA: and ouerrunning all the countries, and people adioyning vnto high GERMANIE, and GERMANIE it self, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALY, & so to enlarge the ROMAINE Empire round, that it might be euery way cõpassed in with the great sea Oceanum. But whilest he was preparing for this voyage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of PELOPONNESVS, in the market place where the city of CORINTH stãdeth. Thẽ he was minded to bring the riuers of Aniens and Tiber, straight from ROME, vnto the city of CIRCES with a deepe channell and high banks cast vp on either side, and so to fall into the sea at TERRACINA, for the better safety and commodity of the merchants that came to ROME to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and seaw all the water of the marishes betwixt the cities of NOMENTVM and SETIVM, to make firme land, for the benifite of many thousands of people: and on the sea coast next vnto ROME, to cast great high bankes, & to cleanse all the hauen about OSTIA, of rocks and stones hidden vnder the water, and to take away al other impediments that made the harborough dangerous for ships, and to make new hauens and arsenals meete to harbour such ships as did continually trafficke thither. All these things were purposed to be done, but tooke no effect. But the ordinance of the Kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMAINES vsing then the ancient computation of the yeare, had not onely such incertaintie and alteration of the moneth and times, that the sacrifices and yearely feasts came, by litle & litle, to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the reuolution of the Sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMAINES themselues, only the priests vnderstood it. And therefore when they listed, they sudainly (no man being able to controlle them) did thrust in a moneth aboue their ordinary number, which they called in old time, * Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first that deuised this way, to put a moneth betweene: but it was a weake remedy, and did litle helpe the correction of the errours that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæſar committing this matter vnto the Philoſophers, & beſt expert Mathematicians at that time; did ſet forth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMAINS do vſe vntill this preſent day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithſtanding that enuied his greatneſſe, did not ſticke to find fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one ſaid, to morrow the ſtarre Lyra wil riſe: Yea, ſaid he, at the commandement of Cæſar, as if men were compelled ſo to ſay & thinke, by Cæſars edict. But the chiefeſt cauſe that made him mortally hated, was the couetous deſire he had to be called king: which firſt gaue the people iuſt cauſe, and next his ſecret enemies, honeſt colour to beare him ill will. This notwithſtanding, they that procured him this honour and dignitie, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybilline prophecies, how the ROMAINS might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made war with them, & were led by a king, but otherwiſe that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were ſo bold beſides, that Cæſar returning to ROME frõ the city of ALBA, when they came to ſalute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, & Cæſar alſo angry, he ſaid, he was not called king, but Cæſar. Then euery man keeping ſilence, he went his way heauie and ſorowfull. When they had decreed diuers honors for him in the Senate, the Conſuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole aſſembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was ſet by the pulpit for Orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his abſence. But he ſitting ſtill in his maieſtie, diſdaining to riſe vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, anſwered them: that his honors had more need to be cut off then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people alſo, to ſee that he ſhould ſo lightly eſteeme of the Magiſtrates of the commonwealth: inſomuch as euery man that might lawfully go his way, departed thẽce very ſorowfully. Thereupon alſo Cæſar riſing, departed home to his houſe, and tearing open his dublet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friends, that his throate was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithſtanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excuſe his folly, he imputed it to his diſeaſe, ſaying, that their wits are not perfit which haue this diſeaſe of the falling euill, when ſtanding on their feete they ſpeake to the common people, but are ſoone troubled with a trembling of their bodie, and a ſodaine dimneſſe & giddineſſe. But that was not true, for he wold haue riſen vp to the Senat, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friẽds (or rather a flatterer) would not let him, ſaying: what, do you not remember that you are Cæſar, and wil you not let them reuerence you, & do their duties? Beſides theſe occaſions and offences, there followed alſo his ſhame and reproch, abuſing the Tribunes of the people in this ſort. At that time the feaſt Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in old time, men ſay was the feaſt of ſhepheards or heardmen, & is much like vnto the feaſt of the LYCÆIANS in ARCADIA. But howſoeuer it is, that day there are diuers noble mens ſons, yong men, (and ſome of them Magiſtrates themſelues that gouern then) which run naked through the city, ſtriking in ſport them they meet in their way, with leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them giue place. And many noble women and gentlewomen alſo, go of purpoſe to ſtand in their way, and do put forth their hands to be ſtricken, as ſcholers hold them out to their ſchoolemaſter, to be ſtricken with the ferula: perſwading themſelues that being with child, they ſhall haue good deliuery; and ſo being barren, that it wil make them to conceiue with child. Cæſar ſate to behold that ſport vpon the pulpit for Orations, in a chaine of gold, apparelled in triumphant manner. Antonius who was Conſull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy courſe. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at liberty, and he came to Cæſar, and preſented him a Diademe wreathed about with laurell, Whereupon there roſe a certaine crie of reioycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpoſe. But when Cæſar refuſed the Diademe, then all the people together made an outcrie of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a ſecond ſhout of ioy, but yet of a few. But when Cæſar refuſed it againe the ſecond time, then all the whole people ſhouted. Cæſar hauing made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it and thereupon roſe out of his chaire, and commanded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were ſet vp images of Cæſar in the city, with Diademes vpon their heads, like kings. Thoſe, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe, and furthermore, meeting with them that firſt ſaluted Cæſar as king, they committed them to priſon. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes, becauſe of Brutus, who had in old old time driuen the kings out of ROME, and that brought the kingdome of one perſon, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Cæſar was ſo offended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneſhips, and accuſing them, he ſpake alſo againſt the people, and called them Bruti and Cumani, to wit, beaſts and fooles. Hereupon the people went ſtraight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the firſt Brutus, and by his mother of the houſe of the Seruilians, a noble houſe as any was in ROME, and was alſo nephew and ſonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithſtanding, the great honors and fauour Cæſar ſhewed vnto him, kept him backe that of himſelfe alone he did not conſpire nor conſent to depoſe him of his kingdome. For Cæſar did not only ſaue his life, after the battel of PHARSALIA when Pompey fled, & did at his requeſt alſo ſaue many moe of his friends beſides: but furthermore, he put a maruellous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Prætorſhip for that yeare, & furthermore was appointed to be Conſull the fourth yeare after that, hauing through Cæſars friendſhip obtained it before Caſſius, who likewiſe made ſuite for the ſame: and Cæſar alſo, as it is reported, ſaid in this contention, indeed Caſſius hath alledged beſt reaſon, but yet ſhal he not be choſen before Brutus. Some one day accuſing Brutus while he practiſed this conſpiracie, Cæſar would not heare of it, but clapping his hand on his body, told them, Brutus wil looke for this skin: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue deſerued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions ſake, he wold not ſhew himſelfe vnthankfull or diſhonourable. Now they that deſired change, and wiſhed Brutus onely their Prince and Gouernour aboue all other, they durſt not come to him themſelues to tell him what they would haue him to do, but in the night did caſt ſundry papers into the Prætors ſeate, where he gaue audience, and the moſt of them to this effect: Thou ſleepeſt Brutus, and art not Brutus indeed. Caſſius finding Brutus ambition ſtirred vp the more by theſe ſeditious bils, did prick him forward, and edge him on the more, for a priuate quarrel he had conceiued againſt Cæſar: the circumſtance wherof, we haue ſet downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæſar alſo had Caſſius in great ielouſie, and ſuſpected him much: wherupon he ſaid on a time to his friends, what wil Caſſius do, thinke ye? I like not his pale lookes. Another time when Cæſars friends complained vnto him of Antonius & Dolabella, that they pretended ſome miſchiefe towards him: he anſwered them again, As for thoſe fat men & ſmooth combed heads, quoth he, I neuer reckon of them; but theſe pale viſaged and carion leane people, I feare them moſt, meaning Brutus and Caſſius. Certainly, deſtinie may eaſier be foreſeene, then auoided, conſidering the ſtrange and wonderfull ſignes that were ſaid to be ſeene before Cæſars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and ſpirits running vp and downe in the night, and alſo the ſolitary birds to be ſeene at noon daies ſitting in the great market place, are not all theſe ſignes perhaps worth the noting, in ſuch a wonderful chance as happened? But Strabo the Philoſopher writeth, that diuers men were ſeene going vp & down in fire: and furthermore, that there was a ſlaue of the ſoldiers, that did caſt a maruellous burning flame out of his hand, inſomuch as they that ſaw it, thought he had bene burnt; but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cæſar ſelf alſo doing ſacrifice vnto the gods, found that one of the beaſts which was ſacrificed had no hart: and that was a ſtrange thing in nature, how a beaſt could liue without a heart. Furthermore there was a certaine Soothſayer, that had giuen Cæſar warning long time afore, to take heed of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of the moneth) for on that day he ſhold be in great danger. That day being come, Cæſar going vnto the Senate houſe, and ſpeaking merily vnto the ſoothſayer, told him the Ides of March be come: So they be, ſoftly anſwered the Soothſayer, but yet are they not paſt. And the very day before, Cæſar ſupping with Marcus Lepidus, ſealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the boord: ſo talk falling out amongſt thē, reaſoning what death was beſt, he preuenting their opinions, cried out aloud, Death vnlooked for. Then going to bed the ſame night, as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windows and doores of his chamber flying open, the noiſe awoke him, and made him afraid when he ſaw ſuch light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being faſt aſleepe, weepe and ſigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable ſpeeches: for ſhe dreamed that Cæſar was ſlaine, and that ſhe had him in her armes. Others alſo do denie that ſhe had any ſuch dreame, as amongſt other, Titus Liuius writeth, that it was in this ſort: The Senate hauing ſet vpon the top of Cæſars houſe for an ornament and ſetting forth of the ſame, a certaine pinnacle, Calpurnia dreamed that ſhe ſaw it broken downe, and that ſhe thought ſhe lamented and wept for it. Inſomuch that Cæſar riſing in the morning, ſhe prayed him if it were poſſible, not to go out of the doores that day, but to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate vntill another day.

Caſſius ſtirreth vp Brutus againſt Cæſar.

Predictions and foreſhewes of Cæſars death.

Cæſars day of his death prognoſticated by a Soothſayer.

The dreame of Calpurnia, Cæſars wife.

And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would ſearch further of the Soothſaiers by their ſacrifices, to know what ſhould happen him that day. Therby it ſeemed that Cæſar likewiſe did feare or ſuſpect ſomewhat, becauſe his wife Calpurnia vntil that time was neuer giuen to any feare and ſuperſtition: and that then he ſaw her ſo troubled in mind with this dreame ſhe had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothſaiers hauing ſacrificed many beaſts one after another, told him that none did like them: then he determined to ſend Antonius to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Brutus, ſirnamed Albinus, in whom Cæſar put ſuch confidence, that in his laſt will and teſtament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conſpiracie with Caſſius and Brutus: he fearing that if Cæſar did adiorne the ſeſſion that day, the conſpiracie would be betrayed, laughed at the Soothſayers, & reproued Cæſar, ſaying, that he gaue the Senate occaſion to miſlike with him, and that they might think he mocked them, conſidering that by his commandement they were aſſembled, and that they were ready willingly to grant him all things, & to proclaime him king of all his prouinces of the Empire of Rome out of Italy, and that he ſhould weare his diademe in al other places both by ſea & land. And furthermore, that if any man ſhould tel them from him, they ſhould depart for that preſent time, and return againe when Calpurnia ſhould haue better dreames, what would his enemies and ill willers ſay, and how could they like of his friends words? And who could perſwade them otherwiſe, but that they would think his dominion a ſlauery vnto them, and tyrannicall in himſelfe? And yet if it be ſo, ſaid he, that you vtterly miſlike of this day, it is better that you go your ſelf in perſon, & ſaluting the Senate, to diſmiſſe thē til another time. Therewithall he took Cæſar by the hand, and brought him out of his houſe. Cæſar was not gone far from his houſe, but a bond man, a ſtranger, did what he could to ſpeake with him: and when he ſaw he was put back by the great preſſe & multitude of people that followed him, he went ſtraight into his houſe, & put himſelf into Calpurniaes hands, to be kept til Cæſar came backe againe, telling her that he had greater matters to impart vnto him. And one Artemidorus alſo born in the Ile of Gnidos, a doctor of Rhetorick in the Greeke tongue, who by means of his profeſſion was very familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates; and therfore knew the moſt part of al their practiſes againſt Cæſar, came and brought him a litle bill written with his owne hand, of all that he meant to tel him. He marking how Cæſar receiued all the ſupplications that were offered him, & that he gaue them ſtraight to his men that were about him, preſſed nearer to him, and ſaid: Cæſar, reade this memoriall to your ſelfe, and that quickly, for they be matters of great weight, and touch you nearely. Cæſar took it of him, but could neuer reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did ſalute him: but holding it ſtill in his hand, keeping it to himſelfe, went on withall into the Senate houſe. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was ſome man elſe that gaue him that memorial, & not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to giue it Cæſar, but he was alwayes repulſed by the people. For theſe things, they may ſeeme to come by chance; but the place where the murther was prepared, & where the Senate were aſſembled, and where alſo there ſtood vp an image of Pompey dedicated by himſelfe amongſt other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater, all theſe were manifeſt proofes, that it was the ordinance of ſome god, that made this treaſon to be executed, ſpecially in that very place. It is alſo reported, that Caſſius (though otherwiſe he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterpriſe, he did ſoftly call vpon it, to aide him: but the inſtant danger of the preſent time, taking away his former reaſon, did ſodainly put him into a furious paſſion, and made him like a man halfe beſides himſelfe. Now Antonius that was a faithfull friend to Cæſar, and a valiant man beſides of his hands, him Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate houſe, hauing begunne a long tale of ſet purpoſe. So Cæſar comming into the houſe, all the Senate ſtood vp on their feete to do him honour. Then part of Brutus companie and confederates ſtood round about Cæſars chaire, and part of them alſo came towards him, as though they made ſuite with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from baniſhment: and thus proſecuting ſtill their ſuite, they followed Cæſar till he was ſet in his chaire. Who denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after another, becauſe the more they were denied, the more they preſſed vpon him, and were the earneſter with him, Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his hands, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the ſigne giuen the confederates to ſet vpon him. Then Caſca behind him, ſtrake him in the necke with his ſword; howbeit the wond was not great nor mortall, becauſe

Caſca the firſt that ſtrake at Cæſar

becauſe it ſeemed, the feare of ſuch a diuelliſh attempt did amaze him, & take his ſtrength from him, that he killed him not at the firſt blow. But Cæſar turning ſtraight vnto him, caught hold of his ſword, and held it hard, & they both cried out, Cæſar in latin: O vile traitor Caſca, what doeſt thou? And Caſca in Greek to his brother: Brother, help me. At ý beginning of this ſtir, they that were preſent, not knowing of the cõſpiracie, were ſo amazed with the horrible ſight they ſaw, they had no power to flie, neither to help him, nor ſo much as once to make an outcrie. They on ý other ſide that had cõſpired his death, cõpaſſed him in on euery ſide with their ſwords drawn in their hands, that Cæſar turned him no where, but he was ſtricken at by ſome, and ſtil had naked ſwords in his face, & was hackled & mangled among them, as a wild beaſt taken of hunters. For it was agreed among thẽ, that euery man ſhould giue him a wound, becauſe al their parts ſhold be in this murther: and then Brutus himſelf gaue him one wound about his priuities. Men report alſo, that Cæſar did ſtil defend himſelf againſt ý reſt, running euery way with his body: but when he ſaw Brutus with his ſword drawne in his hand, then he pulled his gowne ouer his head, and made no more reſiſtance, & was driuen either caſually or purpoſedly, by the counſel of the conſpirators, againſt the baſe, whereupon Pompeys image ſtood which ran all of a goare bloud till he was ſlaine. Thus it ſeemed that the image tooke iuſt reuenge of Pompeys enemie, being throwne down on the ground at his feet, & yeelding vp the ghoſt there, for the number of wounds he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three & twentie wounds vpon his bodie: and diuers of the conſpirators did hurt themſelues, ſtriking one body with ſo many blowes. When Cæſar was ſlaine, the Senate (though Brutus ſtood in the middeſt amongſt them, as though he would haue ſaid ſomething touching this fact) preſently ranne out of the houſe, and flying, filled all the citie with maruellous feare and tumult. Inſomuch as ſome did ſhut too the doores, others forſooke their ſhops and ware-houſes, and others ranne to the place to ſee what the matter was: and others alſo that had ſeene it, ran home to their houſes againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæſars chiefeſt friends, ſecretly conueying themſelues away, fled into other mens houſes, and forſooke their owne. Brutus and his confederates on the other ſide, being yet hot with this murther they had committed, hauing their ſwords drawne in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenance to flie, but otherwiſe, boldly holding vp their heads like men of courage, & called to the people to defend their liberty, and ſtayd to ſpeake with euery great perſonage, whom they met in their way. Of them, ſome folowed this troupe, and went amongſt them, as if they had bin of the conſpiracie, and falſly chalenged part of the hõnor with them: amongſt them was Caius Octauius and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death for their vaine couetouſnes of honor, by Antonius, and Octauius Cæſar the yonger; and yet had no part of that honor for the which they were both put to death, neither did any man beleeue that they were any of the confederates or of counſel with thẽ. For they that did put them to death, took reuenge rather of the wil they had to offend, then of any fact they had cõmitted. The next morning, Brutus & his confederates came into the market place to ſpeak vnto the people, who gaue thẽ ſuch audience, that it ſeemed they neither greatly reproued nor allowed the fact: for by their great ſilence they ſhewed that they were ſory for Cæſars death, & alſo that they did reuerence Brutus. Now the Senate granted general pardon for all that was paſt, & to pacifie euery man, ordained beſides, that Cæſars funerals ſhould be honored as a god, & eſtabliſhed all things that he had done, and gaue certain prouinces alſo, and conuenient honors vnto Brutus & his confederates, wherby euery man thought al things were brought to good peace and quietnes again. But when they had opened Cæſars teſtament, & found a liberall legacie of mony bequeathed vnto euery citizen of Rome, & that they ſaw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gaſhes of ſwords, thẽ there was no order to keep the multitude & cõmon people quiet, but they plucked vp forms, tables & ſtooles, and laid them all about the body, and ſetting them afire, burnt the corſe. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the fire-brands, and went vnto their houſes that had ſlaine Cæſar, to ſet them afire. Other alſo ran vp and down the city to ſee if they could meet with any of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meet with neuer a man of them, becauſe they had locked thẽſelues vp ſafely in their houſes. There was one of Cæſars friends called Cinna that had a maruellous ſtrange & terrible dreame ý night before. He dreamed that Cæſar bad him to ſupper, and that he refuſed & would not go: then that Cæſar took him by the hand, & led him againſt his wil. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæſars body in the market place, notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an ague on him besides, he went into the market place to honour his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane sort asked him what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to another, and that other vnto another, so that it ranne straight through them all, that he was one of them that murthered Cæsar: (for indeed one of the traitors to Cæsar, was also called Cinna as himselfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murherer, they fell vpon him with such fury, that they presently dispatched him in the market place. This stirre and furie made Brutus and Cassius more affraid then of all that was past, and therfore within few daies after they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamity they suffered till their deaths, we haue written it at large in the life of Brutus. Cæsar died at sixe and fiftie yeares of age, and Pompey also liued not passing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other fruite of all his reigne and dominion, which he had so vehemently desired all his life, and pursued with such extreme danger, but a vaine name onely, and a superficiall glorie, that procured him the enuie and hatred of his countrey. But his great prosperitie and good fortune that fauoured him all his life time, did continue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, pursuing the murtherers both by sea and land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all the that were actors or counsellers in the conspiracie of his death. Furthermore, of all the chances that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Cassius aboue all other, is most to be wondered at: for he being ouercome in battel at the iourney of Philippes, slue himself with the same sword with the which he strake Cæsar. Againe, of signes in the element, the great comet which seuen nights together was seene very bright after Cæsars death, the eight night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnesse of the Sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not out, whereby it gaue but small heate: therefore the aire being very cloudie and darke, by the weakenes of the heate that could not come forth, did cause the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe fruite, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the ghost that appeared vnto Brutus, shewed plainly, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cæsar. The vision was thus: Brutus being ready to passe ouer his armie from the city of Arydos to the other coast lying directly against it, slept euery night (as his maner was) in his tent; and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires, for by report he was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle sleepe as euer man did) he thought he heard a noise at his tent doore, & looking towards the light of the lamp that waxed very dim, he saw a horrible vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnesse, and dreadful looke, which at the first made him maruellously afraid. But when he saw that it did him no hurt, but stood by his bed side, & said nothing; at length he asked him what he was. The image answered him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the city of Philippes. Then Brutus replied againe, and said, Well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him. After that time, Brutus being in battel neare vnto the city of Philippes, against Antonius and Octauius Cæsar, at the first battell he wanne the victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstood him, he draue them into yong Cæsars campe, which he took. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared againe vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereupon Brutus knowing that he should die, did put himselfe to all hazard in battel, but yet fighting could not be slaine. So seeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowne, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre off, and there setting his swords point to his breast, fell vpon it, and slue himselfe; but yet, as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend that dispatched him.

Cæſar ſlain, and had 23 wounds vpon him.

Alexander the Great with Iulius Cæsar.

ENTRING into conſideration of Alexander and Cæſar, it is an eaſie matter to ſpeake, and much eaſier to proue, that they are two of the braueſt Chieftaines of warre, that are to be noted in hiſtories: that their vertues out of warre are excellent, and haue great reſemblance together: that both of them were nobly borne, learned, eloquent, liberall, moderate, very louing to their friends and ſeruants, and wonderfull much made of, & obeyed of Captaines and ſouldiers of their armies, and mercifull euen to their enemies: that euen from their youth they made good proofe of the future greatneſſe of their courages: that their exploits are altogether admirable: that they be two miracles for militarie diſcipline, whether a man doth looke into the ſhortneſſe of the time of their warres, and the countries which they haue paſſed through, as it were with the turning of a hand: or that they behold the enemies they haue ouercome, the townes and prouinces they haue conquered; their wiſdome, valour, and happineſſe, hauing neuer receiued repulſe, but alwayes carying victory in their hands, and making valour their aduantage with an aſſured good direction. Both of them were in maruellous danger of their perſons, the one in the citie of the MALLIANS, the other in SPAINE, againſt the ſonne of Pompeius. Both of them were by Soothſayers expreſly told of their death, whom they loued and reſpected. Both of them in the meane ſpace (as it were blindfold) did throw themſelues into danger, from the which men would haue withdrawne them. But he that will meerely conſider the life of either of them, ſhall find himſelf in a field, whereof the eye cannot ſee the end, nor the diuers wayes obiect vnto it, but remaineth dazled, not knowing whither to point it, he ſeeth ſo many things at once before him. If he come to preferre the life of one before the other, he entreth into an Ocean of diſcourſe, & cannot tell which of the two he ſhould chuſe, nor to what port to go to diſcharge himſelfe of this man here, before the other there; yet to encourage ſome bodie to ſaile in this ſea, let vs row to the ſhore: and (to ſpeake plainly without figure) let vs ſee wherein the one doth paſſe the other, to leaue the Reader his free iudgement of that we will ſay. At this preſent I wil in few words ſhew what may be obſerued moſt memorable, in the adoleſcencie of the one and of the other, of their exploits of warre, of their vices and vertues, of their death, and what followed after. I pleade firſt for Alexander, not mentioning his race, his beautie, nor the ſweetneſſe of his body, which they ſpeake of ſo much; all that being nothing worth in reſpect of vertue: his continencie vnto women, and for that he did moderatly vſe the exerciſes of his bodie, doth ſo much the more condemne Cæſars exceſſe and frailtie of his youth, doing and ſuffering filthy things, not to be ripped vp any further. The ambition of Alexander came of a noble minde, as witneſſeth that he ſpake of the running at the games Olympicall, his diſcourſe with the Ambaſſadors of PERSIA, and the complaint he made to his companions, that his father would leaue him nothing to conquer. Whereas Cæſar after he had remained ſometime in NICOMEDIA & in GREECE, he caſt himſelf into the armes of the common people at ROME, being bountifull, and making orations to gaine their hearts, suing for pettie offices finely to attaine to the greater. To conclude, he tooke a quite contrary course vnto Alexander, who traced the great royall broade way to vertue, to become one day the honor of the world: and had also to his schoole-master the learnedst man of all men, and shewed himselfe indeed a most worthy disciple of Aristotle. But Cæsar pricked forward by his naturall wit, and tyrannicall manners of his time, was possessed (in an vnluckie houre for him and his countrey) with the intollerable vice of self-will and ambition, which was cause of his death. The loue that Alexander bare from his infancie vnto learning and learned men, makes him farre excell other Princes. The honour that he did vnto Homer the Poet, returned againe to himselfe: how praise-worthy are his courtesies and liberality vnto Diogenes, Xenocrates, and others? To the contrary, Cæsar neuer seemed to care for any man, but for himselfe; or if he haue regarded some, or giuen gold and siluer by handfuls, it was but to gaine men, and by degrees to serue his turne, to raise him to that greatnesse he aimed at, rather then for any other consideration. Now as may be said of the one and the other, he was,

In counsell wise: and valorous in fight.

And to speake truly, it is their true and right title of honour, and the aduantage they haue of all those that haue gone before them: let vs see if we can a litle in particular qualifie Alexander.

A sturdie warrier, neuer fearing harmes,
And dreadfull to his enemies in armes:

As saith Æschilus: for what was all his warre in ASIA after the death of Philippus, but tempests, extreame heates, wonderfull deepe riuers, maruellous high mountaines, monstrous beasts for greatnesse to behold, wild sauage fashions of life, change and alteration of Gouernors vpon euerie occasion, yea treasons and rebellions of some? At the beginning of his voyage, GREECE did yet lay their heads together, for remembrance of the warres that Philippus made vpon them, the townes gathered together, MACEDONIA inclined to some change and alteration, diuers people farre and neare lay in waite to see what their neighbours would do, the gold and siluer of PERSIA flowing in the Orators purses, and Gouernors of the people in euery town did raise vp Peloponnese: Philippus treasure and coffers were emptie, and the debts were great. In despite of all these troubles, and in the middest of his pouertie, a young man, but newly come to mans estate, durst in his mind thinke of the conquest of ASIA, yea of the Empire of the whole world, with thirtie thousand footemen, and fiue thousand horse, or (as some other thinke) with fiue and fortie thousand footmen, and fiue thousand and fiue hundred horse; hauing to entertaine this warre in readie money but two and fortie thousand crownes, or (as Duris writeth) prouision of victuals and money but for thirtie dayes: howbeit he was furnished with magnanimitie, with temperance, with wisdome and valour; being more holpen in this marshall enterprise, with that he had learned of his tutor Aristotle, then with that which his father Philippus had left him: he was armed with a iust quarrell against the PERSIANS, sworne enemies vnto GREECE, vnto whom they had done infinite wrongs and iniuries: his magnanimitie and valiantnesse appeared in all his fights, were it in a pitched field, or in assaults, and taking of townes; neuer sparing his person, hauing bene grieuously wounded in sundrie fights. What valour shewed he in the city of the MALLIANS, he himselfe alone against so many barbarous people? With what constancie did he encourage his surgeons to plucke out a dart that stucke fast in his breast? Let no man, saith he, be so faint-hearted nor cowardly; no, not if my life were in question, I could not thinke that a man would beleeue I feared death, if he had any feeling or feare in my behalfe. Now for a man in twelue yeares space and lesse, to haue done these things, and to haue trauelled a conquerour the most part of the world, is a commendation passing mens vnderstanding. Cæsar on the contrary part, hauing made his preparations long before, happily found Crassus to pay his debts he ought, to the end to corrupt the city of ROME: and afterwards, hauing practised a dangerous league with Pompeius, he taketh armes, and entreth into FRANCE, where his subtilties did him as good seruice as his armes: in the meane space, he had his meanes, through whose aide, in the end he ouerthrew the whole state of the commonwealth of ROME. Now Alexander is not so admirable, for that by his prowesse he ouercame his enemies, as he was by the wonderfull wise and verteous behauiour in the middest of his armes, where indeed he shewed himself a perfect Philosopher; whereof it is good to alledge some examples, that shal bring vs to the goodly discourse of the vertues of this Prince, surpassing Cæsar in that respect.

Therefore

Therefore we may ſee his proweſſe accompanied with great iuſtice, a ſweet temperance, an excellent bountie, a good order and exquiſite wiſedome: directing all things by good diſcretion and ripe iudgement. In all his doings you ſhall hardly diſcerne, that is a deed of valour, that of humanitie, that of patience: but all his exploits ſeemed to be mingled and compounded of all the vertues together. Yet it is true, that alwaies in euery action, there is a vertue eminent aboue the others: but that pointeth them all to one end. In Alexanders actions they ſee, that his valiantnes is gentle, and his gentleneſſe valiant: his liberalitie husbandrie, his choler ſoone down, his loues temperate, his paſtimes not idle, and his trauels gracious. What is he that hath mingled feaſting with wars, and militarie expeditions with ſports? Who hath intermingled in the middeſt of his beſieging of townes, and in the middeſt of skirmiſhes and fights, ſports, banquets, and wedding ſongs? Who was euer more enemie to thoſe that did wrong, or more gracious to the afflicted? Who was euer more cruell to thoſe that fought, or more iuſt vnto ſuppliants? Let vs bring forth Porus wittie ſayings, who being brought priſoner before Alexander, and by him asked how he would be vſed: he anſwered: Like a king. So Alexander following on ſtill, asked him if he would ſay anie thing more: No, ſaid he, for all is contained in that word onely. And ſo may they in all Alexanders deeds, to his friends and enemies, at the beginning and end of his life adde too this verſe: Like a wiſe man.

How liued he? Like a wiſe man. How caried he himſelfe in all his exploits of warre? Like a wiſe man. How hath he conuerſed amongſt men openly and priuatly? Like a wiſe man. He hath ſome faults in his behauiour, and we will not forget to ſpeake of them. But as all rules haue their exceptions, and yet therefore not to be taken away: and a pimple or wart ſhall not ſtaine the perfections of the face otherwiſe verie faire: ſo Alexanders follies and imperfections cannot take away this honour from him, which wiſe men giue him. If we would here helpe our ſelues with examples, we ſhould write that which Plutarch hath ſo learnedly and briefly gathered out of ſo manie good authors, who tooke pleaſure to do that in the life of Alexander, which they iudge Xenophon did in Cyrus: to wit, to ſet before all men the pattern of a prince complete in all vertues. And whereas Cæſar diſtained his life with a continuall violent deſire to ſubdue his countrie, committing a greater fault in the laſt warres, and towards the end of his life, then if he had lien with his owne mother: as alſo this damnable illuſion did torment him the night before he entred into Italie to violate the libertie of Rome; Alexander was not pricked forward but by vertue it ſelf, to begin a iuſt warre worthy of a great king, not of purpoſe to ſet his feet vpon the throats of the Greekes, but to bring all the world to a peaceable and happie gouernment. His wars made the Greekes ſhed no teares. Cæſar filled all his country with fire and teares. Alexander keeping his ſouldiers vnder obedience, ſuffering none of them that followed him to commit any diſorders, he brought the barbarous people through the helpe of his friends to be ciuill. Cæſar vndid ſome of his friends, others forſooke him, he filled Rome with the inſolencie of his ſouldiers, and ſowed there the graines of infinite confuſions that came out of his bloud. But what hath bene the continencie of Alexander, to whom all things ſucceeded as he wiſhed? He would not ſee the Ladies that were priſoners, and through his temperance was as much conqueror of their beauties, (notwithſtanding, he was in the flower of his age, and of a luſty complexion) as of the proweſſe of men by his valiantneſſe: yea he made leſſe account of thoſe women they ſhewed him, then of thoſe that he neuer ſaw. And where he was gracious to all ſorts of people, he ſhewed himſelfe as vntoward to them that were faire. How did he threaten Philoxenus, that would haue bought him two boyes of a Merchant of Tarentvm? And if he did loue Roxane and Statira, it was becauſe he would lawfully marie them, and for the good of his affaires: and not as Cæſar, that forgat himſelfe too much in thoſe matters. But furthermore, what praiſe deſerueth Alexander, that will not ſteale a victorie? O how noble is his courage, that would not accept Darius offers: but would needs haue Greece command Asia, as it was requiſite! What diligence vſed he in following of his enemie? and otherwiſe what compaſſion tooke he of the vnworthy death of him? how did he puniſh Beſſus? All his former behauiour ſheweth that he had a good and a true kingly mind in him: that he loued not traitors, nor treaſon, and would not ouercome but with honour. Cæſar indeed did purſue Pompey, but he did not puniſh the murderers, till he had diſcouered that they conſpired againſt him. Now to make an end of that we haue to ſay for Alexander: we may gather out of the diſcourſe of his life, that the diuine prouidence made a preſent vnto this Prince of the vertues moſt apparent in all the other noble Greekes and Romanes:

who beſides his pietie, iuſtice, & equitie, in his aduerſity he ſtrengthened himſelfe with hope: in proſperitie, enuironed with flatterers, he was not drunke with his greatnes, he did acknowledge he was mortall, and humbled himſelfe many wayes: he is wonderfull patient, beareth the hard words of his familiars: he neither taketh pen nor ſword in hand to be reuenged of thoſe that offended him, thinking it a worthie thing in a king to ſuffer himſelfe to be blamed, and to heare ill to do good: ſhewing a hartie affection and great honour to his friends, euen for their ſakes to forbeare his own neceſſary commodities, to write vnto them familiarly, & to haue a ſpeciall care of their perſons, and of their affaires. He prouided his ſeruants pay of creditors ſixe millions of gold due for his ſouldiers. He ſent out of Asia into Greece the like ſumme to build temples againe to their gods, in place of thoſe which the Persians had ouerthrowne. To conclude, in the midſt of his affaires he ſhewed an aſpiring and inuincible valor, not being faint harted for any danger whatſoeuer. It is true that Cæſar in this caſe had many things common with him, as we will tell you hereafter. This notwithſtanding Alexander alwayes kept himſelfe conſtant, and after ſuch a manner, that he followed not vice, neither ſeemed he ſo much to blemiſh his goodly vertues as the other. Among other vices, they blame Alexander for drunkenneſſe and choler. I will neither excuſe the one nor the other in him: but as for this laſt, there was neuer Prince that would ſooner confeſſe his faults after he had done them through this vehemencie of his, whereunto he was ſomwhat giuen by nature: it may be ſaid alſo that Clitus, Caliſthenes, and ſome others that felt the force of his anger, were the chiefe cauſe & motiue of it, and had brought the miſchiefe vpon thẽſelues. And to ſpeake the troth, there is no reaſon that a ſeruãt much made of by his maſter, ſhold ſtand ſo highly vpon himſelf, that he will beare nothing, but wilfully run his head againſt a ſtone which he might eaſily haue auoided, if he could but haue kept his tong, and giuen place to his furie that could preſently vndo him. Euery man will condemne Alexander for his ill vſage of the Indian ſouldiers, coming out of a towne vpon his word giuen them. And as for the Philoſophers, it is a matter whereof ſomwhat may be ſaid, wherin they ſhould haue bene more ſpare in their practiſes, to haue done longer ſeruice to their countrey, and not to haue prouoked ſo much a puiſſant and victorious enemy. And as for the nation of the Cossians, in that he vtterly deſtroyed them for ſacrifice of the funerals of Hephæſtion, it is an vnexcuſable fault, what excuſe ſoeuer may be made for it. But the gracious entertainments he gaue Taxiles, and Porus, to ſo many nations ſubdued, to ſo many townes taken: the diuers & great honors he gaue vnto the captaines of his army, & the ordinarie courſe of his life wonderfull mercifull, do ſomwhat ſalue the wounds of his vnpremeditated choler, and his exceeding griefe and ſorow for his fauorites and familiars. The which we muſt diſtinguiſh from the ſtrange hatred that Cæſar hid in his heart, againſt all thoſe that hindred his doings, without regard to any man. And where he pardoned ſome before & after victory, it was but for his aduancemẽt, not for any good will he bare them: for in Affrick he put many of them to death whom he ſuſpected, nay he ſpared not Cato himſelf after his death. As for the teares he ſhed taking Pompeyes ſeale, refuſing to ſee the head of him, nor Theodotus that brought it him: & contrariwiſe, fauouring the ſeruants & friends of the dead, & writing goodly letters to Rome, which they call, Kiſſing of his dead enemy: his acts that went before, and followed after, may plainely ſhew, that all that was but a tragicomedy ceremoniouſly ended; although otherwiſe they had had ſo many matters to deale in together, that it was not poſſible but that ſome remainder of the ancient knowledge meeting then in the heart, ſhould ſtir vp ſome inward contrariety within: as alſo it hapneth to men of great courage, that contrary paſſions meeting together, do ſhew more without, then remaineth within. The wicked Theodotus deſerued no leſſe then Beſſus: but Cæſar was not Alexander, neither went he into Ægypt but for the aduancement of his affaires, which could not well be compaſſed but by the deſtruction of Pompey: the which when he had obtained, made him forget his dutie openly. For Alexanders drunkenneſſe, ſome deſirous to excuſe it, alledge that he dranke not much, but was long at the table, and ſpent the time talking with his friends. As they tell of Cato Vtican, that he ſate at the table with his friends all night long vntil the morning: whereof ſome ſaid that his buſines in the commonwealth was cauſe, which he followed all the day: this hindering him that he had no leiſure to go to his booke when night came, he tooke great delight to conferre with learned men at his table. If Alexander after he had trauelled about ſo many affaires of the commonwealth, the which he would neuer leaue vndone to follow his owne pleaſures, dranke ſomewhat liberally among his captaines, yea ſuppoſe that he exceeded meaſure more then once: yet will I not conclude that he made vſe

of it,and that he deſerued the name of a drunkard. I will not excuſe the fault he committed at the inſtance of Lais the curtiſan,not the promiſe that he made of a priſe of ſix hundred crowns to his Captaines,vnto him that could drinke moſt: for it is not in glaſſes and goblets that men ſhould ſhew their ſtrength.But there died at this quaffing and carrouſing, one and forty of his Captaines.And as for himſelfe,truly he was too lightly led by Medius,to go drink with him all night, and the next morning: whereupon he fell ſicke, and would not forbeare to drinke wine for all that,which caſt him into a feauer that left him not.For where they ſay he was poiſoned,it hath no likelihood of reaſon in it.Be it that this Prince did exceed in drinking,yet that notwithſtanding,wine muſt not drown nor bury ſo many excellent vertues that do ſhine in him in time of peace and war.Cæſars intemperancy in his pleaſures,and his vnſatiable ambition,is an extremitie without all compariſon more vehement and dangerous then Alexanders choler or cuppe. And as for his death,as the continuance and greatneſſe of his glory was pure and vnſpotted,free from enuie, during the ſtrength of his age, whileſt he liued in this world:ſo after his death this glory held out ſtill in the wonted maner,he being lamented of all his armie,of all GREECE and EVROPE;many royall branches hauing ſprung from his ſouldiers,leauing the world in diuiſion to foure ſimple Captaines, whoſe iſſue after them haue continued many yeares in poſſeſſion of their parts.Whereas Cæſar to the contrary,hauing with ſo great labour and trauell by many obſcure and oblique waies,attained to the height of a ſhamefull glory,and which wan him the hatred of the chiefeſt members of the commonwealth,was immediatly caſt downe,litle lamented of thoſe that loued good lawes and the good of the ſtate,the which he left turmoiled with ciuill warres; and which began to make ſome ſhew againe vnder his nephew, whom the diuine prouidence (hauing regard to things much more excellent then either heauen or earth) had in his counſell determined to make him Monarch of the world.As to the contrary,Alexander was happily ſtayed in BABYLON,where he was told by the diuines,the wicked ſpirit hauing(according to the knowledge it pleaſed the iuſt Iudge to giue him)coniectured and foretold ſomething of that which God had long time before reuealed vnto his by his faithfull Prophet. But yet after Auguſtus,the Empire of ROME fell againe into new misfortunes,and was neuer but vnconſtant from that time forward,till in the end it ſunke vnder her owne weight.The like chanced to Alexanders ſucceſſors,but not through his fault:and that makes the memory of him more famous.Thus haue you all I can ſay of him.Let vs ſpeake ſomthing of Iulius Cæſar alſo,not that I pretend to attaine to that which may be ſaid of him:for it would require a more ſufficient man then my ſelfe to performe that.But to make ſome compariſon with Alexander,whoſe deeds he chancing one day to reade of in a booke, he fell a weeping,enuying the braue exploits of the other.Let vs therfore conſider if he haue done things that came neare,or did excell the other. Firſt of all,vnto all the noble acts that may be written of Alexander in his youth,I do obiect the worthy act of Cæſar againſt the pirats,which were more his priſoners then he theirs.vnto whom he paid ranſome in ſuch ſort, that he made them repent their folly that they euer medled with him. So that vpon land they found he was very round with them, as alſo their iudge at ſea, though he were but a young man in their hands. That is but an example of the reſt of his life, who could abide no companion, and much leſſe a maiſter, as being borne to all great things, and delighting in nothing but to be excellent in all the rareſt and higheſt things of the world: as his deeds did witneſſe,after he came to beare office in the commonwealth,euen to the end of his dayes.Now albeit his eloquence is no ſmall thing to be ſpoken of, which did him notable ſeruice in many troubleſome encounters; though it was a wonder to ſee the excellency of his ſtile and grace,liuely to expreſſe all things in ſo fine and goodly terms,that the ſmootheſt Muſes neither would,nor could ſpeake more ſweetly then he: yet ſince we had rather ſtand vpon good deeds then faire words,let vs paſſe ouer this matter,ſo much to ſupport Alexander,and let vs ſee whether it may be receiued for truth of all men of vnderſtanding: that Cæſar is the moſt excellent Captaine that euer was in the world. Albeit that Alexander had but a ſmall meanes, yet he was Lord of a great kingdome,he had men and credit.But Cæſar without patrimonie of much worth, without money and with few men, performed the greateſt things that may be thought of. Alexander had to do with women and children, if one compare the people he fought with, with thoſe whom Cæſar ouerthrew: not in fiue or ſixe battels, but in more then fifty, very well ordered,where he was euer the weaker in number of men,but the greater in valour: neuer vanquiſhed, but euer victor: and was neuer hurt that I can tell of, though he would venture euen to his laſt, and let his fleſh go as freely as the meaneſt ſouldier of his legions. And yet in the meane time they ſhall find he was better ſtayed in his enterpriſes then Alexander, that like a ſwift running ſtreame, would run into any danger, which indifferently ioineth with all that cometh againſt it. So he was in the heat of his age, and Cæſar entred into doings being a man of ripe iudgement, and well onwards in yeares. To ſay it is a great commendation for a Generall in the field, headlong to put himſelf into all dangers, making no difference betwixt himſelf and a common ſouldier, that is ſomwhat too forward: and therefore therin I find Cæſar to be preferred before Alexander, onely for that he was not ſo forward without great neceſſitie. So that his happineſſe defended him in all parts, as alſo for that Alexander ſeemed to haue ſought to be beaten. Shall I tell you that Cæſar killed a million of enemies, hath triumphed for a million of others and hath made an innumerable number to flie? That in leſſe then ten yeares while the warre in Gavle endured, he wan eight hundred townes, and ſubdued three hundred nations? If I ſhould mention the wars he made in fifteen yeares ſpace, it would make a whole booke to ſpeak onely but of the praiſes he deſerued. The Svvizzers, Germaines, Gavles, Romaines, Ægyptians, Africans, the Asians, and his fiue triumphs of ſo many enemies, ſo mighty, and in ſhew ſo inuincible, do approue his valor and ſufficiency in all the parts requiſite in a cheftaine of warre. His vertues and happines being his tutors, he got about him a world of good wils of certaine valiant Captaines and ſouldiers together, whom he ordered ſo wel, that he made them ready to performe what he commanded, and hauing ſuch an vnmatchable cariage towards them, he made them inuincible with him: and in the middeſt of his continuall troubles, he did reade, meditate, ſpake, wrote, and left behind him the goodlieſt booke that a martiall man, and one that entertaineth the Muſes, can deuiſe to take in his hands. His Orations were a long time held in great reputation among the Romanes. And for his reſpect vnto men learned, valiant, & vertuous, Cæſar had renoũced himſelf, if he had ſhut his gate againſt ſuch men. The dangers Alexander paſſed through were great, but what were they in reſpect of Cæſars dangers, enuironed with ſo braue enemies, and in ſo great a number, as were the Gavles, and Pompeys followers? What foule parts haue bene played him by ſome of his owne people, and yet he weighed them not? But to the contrary, he ſuffered ſome of them to runne what courſe they liked beſt: he ſent the cariage and goods to other: he alwayes reſpected and honoured his enemies, when they made no head againſt him. And by his friends he ſent reaſonable conditions vnto Pompey, before he would fight with him. Furthermore, when he entred into wars, being greatly in debt, and raiſed vp with hope, hauing the chiefeſt in Rome his aduerſaries, he took vpon him to fight with all the enemies abroad, and to make his way in deſpite of the world to the ſoueraignty of Rome, the which he ſaw had need of a good maſter, not of ſo many pettie Lords. His wonderfull foreſight ſerued him altogether in all occurrences, being neuer preuented in any thing he went about, but alwaies obtained more then he deſired. His magnanimity weighed more then any other vertue they could note in him: which is as much as one would ſay, that Cæſar outweighed all the other Captaines of the Greekes and Romaines. He was almoſt at all the battels: in the warres where he commanded, he was neuer beaten but in his Lieutenants. For the skirmiſh in the which Pompey on a time had the better, it is not worth the ſpeaking of it: becauſe he could not tell how to follow his victory. And it is a ſingular direction, fauoured with a moſt rare happineſſe, that amongſt ſo many blowes giuen, Cæſar neuer had one giuen him. If he found fauour of Craſſus before he went to the warres, that cannot be imputed any blame to him, ſince he alwayes payed his friends well, and brought his enemies to reaſon, though they ſet againſt him. If iuſtice accompanied the proweſſe of Alexander, if he haue vſed moderation, gentleneſſe, and humilitie in his victories, if he ſhewed himſelfe wiſe and circumſpect in his purpoſes: what ſhall be ſaid of Cæſar then? Whoſe gentleneſſe is ſo much ſpoken of, that men iudge that that was one of the occaſions of his death. His paſtimes were very ſerious: and after he began to deale in affaires, he neuer played but in good earneſt, and yet would he neuer loſe his times of recreation, and his pleaſant talke and communication with his friends and familiars. But in the middeſt of his victories, how did he vſe his enemies, and thoſe that ſet themſelues againſt him? He was a lightening of warre, that ouerthrew all that durſt withſtand him: and he neuer medled with any that yeelded without reſiſtance. He was faithfull, wiſe, valiant, and couragious, and did not allow all kind of meanes to obtaine victorie: although more then once he might haue ſewed (as they ſay) the caſe of the Foxe, with the skinne of the Lyon.

The vertues and perfections of Cæſar both in war and peace.

But

But yet he followed in good time his predeceſſors, although he did finely aſſault the moſt part of his enemies, and deſtroyed the one by the other. Cæſars ambition was very extreme, but he couered it in another maner of ſort then Alexander did: who paſſing ouer a riuer, let fall certaine words, plaine enough, that he ſought the praiſe of the ATHENIANS. And the falſe inuentions to make the glory of his name to continue for euer amongſt the INDIANS, do not they diſcouer a moſt groſſe vanitie, which did but labour after that which it could not attaine? But Cæſar deſired earneſtly, and touched the end of his intentions. His proweſſe is wonderfull gracious, and his gentleneſſe graue and valiant: his liberalitie ſo great, that to thinke what he ſhould giue, was more then the gift it ſelfe, how great ſoeuer. Alſo he gathered no riches together in the warres, to liue afterwards in deliciouſneſſe at his pleaſure: it was a reward of vertue that he locked vp, to recompence men of valour, and to leaue good ſouldiers a meane to liue by honeſtly at home, when age and their wounds did conſtraine them to leaue warres. He was neuer weary of any trauell more then Alexander: and gaue not himſelfe to ſo much eaſe, though he was elder, ſlenderer, and thinner of bodie, and ſubiect to the falling ſickneſſe: but he hardened himſelf againſt it by continuall exerciſe of his bodie and mind, accompanied with an incredible quickneſſe and diligence. He hauing left FRANCE, and running after Pompeius to BRVNDVSIVM, he ſubdued all ITALIE in leſſe then three weekes, returned againe from BRVNDVSIVM to ROME; from whence he went to the heart of SPAINE, where he ouercame extreame hardneſſe in the war againſt Afranius and Petreius, and at the long ſiege of MARSEILLES. From thence he returned into MACEDONIA, wan the battell of PHARSALIA, and followed Pompeius into ÆGYPT, which he ſubdued alſo. After that he came into SYRIA, and into the kingdome of PONT, where he fought with Pharnaces: from thence into AFRICKE, where he ouercame Scipio and Iuba. Afterwards he returned againe through ITALIE and SPAINE, and there ouercame the ſonne of Pompeius. Now weigh therewithall the trauels, fights, conqueſts and expeditions of Alexander: then ſay plainely, what you think of it: Cæſar caried it by much. The onely wars of the GAVLES haue bene more ſharp and dangerous then all the conqueſts of ASIA and the INDIANS. For it is not in paſſing ouer mountaines and riuers ill guarded, that ſhewes the deeds of men: it is to ouercome a ſubtill and puiſſant enemie. But I pray you, theſe words of Cæſar to the Maiſter of the Brigantine (who vnleſſe they had known him, would haue paſſed him from APOLLONIA to BRVNDVSIVM) were they not more ſwelling then the ſea it ſelfe? courage my friend, ſaid he, ſaile hardily: for thou carieſt Cæſar & his fortune. And that which he ſaid paſſing ouer the riuer of Rubicon, to enter into ITALIE: A man can be but once vndone: what a courage did he ſhew in that? Truly a mind, that from thence did behold death, and cared for no more, but for the execution of his counſels. If a man obſerue the directions of Alexander in his exploits, what is that in reſpect of the wiſdome of Cæſar? being wont to ſay, he loued victorie gotten by counſell more then by force. I know that Alexander was adorned with moſt excellent vertues, and hurt with very few knowne vices. For therin it ſeemeth he hath lattiſed vp Cæſar, and many others of the chiefeſt in the GREEKE and ROMAINE hiſtorie: although I cannot diſſemble alſo, that he was led by flatterers and women too: witneſſe that which he did at the inſtigation of Laïs and of his minions. As alſo that his deeds were but wind: dangerous vices in all men, but eſpecially in Princes: from which Cæſar kept himſelf with better vnderſtanding. But if we bring in ſhew the good vnderſtanding, the ſpirit, the iudgement, the conduct, the profound knowledge, the eloquence, the hardineſſe, the greatneſſe of courage, the more then humane boldneſſe in the middeſt of the greateſt dangers: the trauels, the paines, the bounty, the gentleneſſe, the curteſie, the liberality, and the good fortune of Cæſar: we ſhall haue enough to ſpeake of. They obiect this againſt him, that among the Senators and others which tooke Pompeius part, he ſpared them that could not much hurt him: and others whom he thought he could not gaine, he ouercame thē in AFRICK. But Brutus, Caſſius, and his adherents ſhew, that Cæſar ſought nothing elſe but to carie himſelfe graciouſly, if his ill-willers would haue let him alone. And ſure it is very likely, that if they had borne with him but a while longer, matters had not gone on with ſuch a violent courſe as they did after his death: but the eſtate of ROME had bene gouerned with better policie, and the ambition of this great perſon hauing attained his deſire, had bene ſatisfied, & would haue fallen of himſelfe. For whereas he did leane to the flatteries of Balbus and Antonius, to diſdaine the Senat, and to couet the markes and ſignes of royall dignitie, theſe were but the blaſts of this wicked wind, which ſuch dangerous bellowes entertained & kept in his heart. Now in this he cannot be Cæſars vices.

excuſed. On the contrary ſide, they cannot too much condemne this paſſion of his, which ſufficiently appeared in the firſt voyage he made into SPAINE: when paſſing by a pelting village, he preferred the firſt place in that to the ſecond in ROME. This paſſion increaſed in him euer after, ſo mightily ouerruling all the reſt, & ſo abſolutely poſſeſſing his mind, that it caried him whither it would, and made him that without reſpect of his country or of himſelf he neuer left running, vntil that his fierce horſe caſt him on the ground, and brake his neck. Yea, ſo many victories and triumphs drew him not for all that to ſeek reſt: but (as Alexander ſailed vp & downe the Ocean, during his laſt ſicknes, and ſome hours before his death) he embraced greater wars & conqueſts then before. For that he did in reforming the Kalender, and the enterpriſe of ſo many buildings and works for the commonwealth, ſheweth, that that mind was a bow euer bent. For his voluptuouſnes, peraduenture it will not become vs to ſpeak of it; and we were better with ſilence and ſhame lament mans imperfection, then in deſcrying of noble perſons, content thoſe that are neuer merry, but when one feedeth their malice. The ambition wherwith he was infinitly wounded, coming to fight with this wickedneſſe after women, made him quickly leaue the haunt, vterly to ſubdue it afterwards: to the end that his pleaſures ſhould neuer make him ſteale a minute of an houre, nor to remoue one foot from the occaſions offered him to raiſe him to greatnes. As for his death, it was violent indeed, but practiſed by the moſt part of them to whom he had giuen life, and who continued not long after him. It is true, his high cariage of himſelf was cauſe of his death: for nothing wanted to his happineſſe, but to loue his city, and to continue to be more carefull then he was to pleaſe the Senate and people, as he had begun after his fiue triumphs, pardoning all, raiſing one and other to offices in the commonwealth, and ſetting vp againe the ſtatues of Pompey. Now being fallen againe into this deſperate deſire to be yet greater, he made ſo many offended with him, that diuerſe put that in execution, which one man alone could not eaſily haue brought to paſſe. But yet he hath that more then Alexander, that his death was reuenged. To the contrary, Alexanders mother, wiues, and children made a poore end; his armie remained as a body without a head, and he had a good grace that compared it to Cyclope Polypheme, when Vliſſes had put out his eye. His Captaines and ſucceſſours deuoured one another by long warres. As for Cæſar, he liued ſtill in the perſon of his ſucceſſour Auguſtus, who hauing ouercome a world of hard aduentures, eſtabliſhed a Monarchy: the which in deſpite of a million of tempeſts, hath continued many hundreds of yeares. And ſpecially the name of Cæſar, by excellent priuiledge hath remained vnto thoſe that after him reigned in the Empire of ROME: and his valiantneſſe was, and yet is to this day deſired of all men, that by valorous exploits ſeeke to win to their name immortall praiſe and glory. You looke here, Reader, to ſee to which of the two I ſhould giue the precedencie: but ſince the world hath bene too litle for the one and the other, I ſhould go too farre if I plainely ſpake what I thought. Now that I haue ſpoken for the other, I ceaſſe, and leaue you to your iudgement.

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

THE Orator Demades on a time flouriſhed in ATHENS, becauſe in all his doings and ſayings in the adminiſtration and gouernment of the common-wealth, he alwayes fauoured the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in reſpect whereof he was eftſoones compelled, both in his counſell and lawes, to preferre many things to the diſhonour of his city, ſaying, that they muſt pardon him, becauſe he gouerned the ſhipwracks of his country. This was an arrogant ſpeech: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion, he ſaid truly. For indeed Demades ſelfe was the ſhipwracke of the commonwealth, becauſe he liued ſo inſolently, and gouerned ſo lewdly. Inſomuch as Antipater ſaid of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaſt ſacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion which had to fight againſt the cruell and bitter enemie of the time, were ſo obſcured by the calamities of GREECE, that his fame was nothing ſo great as he deſerued. For we muſt not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it ſelfe but weake, in theſe verſes:

Demades arrogant ſaying.

When ſtormes of ſore aduerſities (o king) do men aſſaile,
It daunts their courage, cuts their combes and makes their hearts to quaile.

But we muſt onely giue place to fortune, who when ſhe frowneth vpon any good and vertuous man, her force is ſo great, that where they deſerue honor and fauour, ſhe violently heapeth falſe and malicious accuſations againſt them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite which indeed it deſerueth. And yet it ſeemeth to many, that free cities are moſt cruell vnto their good citizens in time of proſperitie: becauſe thay flow in wealth and liue at eaſe, which maketh them of haughty minds. But it is clean contrary. For aduerſity commonly maketh mens maners ſowre, cholericke, and very haſtie beſides, ſlow to heare, churliſh, and offended with euery lirle ſharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, ſeemeth to caſt their aduerſity in their teeth: and he that telleth them plainly of their faults, ſeemeth alſo to deſpiſe them. For like as hony ſweete by nature, applied vnto wounds, doth bring both ſmart and paine: euen ſo, ſharpe words, though profitable, do bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with diſcretion and courteſie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth ſweete and pleaſant things μειλιχα, as yeelding, and not ſtriuing with contrariety, againſt that part of the mind, whereby we be angry

The power of vertue and fortune.

Aduerſity maketh men bad.

and froward. For euen as ſore eyes do like to look on black and dark colours, and cannot abide the bright and glaring: ſo in a city, where for want of foreſight and gouernment, things go not well, men be ſo diuers and vnwilling to heare of their own faults and eſtate, that they had rather continue in their folly and danger, then by ſharpnes of words be rebuked and reſtored. So that it being vnpoſſible to amend one fault with a greater, that commonwealth muſt be in great danger, that when it hath moſt need of helpe, is lotheſt to receiue any: and he alſo hazardeth himſelfe, that plainly telleth them their faults. Like as therfore the Mathematician ſaith, that the Sun doth not altogether follow the motiõ of the higheſt heauen: nor yet is moued directly contrary. but fetching a cõpaſſe a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, & by variety of approching and departing preſerueth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature: euen ſo, too ſeuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples minds in all things, is not good: as alſo it is maruellous dangerous not to correct offenders when they offend, for feare of the peoples diſpleaſure. But the meane, ſometime to yeeld vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleaſure, to demand of them againe things profitable, that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to do many profitable things, when they ſeeke it not of them by rigor and authority. Indeed this meane is very hard to be obſerued, becauſe authoritie is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meet together, there is no harmony more muſical, nor concordance more perfect then that: & therfore it is ſaid that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of ſeuerenes was in Cato the yonger, for he could not faſhion himſelfe to the peoples maners, nor did they like his: neither did he win his eſtimation in the cõmonwealth by flattering of them: and therfore Cicero ſaid, that he was put by the Conſulſhip, for that he behaued himſelf as though he liued in the cõmonwealth deuiſed by Plato, and not amongſt the diſordered and corrupt poſterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely fruit: the which though men do take pleaſure to ſee and wonder at, yet they eat them not. Euen ſo, the ancienteſt ſimplicity of Catoes maner (hauing ſo long time bin out of vſe, and coming then to ſhew it ſelf in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was indeed much praiſe worthy: but yet not the conuenienteſt, nor the fitteſt for him, becauſe it anſwered nor reſpected not the vſe and maners of the time. For he found not his country (as Phocion did) vtterly deſtroyed, but toſſed in a dangerous tempeſt: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the ſterne in hand, and gouern the ſhip, he took himſelf to tricking the ſailes, & preparing the tackle, ſo to aſſiſt men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he ſo thwarted fortune (which ſeemed to haue ſworn the ouerthrow of the ſtate of ROME) that with much ado, with great difficulty, & a long time after, ſhe executed her malice. And yet the commonwealth had almoſt gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato and his vertue: with whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honeſty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades and that of Epaminondas: betwixt wiſdome and wiſdome, as betwixt that of Ariſtides, and that of Themiſtocles: and betwixt iuſtice and iuſtice, as betwixt that of Numa, and that of Ageſilaus. But the vertues of theſe men (to him that ſhall ſuperficially regard, and lightly conſider them) ſeeme all one in quality, in maner, and vſe, both alike in temperance of curteſie with ſeuerity, and manhood with wiſdome: a valiant care for other, with preſence of courage and ſecurity of mind for themſelues, abhorring all filthines and corruption, and imbracing conſtancy and loue of iuſtice: that for any man to diſcerne the difference between them, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble houſe, as we will ſhew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I geſſe he came of no baſe parentage. For if he had bin the ſon of a ſpoonmaker, as Idomeneus teſtifieth, Glaucippus the ſon of Hyperides, hauing in an inuectiue he wrote againſt him, rehearſed all the miſchiefes he could of him, he would not haue forgotten to haue vpbraided him with his baſe parentage; neither he himſelf alſo (if that had bin true) had bene ſo well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a yong man, he was Platoes ſcholer, and afterwards Xenocrates ſcholer, in the ſchoole of Academia: and ſo, euen from his firſt beginning, he gaue himſelfe to follow them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer ATHENIAN ſaw him weepe nor laugh, nor waſh himſelfe in any common bath, nor his hands out of his ſleeues when he wore a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwayes go on foot, and neuer wore gowne, vnleſſe it were extreme cold: and then the ſouldiers to mocke him withall, would ſay it was a ſigne of a ſharpe winter, when they ſaw Phocion in his gowne. Now though indeed he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yet he had ſuch a grimme looke withall, that no man had any deſire to talke with him, but ſuch as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator, one day mocking him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My maiſters, quoth Phocion, the bending of my browes hath done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of theſe flatterers haue made ye oftentimes weepe. Furthermore, his manner of ſpeech was very profitable, for the good ſentences and counſels he vttered; but it was mixed with an imperious, auſtere, and bitter ſhortneſſe. For as Zeno the Philoſopher ſaith, that the wiſe man ſhould temper his words with wit and reaſon, before he vtter them: euen ſo was Phocions ſpeech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it ſeemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN ſaid, that Demoſthenes was an excellent Orator, but in ſpeech Phocion was very wittie. For like as coines of gold or ſiluer, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of goodnes: euen ſo the excellencie of ſpeech conſiſteth in ſignifying much by few words. And touching this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon the ſcaffold where the players played, and was in a great muſe with himſelfe: whereupon, one of his friends ſeeing him ſo in his muſes, ſaid vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy mind is occupied about ſomewhat. Indeed it is ſo, ſaid he: for I am thinking with my ſelfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to ſay to the people. For Demoſthenes ſelfe little eſteeming all other Orators, when Phocion roſe vp to ſpeake, he would round his friends in the eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my words riſeth. Peraduenture he meant it by his manners alſo. For when a good man ſpeaketh, not a word onely, but a wink of the eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words and ſpeeches of Rhetoritians. Furthermore, when he was a yong man, he went to the warres vnder Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfect ſouldier, and in recompence therof, he reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, & made him wiſer then he was. For Chabrias otherwiſe being very dull and ſlothfull of himſelfe, when he came to fight, he was ſo hote and couragious, that he would thruſt himſelfe into danger with the deſperateſt perſons: and therefore for his raſhneſſe it afterwards coſt him his life in the citie of CHIO, where launching out with his galley before the reſt, he preſſed to land in deſpite of his enemies. But Phocion being wiſe to looke to himſelfe, and very quick to execute: on the one ſide quickned Chabrias ſlowneſſe, and on the other ſide alſo, by wiſedome cooled his heate and fury. Chabrias therfore, being a good man and courteous, loued Phocion very well, and did prefer him in matters of ſeruice, making him famous amongſt the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardeſt enterpriſes. For by his meanes he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by ſea, which he wanne by the Ile of NAXOS, giuing him the left wing of his armie, on which ſide the fight was ſharpeſt of all the battell, and there he ſooneſt put the enemies to flight. This battell being the firſt which the citie of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken, gaue the people cauſe to loue Chabrias, and made them alſo make account of Phocion as of a noble ſouldier, and worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feaſt day of the great myſteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yearely in the ſixteenth day of the moneth Bœdromion (now called Auguſt) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time Chabrias ſending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders their confederates, and the ſhips which they ſhould ſend him, he gaue him twenty gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) ſayd vnto him: If he ſent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to haue more ſhips: but if he ſent him as an Ambaſſador vnto his friends, then that one ſhip would ſerue his turne. So he went with one galley onely; and after he had ſpoken with the cities, and courteouſly dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furniſhed of their confederates, with a great fleete of ſhips and money, to carry vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not only reuerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death alſo he tooke great care of his friends and kinſmen, and ſought to make his ſonne Cteſippus an honeſt man, whom though he ſaw very wild and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is ſaid alſo, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous queſtions, ſeruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counſell, to reproue him, and to teach him the duty of a Captaine, he could not but ſay: O Chabrias, Chabrias, now do I pay for the loue thou diddeſt beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy ſonne. But when he ſaw that the heads of the citie of ATHENS had (as it were) by lot diuided among themſelues the offices of warre and peace; and that ſome of them, as Ebulus, Ariſtophon, Demoſthenes, Lycurgus and Hyperides were common ſpeakers and preferrers of matters in councels and Senate: and that others, as Diophites, Meneſtheus, Leoſthenes and Chares became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies; he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment of Pericles, Ariſtides and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them ſeemed (as the Poet Archilocus ſaith,)

To be both champions ſtout, of Marſes warlike band,
And of the Muſes eke, the arts to vnderſtand.

He knew alſo that Pallas the goddeſſe and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica, to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus diſpoſed of himſelfe in gouernment, he alwayes perſwaded peace and quietneſſe, and yet was often choſen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did neuer ſue for charge, neither yet refuſed it at any time, when he was called to ſerue the commonwealth. It is certaine that he was choſen fiue and forty times Prætor, and was alwaies abſent at the elections, but yet ſent for. Whereupon all the wiſemen wondered to ſee the maner of the people towards him, conſidering that Phocion had neuer done nor ſaid any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had beene againſt their deſires: and how they vſed other gouernours notwithſtanding, that were more pleaſant and delightfull in their orations, like men to ſport at; as it is ſaid of kings, who after they haue waſhed their hands to go to their meate, do vſe to haue ieſters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other ſide, when they had occaſion of wars indeed, how then like wiſe men they would bethinke themſelues, and chuſe the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt man of the citie, and that moſt would withſtand their mindes and deſires. For on a time an Oracle of Apollo Delphias, being openly read before them, which ſaid, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the reſt of the city; Phocion ſtepping foorth before them all, bad them neuer ſeeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chanced to ſay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praiſed and approued: but when he ſaw they were ſo ſuddenly become of his mind, he turned back to his friends, and asked them: alas, hath not ſome euill thing ſlipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towards the ſolemnizing of a ſacrifice; other men of his ſtate hauing payed their part, he was often alſo called vpon to pay his: but he anſwered them againe, Aske them that be rich, for it were a ſhame for me to giue you any thing; being yet in this mans debt, pointing to Callicles the vſurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to crie out vpon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: That on a time there was a coward preparing to go to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill ſigne, he put off his harneſſe, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harneſſe againe, and went on his way toward the campe, the rauens began againe to make a goodlier crie behind him: but thereupon he ſtayed ſtraight, and at length ſaid: Ye ſhall crooke as loud as ye liſt, before ye feed on my carcaſſe. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needs haue him to leade them to giue charge vpon their enemies, but he would not. Thereupon they called him coward, and ſaid, he durſt not. Well ſaid he againe, It is not you can make me valiant, no more then my ſelfe can make you cowards; and yet one of vs know another. Another time in a maruelous dangerous time, the people handled him very churliſhly, and would needs haue him preſently deliuer account of his charge: but he anſwered them, O my friends, firſt ſaue your ſelues. Furthermore, the people being very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres; and preſently in peace againe waxing braue in words againſt Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victory out of their hands, he onely ſaid this to them: You are happie that haue a Captaine that knowes you, elſe you would ſing a new ſong. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOECTIANS and them, about their bounds and frontiers, the which they would not trie by law, but by battell: But Phocion told them, they did they wiſt not what, and counſelled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ſtronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they ſo much miſliked his opinion in the aſſembly, that they would not abide to heare him, nor ſuffer him to ſpeake. Well, my Maiſters, quoth he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you ſhall neuer compell me againſt my mind,to ſay that which is not to be ſpoken. He would as gallantly alſo gird the Orators his aduerſaries, when they were buſſe with him. As on a time he anſwered Demoſthenes, that ſayd vnto him: The people, Phocion,will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads: Yea thee,quoth he,if they be wiſe.Againe,when Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN, in a hot day perſwaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with king Philip, ſweating, and with much ado fetching his breath, being a fat man, that he was driuen oftentimes to drinke water,to end his oration:Surely ſaid Phocion,ye ſhall do maruellous wiſely, to make warre at ſuch a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he do, when he hath his curates and his target vpon him,and that the enemies be ready to fight:that now in making an oration onely before you,which he hath ſtudied long before, is almoſt ſtifled? Another time alſo when Lycurgus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the reſt,for that Alexander demanding ten citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counſelled them to deliuer them: Phocion anſwered him, I haue oftentimes counſelled them for the beſt, but they would neuer follow my counſell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a maruellous long beard, a beggarly cloake, and a ſower looke. Phocion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witneſſe,to confirme that he ſpake.But he riſing vp, counſelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and ſaid vnto him: Alas Archibiades, why diddeſt thou not then clip thy beard,ſeeing thou wouldeſt needs flatter? There was another great pleader, one Ariſtogiton, that in all the aſſemblies of the Citie, did nothing but buzze warres continually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and muſtered, and their names entred that ſhould go to the warres, Ariſtogiton came halting into the market place with a ſtaffe in his hand, and both his legs bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was ſicke and diſeaſed. Phocion ſpying Ariſtogiton farre off,cried out to the clearke that wrote the bils: Put in Ariſtogiton,lame,and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muſe, how,or wherefore ſo ſharpe and ſeuere a man (as by theſe examples it appeareth he was) could come to the ſurname of good. Notwithſtanding, in the end I find it a hard thing, but not impoſſible, that a man ſhould be like wine,both ſweete and ſharpe together:as there are others to the contrary,that at the firſt ſight,ſeeme very courteous and gentle of conuerſation, and vpon better acquaintance, proue churliſh & dogged. It is reported alſo,that Hyperides the Orator one day ſhould ſay to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my ſharpneſſe, but conſider if my ſharpneſſe be without profit. As who ſhould ſay, men are not troubleſome, but for couetouſneſſe onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of inſolencie and malice, did abuſe and contemne their authority. Phocion on the other ſide,neuer did citizen hurt,for any priuate malice he bare him: but was euer ſharpe and cruell to them which were againſt any matter he preferred for the benefit of the commonwealth.For in all other things,he ſhewed himſelfe maruellous lowly and courteous to euery body, and would be familiar with his aduerſaries,and helpe them if they wanted,or were otherwiſe in danger of diſpleaſure with the ſtate. Inſomuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he ſpake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O ſaid he, honeſt men need no helpe. Another time, Ariſtogiton the Sycophant, being clapped vp in priſon, ſent vnto Phocion to pray him to come and ſpeake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the priſon to him,and when his friends perſwaded him to the contrary,he anſwered them: O let me alone,ſayd he,for where could I ſee Ariſtogiton more gladly then in priſon? Furthermore,when there went any army to ſea out of ATHENS,if there were any other choſen Generall but Phocion, the townes and Ilands all alongſt the ſea coaſt (which were friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified their wals,filled vp their hauens,and brought their wiues,ſlaues,and cattell,and all their goods into their townes and cities,as if they had bene enemies,and open war proclaimed.Contrarily alſo, if Phocion had bin Captaine and Generall,they would ſend out their ſhips to the ſea to meete him afarre off, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy,and ſo would bring him to their cities. King Philip ſecretly ſeeking to win the Ile of EVBŒA, ſent an army thither out of MACEDON, and entiſed the townes by tyrants to rebell: whereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN prayed aide of the ATHENIANS, to take this Iland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not preſently to aide them. So Phocion was ſent Generall thither, but with a few men onely, becauſe they made account account the men of that countrey would straight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebels, and bribed with king Philips money, which he lauished out amongst them: so that he was brought into great danger. Thereupon he retired to a litle hill seuered from the plaine of TAMINES with a great large valley, and there fortified himselfe with that litle army he had. Then he perswaded his Captaines not to care for all those rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forsooke their ensignes and Captaines, but that they should let them go out of the campe where they would. For, said he, such disobedient souldiers here will do vs no seruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to serue well: and at home also, knowing themselues in fault, for that they forsooke the campe without licence, they dare not complaine vpon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to set vpon him, he commanded his men to arme, and put themselues in readinesse, and not to stirre vntill he had done sacrifice: but he stayed long before he came, either because he could haue no lucky signes of the sacrifices, or else for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to march for feare, went himselfe first into the field, with certaine light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes seeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, straggling out of the campe one after another disorderly, and so did set vpon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowne, all the other dispersed themselues, and Plutarke himselfe fled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion hauing ended his sacrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their campe, and set vpon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them also they slue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell should stand stil, to receiue their men that were scattered vp & downe the fields: in the meane space he himselfe, with the choisest men of his army, gaue charge vpon the enemies. The fight was cruell betweene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their Generall (Glaucus the sonne of Polymedes, and Thallus the sonne of Cineas) carried the praise away. And so did Cleophanes that day also shew himselfe very valiant. For he crying out still vpon the horsemen that fled, and perswading them to come and helpe their Generall that was in danger, brought them backe againe, and thereby got the footmen the victorie. After this battell, he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a straightnesse, enuironed on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his men to take any GRECIANS prisoners, fearing lest the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people, suddenly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these things were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederates of the ATHENIANS straight wish for his iustice and courtesie: and the ATHENIANS themselues also knew his skilfulnesse and manhood. For his successor Molossus, that was Generall for the rest of the warre, dealt so vndiscreetly, that he himselfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip being put in maruellous great hope, went with all his army into HELLESPONT, perswading himselfe, that he should straight take all CHERRONESVS, the Cities of PERINTH and BIZANTIVM. The ATHENIANS thereupon determining to send aide, to preuent king Philips comming, the Orators made great sute, that Chares might be chosen Captaine: but he being sent thither with a good number of ships, did no seruice worthie commendation, neither would the Cities receiue his nauie into their hauens: but being suspected of euery man, and despised of his enemies, he was driuen to saile vp and downe, and to get money of the allies. The people being incensed by the Orators, were maruellously offended, and repented themselues that they had sent aide vnto the BIZANTINES. Then Phocion rising vp, spake vnto the people, and told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their confederates, they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captaines that deserued to be mistrusted. For they, said he, do make your confederates afraid of you, who without you notwithstanding cannot saue themselues. The people changing their minds by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and sent him with an army into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederates there, which was of great importance to saue the City of BIZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was so great, that Cleon, the greatest man of vertue and authority in BIZANTIVM, hauing before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy, made sute for him vnto the City. Then the BIZANTINES would not suffer him him (though he desired it) to campe without the wals of their city, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongst them. Who, perceiuing how much the citizens trusted them, did so honestly behaue themselues in their conuersation amongst them, that they gaue them no manner of cause to complaine of them: and shewed themselues so valiant besides in all battels and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man being afraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great discredite: where Phocion wanne some of his ships, and recouered againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Furthermore, making diuerse inuasions into his countries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was sore hurt there, and so driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great army that came against him to defend the countrey. Shortly after, the MEGARIANS secretly sent vnto him, to deliuer their city into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS vnderstood it, that they would preuent him, he called a common assembly early in the morning, and told the people what message the MEGARIANS had sent vnto him. The people vpon this motion being determined to aide them, Phocion straight sounding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the assembly, gaue them no further leisure, but to take their weapons; and so led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiuing him, Phocion shut vp the hauen of NISÆA, and brought two long wals from the city vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: whereby he stood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land; and for the sea, the ATHENIANS were Lords of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open warre against king Philip, and had chosen other Captaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the Iles, aboue all things, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the danger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of these busie Orators that was still accusing one or other, said vnto him: Why Phocion, how darest thou attempt to turne the ATHENIANS from warre, hauing now their swords in their hands? Yes truly, said Phocion: though in warre I know I shall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not hearken to him, and that Demosthenes caried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee friend, quoth Phocion vnto him, let vs not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall ouercome; the which if we can so bring to passe, be sure we shall put the warre farre inough from vs: for men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and danger, whersoeuer they be. When the ATHENIANS had lost a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators, that hunted after innouation, preferred Charidemus to be chosen Generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the Magistrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITS, they made such earnest suite to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much ado) they obtained, that the affaires of the city might be put into Phocions hands and gouernment. He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moued, that the city of ATHENS would enter into the common treatie of peace, and common assembly of the states of GREECE, procured at king Philips request, Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might vnderstand what demands Philip would make at the assembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruersnesse of time could not be liked of them, and that he saw the ATHENIANS soone after repented them that they did not follow his counsell, when they heard they should furnish king Philip with ships and horsemen: then he told them; the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withstand that, which now ye haue consented vnto. But sithence it is so that you haue now past your consents, you umst be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembring that your ancestors in times past haue sometime commanded, and otherwhile obeyed others; and yet haue so wisely and discreetly gouerned themselues in both fortunes, that they haue not onely saued their city, but all GREECE besides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would straight haue made bonfires and sacrifices to the gods for the good newes: but Phocion would not suffer them, and said, that it was a token of a base mind, to reioyce at any mans death; and besides that, the army which ouerthrew you at CHÆRONEA, hath not yet lost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speake ill of Alexander, and specially when he was neare THEBES with his army, Phocion rehearsed vnto him these verses of Homer:

Phocion drawe Philip out of Hellespont.

Phocion ioyned Megara vnto Athens.

To reioyce at any mans hurt sheweth a base mind, and vile nature

How great a folly is it for to ſtand
Againſt a cruell king,
Which being arm'd, and hauing ſword in hand,
Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is ſuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou caſt the city into it? For my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not ſuffer them to caſt themſelues away: for to that end haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernement. And afterwards alſo, when Alexander had razed the citie of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus; and that the whole aſſembly and councell not knowing what anſwer to make, did all caſt their eyes vpon Phocion, and cried vnto him to ſay his opinion: he then roſe vp, and taking one of his friends vnto him called Nicocles, whom he loued and truſted aboue all men elſe, he ſaid thus openly vnto them: Theſe men whom Alexander requireth, haue brought this citie to this extremitie, that if he required Nicocles here, I would giue my conſent to deliuer him: for I would thinke my ſelfe happy to loſe my life, for all your ſafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartily ſorry (ſaid he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come vnto the citie for ſuccour: yet I aſſure you, it is better one citie mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is beſt to intreate the conquerour for both, rather then to our certaine deſtruction to fight with him that is the ſtronger. It is ſaid alſo that Alexander refuſed the firſt decree which the people offered him vpon Phocions requeſt, and ſent away the Ambaſſadours, and would not ſpeake with them. But the ſecond which Phocion himſelfe brought, he tooke, being told by his fathers old ſeruants, that king Philip made great accompt of him: whereupon Alexander did not onely giue him audience, and grant his requeſt, but further followed his counſell. For Phocion perſwaded him, if he loued quietneſſe, to leaue warre: if he deſired fame, then that he ſhould make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humour with ſuch talke and diſcourſe as he thought would like him beſt, he ſo altered and ſoftned Alexanders diſpoſition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS ſhould looke to their affaires, for if he ſhould die, he knew no people fitter to command then they. Furthermore, becauſe he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend, he made ſo much of him, that he more honoured him then all the reſt of his friends. To this effect, Duris the hiſtoriographer writeth, that when Alexander was growne very great, and had ouercome king Darius, he left out of his letters this word Chærin (to wit, ioy and health) which he vſed commonly in all the letters he wrote; & would no more honor any other with that maner of ſalutation, but Phocion and Antipater. Chares alſo writeth the ſame. And they all do confeſſe, that Alexander ſent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundred ſiluer talents. This mony being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him ſuch a great reward, aboue all the other citizens of ATHENS. Becauſe ſaid they, he onely eſteemed thee to be a good and honeſt man. Phocion replied againe, then let him giue me leaue to be that I ſeeme, and am whileſt I liue. The meſſengers wold not ſo leaue him, but folowed him home to his houſe, where they ſaw his great husbandry and thriftineſſe. For they found his wife her ſelf baking, and he himſelf drew water before them, out of the well to waſh his feete. But then they were more earneſtly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings preſent, and were offended with him, ſaying, it was a ſhame for Alexanders friend to liue ſo miſerably and beggarly, as he did. Then Phocion ſeeing a poore old man go by, in a thread bare gowne, asked them whether they thought him worſe then he? No, God forbid, anſwered they againe. Then replied he again, he liues with leſſe then I do, and yet is contented, and hath inough. To be ſhort, ſaid he, if I ſhould take this ſumme of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other ſide, if I occupy it, I ſhall make all the city ſpeake ill of the king and me both. So this great preſent was ſent back from ATHENS: whereby he ſhewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not ſuch gold and ſiluer, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote againe to Phocion, that he did not reckon them for his friends, that would take nothing of him, Phocion notwithſtanding would not take the mony, but only requeſted him for his ſake, that he would ſet theſe men at liberty which were kept priſoners in the city of SARDIS for certaine accuſations layed againſt them: Echecratides the Rhetoritian, Athenodorus borne in the city of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander preſently ſet them at liberty, & ſent Craterus into MACEDON, commanding commanding him to giue Phocion the choise of one of these foure cities of Asia which he liked best: Cios, Gergitha, Mylassis, Elea: sending him word, that he would be much more angrie with him now, if he did refuse his offer, than he was at the first. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is seene yet at this day in the village of Milita, set forth with plates of copper, but otherwise very meane, and without curiositie. For the wiues he maried, there is no mention made of the first, sauing that Cephisodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife she was no lesse famous at Athens, for her honesty and good huswifery, then Phocion for his iustice and equity. And for proofe therof, it is reported that the Athenians being one day assembled in the Theater, to see new tragedies played, one of the players when he should haue come vpon the scaffold to haue played his part, asked the setter forth of the playes the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite vpon her, because he was to play the part of a Queene. The setter forth of the playes denying him, the player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cried out vnto him: Doest not thou see Phocions wife that goeth vp and downe the citie with one maide onely waiting vpon her? and wilt thou play the foole & marre the modestie of the women of Athens? The people hearing his words, filled all the Theater with ioy and clapping of hands. The same Lady, when a certaine Gentlewoman of Ionia came at Athens to see her, and shewed her all the rich iewels and precious stones she had, she answered her againe: All my riches and iewels, is my husband Phocion, who these twentie yeares together hath continually bin chosen Generall for the Athenians. Phocions sonne telling his father on a time, that he was desirous to contend with other young men for the victory, who should cunninglieſt leape our, and get vp againe into the chariots or coaches, running full course at the feasts Panathenæa at Athens: his father was contented he should; not that he was desirous his sonne should haue the honour of the victory, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better maners, for that he was a dissolute yong man, and much giuen to wine. Yet he wan the victory at that time, and there were diuerse of his fathers friends, that prayed him to do them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victory in their houses. Phocion denied them all but one man, and him he suffered to shew his good will vnto his house, and went thither himselfe to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweete smelling spices to wash the feete of the bidden guests as they came to the feast. Whereupon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phocus, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victory with excesse? But because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to Sparta, and placed him there among yong boyes brought vp after the Laconian discipline. The Athenians were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne countrey manners and fashions. Also when Demades the Orator one day said vnto Phocion: Why do we not perswade the Athenians to liue after the Laconian maner? As for me, said he, if thou wilt make one to set it forward, I am ready to be ỳ first man to moue the matter. Indeed quoth Phocion, thou art a meete man to perswade the Athenians to liue Laconian like in common together at their meales, and to praise Lycurgus straight law, that art thy selfe commonly so perfumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another time when Alexander wrote letters vnto Athens to send him some ships, and the Orators perswaded them not to grant him, the people called vpõ Phocion chiefly to say his opinion: then Phocion told them plainly, me thinks ye must either make your selues the strongest in wars, or being the weaker, procure to be friends vnto the stronger. Pithias a new come Orator, being full of tongue, & impudent, would still make one to speake in euery matter: wherefore Phocion said to him, Good gods, will this nouice neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenant of the prouince of Babylon, fled out of Asia, and came to Attica with a great summe of gold and siluer, straight these men that sold their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a sight of swallowes. And he stuck not to giue euery one of them a peece of mony to baste them with: for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion himselfe, he sent seuen hundred talents, and offered himselfe and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe answer, and told him that he would make him repent it, if he corrupted the city of Athens in that manner. So Harpalus being amazed therewith, left him at that time, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But ſhortly after, when the ATHENIANS ſate in councell about him, he perceiued that thoſe which had taken his money were ſhrunke from him, and that they did accuſe him, where they ſhould haue excuſed him, to bleare the world, that men ſhould not ſuſpect them they had bin corrupted: and that Phocion on the other ſide which had refuſed his mony, hauing reſpect to the cõmonwealth, had alſo ſome regard to ſaue his life: he once more attempted all the waies he could to win him. Howbeit he found him ſo conſtant, that no money could cary the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendſhip with Chariles (Phocions ſonne in law) he made him to be ill ſpoken of, and greatly ſuſpected, becauſe men ſaw that he truſted him in all things, and imployed him in all his affaires: as in committing to his truſt the making of a ſumptuous tombe for Pythonicé, the famous courtiſan that was dead, whom he loued, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking vpon him wherof was no leſſe ſhame vnto Chariles, then the finiſhing therof was diſgrace vnto him. This tombe is ſeene vnto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workmanſhip thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Chariles, for the finiſhing of the ſame. Furthermore, after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her vp. Afterwards alſo, Chariles being accuſed for the mony he had taken of Harpalus, he beſought his father in law Phocion, to helpe to eaſe him in his iudgement. But Phocion flatly denied him, and ſaid: Chariles I took thee for my ſonne in law, in all honeſt and iuſt cauſes onely. Furthermore, when Aſclepiades the ſon of Hipparchus, brought the firſt newes of the death of king Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleeue him: for ſaid he, if it were true, all the earth would ſmell of the ſauor of his corſe. Phocion then perceiuing the people began to be high minded, and ſought innouation, he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got vp to the pulpit for Orations, and cried out, that Aſclepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it ſhall be true alſo to morow, and the next day after. And therefore my maſters, be not too haſtie, but thinke of it at better leiſure, and ſet your affaires at a ſure ſtay. When Leoſthenes alſo by his practiſe had brought the city of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES war, and in ſcorne asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done vnto the commonwealth ſo many yeares together, as he had bin General ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion anſwered him, No ſmall good ſaid he, for all my country men haue bene buried at hõme in their owne graues. Another time alſo, Leoſthenes ſpeaking proudly & inſolently vnto the people, Phocion one day had ſaid vnto him: Yong man my friend, thy words are like vnto the Cypreſſe tree, which is high and great, but beareth no fruite. Then Hyperides riſing vp, asked Phocion: When wilt thou then counſell the ATHENIANS to make warre? When I ſhall ſee yong men, ſaid he, not to forſake their rankes, rich men liberall, and Orators leaue to rob the common-wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to ſee ſuch a goodly great armie as Leoſthenes had leauied, and that they asked Phocion how he liked it: It is a goodly armie, quoth he for a furlong, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I do not ſee the citie able to make any more money, nor more ſhips, neither yet any more ſouldiers than theſe. The which proued true: as it fell out afterwards: for at the firſt, Leoſthenes did many notable exploits. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in ſuch a hope and iolitie, that they made continuall feaſts and ſacrifices through the citie, to thanke the gods for theſe good newes. And there were ſome among them, that to take Phocion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wiſh that he had done all thoſe things? Yes indeede, anſwered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counſell to haue done them. Another time alſo when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, Good gods, ſaid he, when ſhall we leaue of to ouercome? But when Leoſthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion ſhould be appointed Captaine in his place, and that he would pacifie the warre, did thruſt in a man of meane behauiour, and vnknowne, that ſaid in full aſſembly of counſell, that he was Phocions friend, and ſchoole-fellow, and therefore beſought the people that they would ſpare Phocion, becauſe they had not ſuch another man as he, and that they would make Antiphilus Generall of the armie. The people were well contented with all. But then Phocion ſtood vp, and ſaid, that this man was neuer ſcholer with him, neither did he euer know him before that time: but now ſaid he, from henceforth I will take take thee for my friend, for thou haſt giuen the people the beſt counſell for me. The people notwithſtanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion ſpake againſt it all he could. Thereupon his friends bidding him beware of ſuch ſpeeches, how he did offend the people, leſt they killed him, he anſwered them: They ſhall wrongfully put me to death, quoth he, ſpeaking for the benefit of my countrey, but otherwiſe they ſhall haue reaſon for to do it, if I ſpeake to the contrary. But when he ſaw nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on ſtill with their intent, then he commanded the Herauld to proclaime by ſound of trumpet, that all citizens from foureteene yeares vnto threeſcore, able to carie weapon, ſhould preſently vpon the breaking vp of the aſſembly, arme themſelues, and follow him with fiue dayes prouiſion for victuals; then was there great ſtirre amongſt them in the citie, and the old men came and complained vnto him, for his ouer ſtraight commandement. He told them againe, I do you no wrong: for I am foureſcore my ſelfe, and yet will go with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fond deſire of warre. But when all the ſea coaſt was full of ſouldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other ſtrangers which were led by Micion their captaine, that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNVS, and ſpoiled the countrey thereabouts, then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuers taking vpon them the office of a Lieutenant, and going about to counſell him, ſome to lodge his campe vpon ſuch a hill, and others to ſend his horſemen to ſuch a place, and others to camp here: O Hercules quoth he, how many Captaines do I ſee, and how few ſouldiers! Afterwards when he had ſet his footmen in battell ray, there was one among them that left his ranke, and ſtepped out before thē all. Thereupon one of his enemies alſo made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS heart failed, and he went backe againe to his place. Then ſaid Phocion vnto him: Art thou not aſhamed yong lout to haue forſaken thy ranke twiſe? the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddeſt placed thy ſelf? So Phocion giuing charge vpon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and ſlue Micion their Captaine, and diuers others. Furthermore, the army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wan the battel of Antipater, & Leonatus that ioyned with him, with ỹ MACEDONIANS, which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was ſlaine in the field, Antiphilus being Generall of the footmen, and Menon THESSALIAN Colonell of the horſemen. Shortly after Craterus coming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great armie, they fought a battell by the city of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were ouerthrowne: yet was not the ouerthrow nor ſlaughter great, although it came through the diſobedience of the ſouldiers to their Captaines, which were but yong men, & vſed them ouer gently. Moreouer, when Antipater practiſed to make the cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and ſhamefully forſooke to defend their common liberty: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his armie, to the city of ATHENS. Demoſthenes and Hyperides vnderſtanding that, forſooke the citie. Then Demades, that was in diſgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of ſuch fines as were ſet vpon his head (being ſeuen ſeuerall times condemned, becauſe he had ſo many times moued matters contrary to the law,) and could not therefore be ſuffered any more to ſpeake in ỹ aſſembly, was then diſpenced withall, and licenſed to ſpeake: whereupon he moued the people to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Antipater, with full commiſſion and authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans truſt this abſolute authority to treate of peace, they called for Phocion, ſaying, that he onely was to be truſted with the Ambaſſade. Then Phocion anſwered them: if you had beleeued my former counſels I alwaies gaue you, ſuch weightie matters ſhould not now haue troubled you at all. So the decree being cōfirmed by the people, Phocion was ſent Ambaſſador vnto Antipater, that lay at the caſtell of Cadmea, being readie at that time to inuade the country of ATTICA. Phocion firſt requeſted him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus preſently anſwered him: Phocion thy requeſt is vnreaſonable, that lying here we ſhould eate out our friends, and deſtroy their country, when we may liue of our enemies, and inrich our ſelues with their ſpoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we muſt needs do Phocion this pleaſure. And for the reſt, touching the capitularions of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS ſhold ſend them a blanke & refer the conditions of peace to them: like as himſelf being beſieged in the city LAMIA, had referred al capitulations & articles of peace, vnto the diſcretion of Leoſthenes their Generall. So when Phocion was come back to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS ſeeing there was no remedy, were cōpelled to be cōtented with ſuch offer of peace, as the enemy made them. Then Phocion was ſent back again to Phocion Ambaſſador vnto Antipater.

Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambaſſadors ioyned in commiſſion with him: amongſt whom alſo was that famous Philoſopher, Xenocrates. The eſtimation of his vertue was ſo great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man ſo proud, cruel, diſdainful, nor haſty of nature, but that the only looke of Xenocrates would ſoften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrarie, by his peruerſe nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the reſt, and would not once ſalute Xenocrates. Whereupon ſome ſay, that Xenocrates ſaid then, Antipater doth well to be aſhamed, to ſee me a witneſſe of the diſcourteſie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates began to ſpeake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end commanded him to hold his peace. When Phocion had ſpoken, Antipater anſwered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, ſo they deliuered him Demoſthenes and Hyperides: that they ſhould keepe their ancient lawes and gouernment, that they ſhould receiue a garriſon into the hauen of Munychia, that they ſhould defray the charges of this warre, and alſo pay a ranſome beſides. All the other Ambaſſadours but Xenocrates, willingly accepted theſe conditions of peace, as very reaſonable and fauorable: but he ſaid, that for ſlaues Antipater did handle them fauourably, but for free men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion beſought him that he would yet releaſe them of their garriſon. But Antipater (as it is ſaid) anſwered him: Phocion, we would gladly grant thee any thing, ſauing that which ſhould vndo thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithſtanding, that Antipater ſaid not ſo, but asked him if he would become ſuretie for the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did releaſe them of this garriſon. Phocion then holding his peace, and delaying anſwer, there was one Callimedon ſirnamed Carobos (a bold man, and hated the liberty of the people) that brake forth in theſe words: If Phocion were ſo fond to giue his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldeſt thou Antipater beleeue him therefore, and leaue to do that thou haſt determined: Thus were the ATHENIANS driuen to receiue the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS, of the which Menyllus was Captaine, an honeſt man, and Phocions friend. This commandement to receiue the garriſon within the hauen of Munychia, was found verie ſtately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glory to boaſt of his power, then for any profit could otherwiſe come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke poſſeſſion of the caſtell, he further increaſed their griefe: becauſe the garriſon entred the twentieth day of Bœdromion (to wit, the moneth of Auguſt) on the which the feaſt day of their myſteries was celebrated, at what time they make their proceſſion called Iacchus, from the citie of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therefore the ſolemnitie of this holy feaſt being thus confuſed, many began to conſider, that in old time when their Realme did flouriſh, there were heard and ſeene voices and images of the gods on that day, which made the enemies both afraid and amazed: and now in contrary manner in the very ſelfe ſame ſolemnity of the gods, they ſaw the greateſt calamitie that could haue happened vnto GREECE. And the holieſt feaſt which was kept all the yeare through before, became then to be prophaned with the title of the greateſt misfortune and euent that euer happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the loſſe of their liberty. For, not many yeares before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE vnto ATHENS: that they ſhould looke well to the rockes of Diana, that ſtrangers ſhould not poſſeſſe them. And about that time alſo the couerings with the which they do adorne the holy beds of the myſteries, being wet with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yellow and pale, as if it had bene the couering of a dead body. Yea, and that which was moſt to be wondered at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the ſame water, they did without changing keepe their colour they had before. When one of the miniſters of the temple alſo did waſh a white pigge in the ſea in a cleare place by the wharfe, there ſuddenly came a great fiſh that bit at it, and caried the hinder parts of the pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured that the gods did ſignifie vnto them, that they ſhould loſe the loweſt part of their citie, neareſt vnto the ſea, and ſhould keepe the higheſt parts thereof. This notwithſtanding, the garriſon did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, becauſe of the honeſtie of their Captaine Menyllus. Now there were aboue twelue thouſand citizens, that for their pouerty loſt the benefite of their freedome, of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, vnto whom it ſeemed that they offered great wrong and iniurie: and part of them alſo went into THRACIA, where Antipater aſſigned them townes townes and lands to inhabite. They ſeemed to be men like vnto them, that had bene taken by aſſault, or by ſiege within a citie, which had bene compelled to forſake their countrey. Furthermore, the ſhamefull death of Demoſthenes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, and of Hyperides by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we haue written heretofore) were almoſt occaſion giuen them to lament the times of the reigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was ſlaine, they that had ouercome him, were ſo cruell vnto their ſubiects, that a labourer in the countrey of PHRYGIA digging the earth, being asked what he ſought for, anſwered ſighing: I ſeeke for Antigonus. Then many men began to ſay as much, when they remembred the noble mindes of thoſe two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their diſpleaſure: not like vnto Antipater, who craftily cloaked his tyrannicall power, which he vſurped, by being familiar, going ſimply apparelled, and faring meanly, and yet ſhewed himſelfe notwithſtanding a more cruell Lord and tyrant vnto them whom he had ouercome. Neuertheleſſe, Phocion obtained of him the reſtoring againe of diuers men, whom he had baniſhed: and thoſe whom he could not get to be reſtored, yet he procured that they ſhould not be baniſhed into ſo far countries, as others which had bene ſent beyond the mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tænarus out of GREECE, but that they had libertie to remaine within the countrey of PELOPONNESVS: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and falſe accuſer. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remained in ATHENS with great iuſtice and lenitie, and ſuch as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to ſome office: but ſuch as he ſaw were phantaſticall people, and deſirous of change, he kept them from office, and tooke all occaſion from them, ſo that they vaniſhed away of themſelues, and learned in time to loue the countrey, and to follow tillage. When he ſaw Xenocrates alſo pay a certaine penſion or tribute to the common-wealth, which all ſtrangers dwelling in ATHENS did vſe yearely to pay, he would haue made him a freeman, and offered to put his name amongſt the number of the free citizens. But Xenocrates refuſed it, ſaying, he would haue no part of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof he had bene ſent Ambaſſadour. And when Menyllus had ſent Phocion money, he made him anſwer, that Menyllus was no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occaſion to receiue his preſent, then when he had refuſed king Alexanders gift. Menyllus replying againe, ſaid, that if he had no need of it for himſelfe, yet he might let his ſonne Phocus haue it. But Phocion anſwered: If my ſonne Phocus will leaue his naughtie life, and become an honeſt man, that which I will leaue him, ſhall ſerue his turne very well; but if it be ſo that he will ſtill hold on the courſe he hath taken, there is no riches then that can ſuffice him. Another time alſo he anſwered Antipater more roundly, when he would haue had him done an vnhoneſt thing: Antipater (ſaid he) cannot haue me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater ſelfe was wont to ſay, that he had two friends at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could neuer make the one to take any thing of him, and the other, he could neuer ſatisfie. And truly Phocions pouertie was a great glory vnto his vertue, ſithence he was growne old, continuing in the ſame, after he had bene ſo many times Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had receiued ſuch friendſhip and courteſie of ſo many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrary delighted to ſhew his riches, in things that were contrary to the lawes of the city. For a decree being made at ATHENS, commanding that no ſtranger, vpon forfeiture of a thouſand Drachmaes to be payed to the defrayer of the dauncers of the citie, ſhould be any of the dauncers that daunced at any common playes or ſports: Demades one day making certaine games and ſports at his owne charges, brought a hundred dancers of ſtrangers at one time, & withall brought alſo a hundred thouſand Drachmaes to pay the forfeiture thereof. Another time when he maried his ſon Demas, he ſaid vnto him: Son, when I maried thy mother, there was ſo ſmall roſt, that my next neighbour knew not of it; where now at thy mariage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the feaſt. Furthermore when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to go vnto Antipater, to intreate him to take his garriſon out of their citie, he ſtill refuſed the ambaſſade, either becauſe he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he ſaw the people more obedient vnto reaſon, for feare of the garriſon. Howbeit he obtained of Antipater, that he ſhould not be too haſtie in the demanding of his money, but ſhould deferre it vntill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiuing they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter vpon him, and went with his ſonne into MACEDON; whither doubtleſſe his deſtinie caried him to his vtter destruction, euen at that very time when Antipater was fallen sick of a disease whereof he died: whereby the affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Cassander his sonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had sent vnto Antigonus in Asia, willing him to come in all possible speed to winne Greece and Macedon, which hung but of an old rotten threed, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherefore Cassander being aduertised of his arriuall, he made him presently to be apprehended; and setting his sonne hard by him, slue him before his father, so neare him, that the bloud of his sonne sprang vpon him, so that the father was all bloudied with the murder of his sonne. Then Cassander casting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and treacherous treason against his father, giuing him all the reprochfull words he could deuise, at the length he slue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death had established Polyperchon Generall of the armie of the Macedonians, and Cassander his son only Colonell of a thousand footmen. He notwithstanding, after his fathers decease, taking vpon him the gouernement of the realme, sent Nicanor with speed to succeed Menillus in the Captainship of the garrison of Athens, before his death should be reuealed, commanding him first in any case to take the castell of Mvnychia, which he did. Shortly after, the Athenians vnderstanding of the death of Antipater, they accused Phocion, for that he had knowne of his death long before, and yet kept it secret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not his accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor; whom he handled so wisely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the Athenians, but furthermore perswaded him to beat some charge to giue the people the pastime of common playes, which he made to be done at his cost. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings person, meaning to giue Cassander a slampant and blurt, he sent letters patents vnto the people at Athens, declaring how the young king did restore vnto them their popular state againe, and commanded that all the Athenians should vse their former ancient lawes of their citie. This was a wile and crafty fetch against Phocion. For Polyperchon deuising this practise to get the city of Athens into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, vnlesse he found meanes first to banish Phocion: and thought that he should easily bring that to passe, when such as had before bin put off their freedom by his meanes, should come againe to haue voices in the assembly, and that the seditious Orators and accusers might be turned at liberty again, to say what they would. The Athenians hauing heard the contents of these letters patents, began to be somewhat quickened and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor desiring to speake with the Athenians in their Senate, which was assembled in the hauen of Piræa, he went and hazarded his person amongst them, vpon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being secretly aduertised therof, and in the field, not farre from the city, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in time, saued himselfe. Then it appeared that Nicanor would presently be reuenged of the citie; and they accused Phocion because he kept him not, but did let him go. Whereunto he answered, That he trusted Nicanors word, and that he did not think he would offer the city any hurt; but if it should fal out otherwise, he had rather the world should know, that he had no wrong offered him, then that he should offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly spoken; in respect of himselfe: but considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the safetie of his countrey, I cannot tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had to the safety of his countrimen. Neither could he also alleadge for his excuse, that he did not lay hands on Nicanor, for feare to bring the city into manifest war: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had sworne and promised vnto him, and the iustice that he would obserue in his behalfe, that for his sake, Nicanor should afterwards keep himselfe in peace, and do no hurt to the Athenians. Howbeit in truth it seemed, that nothing deceiued Phocion, but the ouer trust he had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, because when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he sought all the secret meanes he could to surprise the hauen of Piræa, and that he daily passed ouer souldiers in the Ile of Salamina, and practised to bribe certain of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen, he wold neuer heare of it, and much lesse beleeue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes Lamerian made a motion, that the Athenians should prepare to be in readinesse to waite vpon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commanded them; he made no account of it, vntill he saw Nicanor come out with his souldiers from the fort of Mvnychia, & that he began to cast trenches to compasse in the hauen of Piræa. But then, when Phocion thought to leade out the people to preuent him, he found
